START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

APRIL 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-030

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959

VOL	TITLE	DATES
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

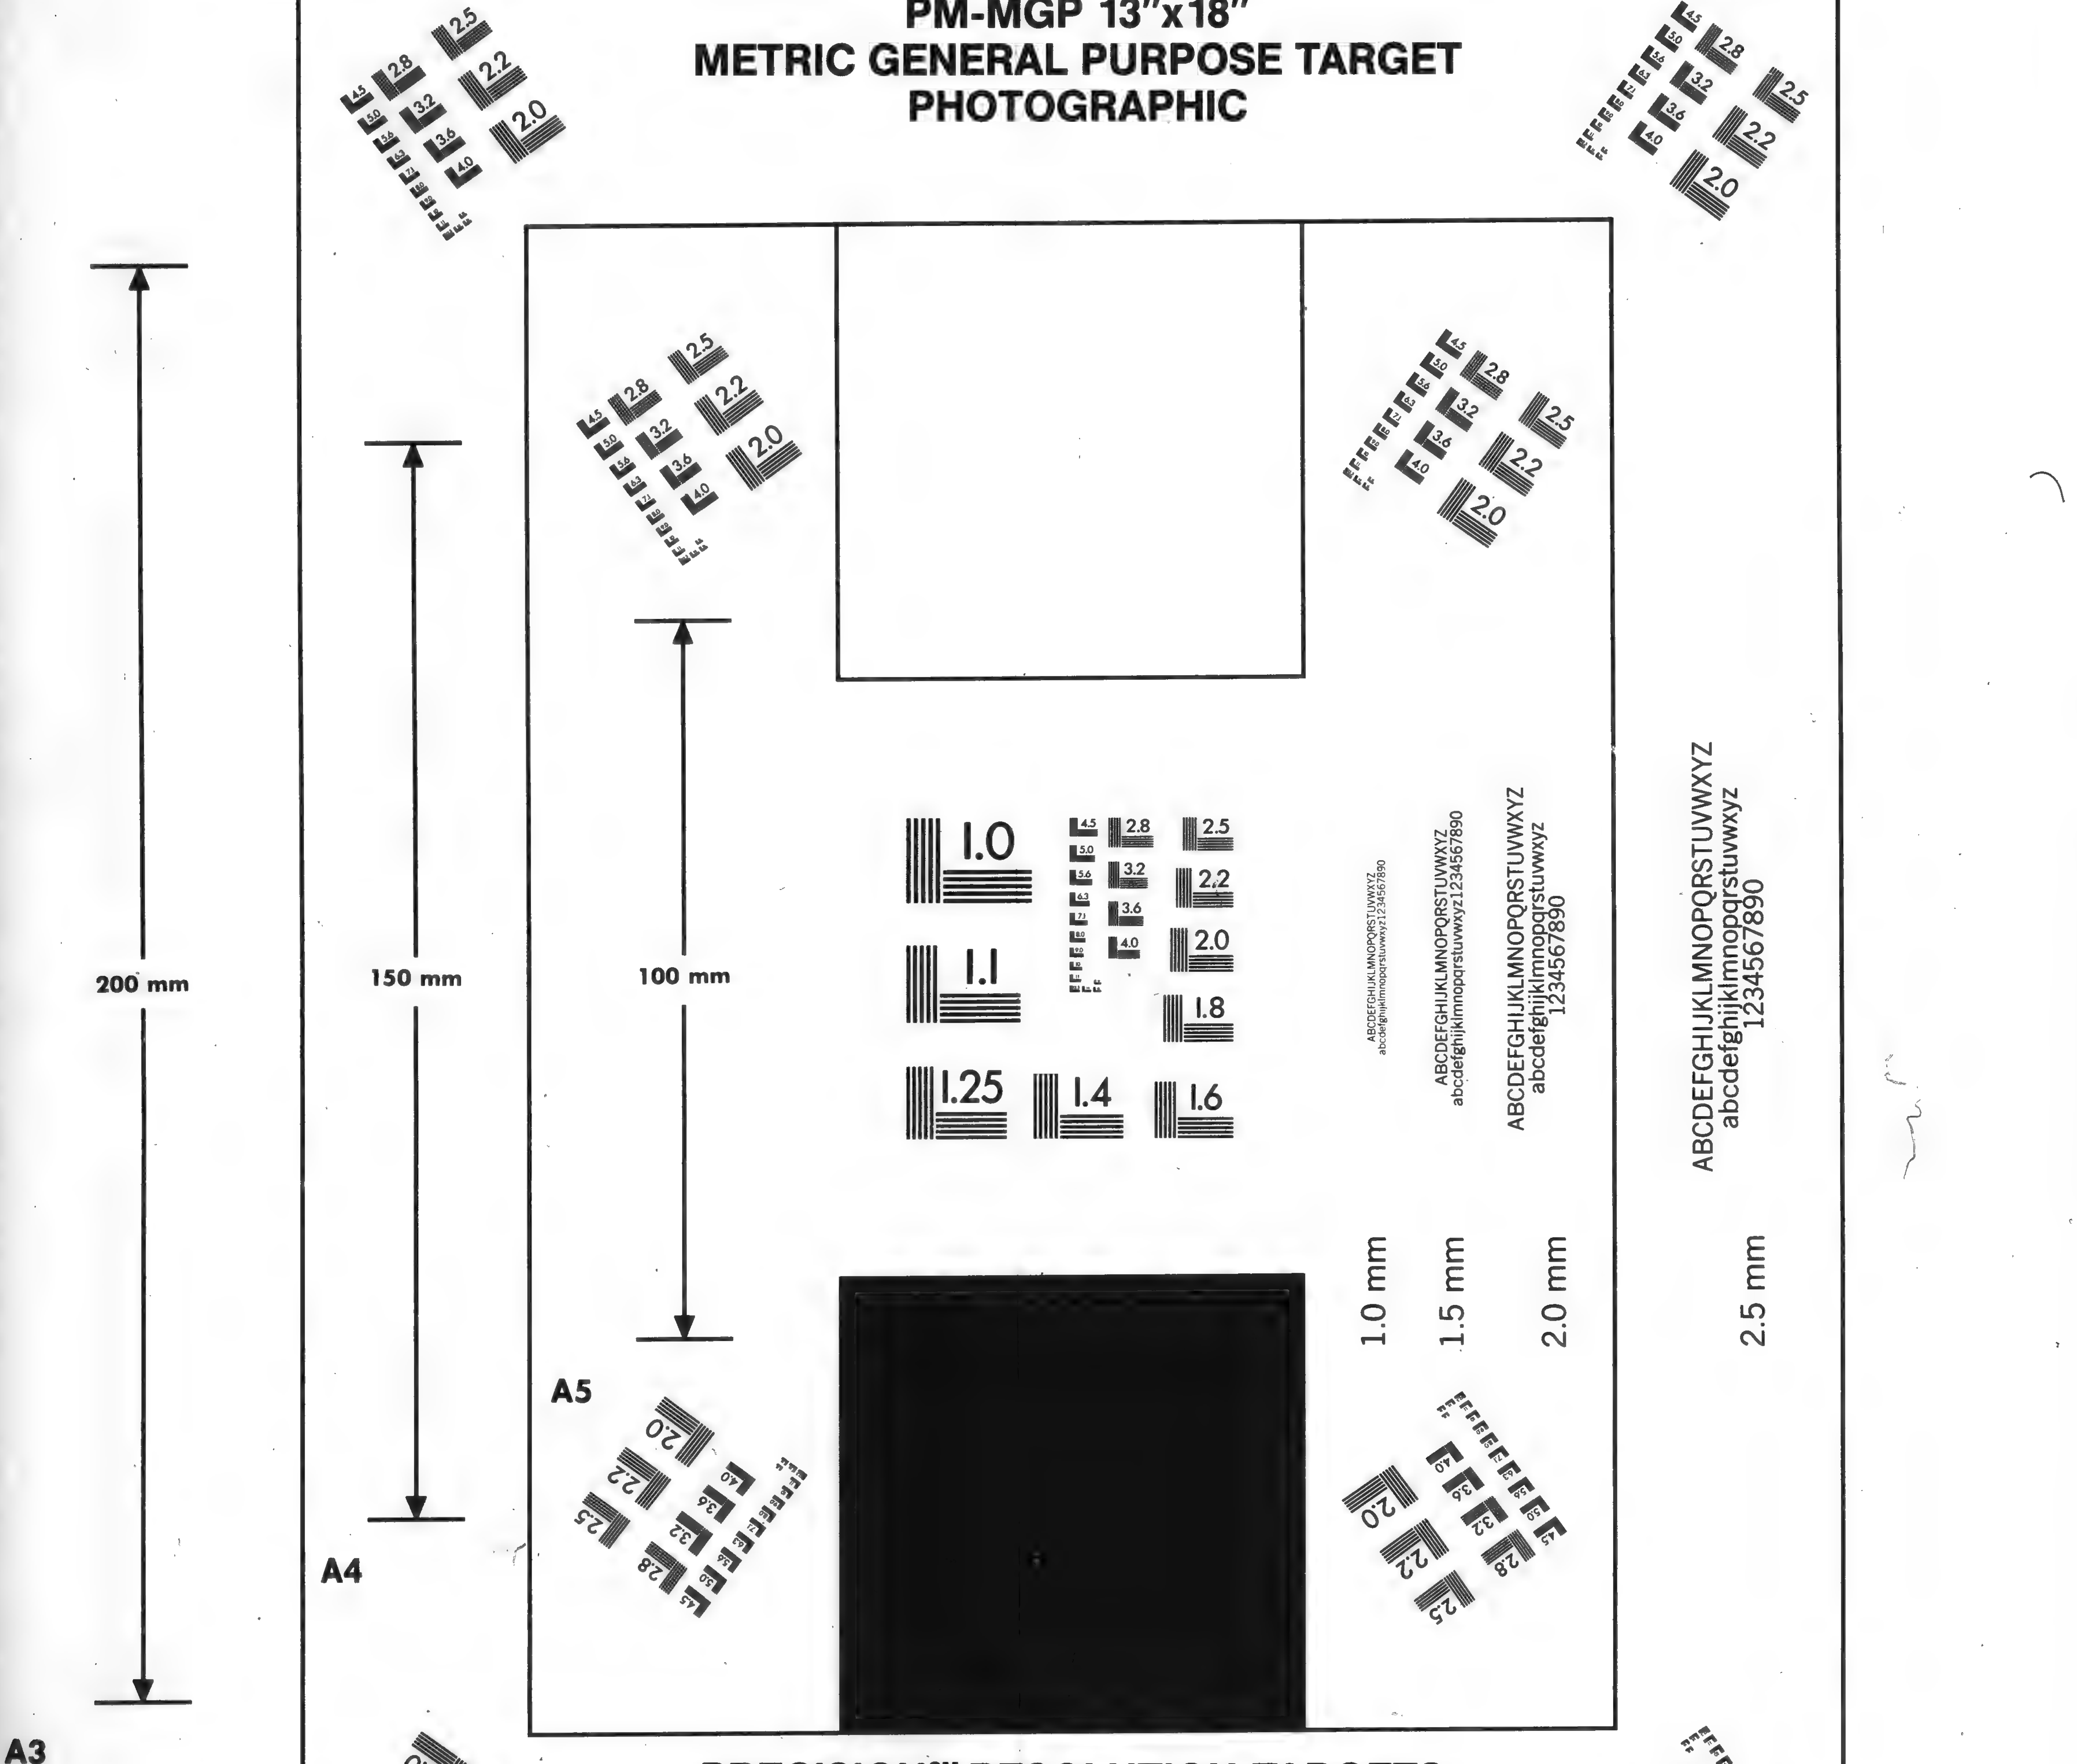
Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35 mm x 30.5 m · 100 ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 01/1996
1461 - 0334 - 024 - 07
CAT 840 3594
29 - 10
Kodak

REEL 30

Volume 54

BSO
Pops
1931-1932

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
5.6
3.2
3.6
2.0
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

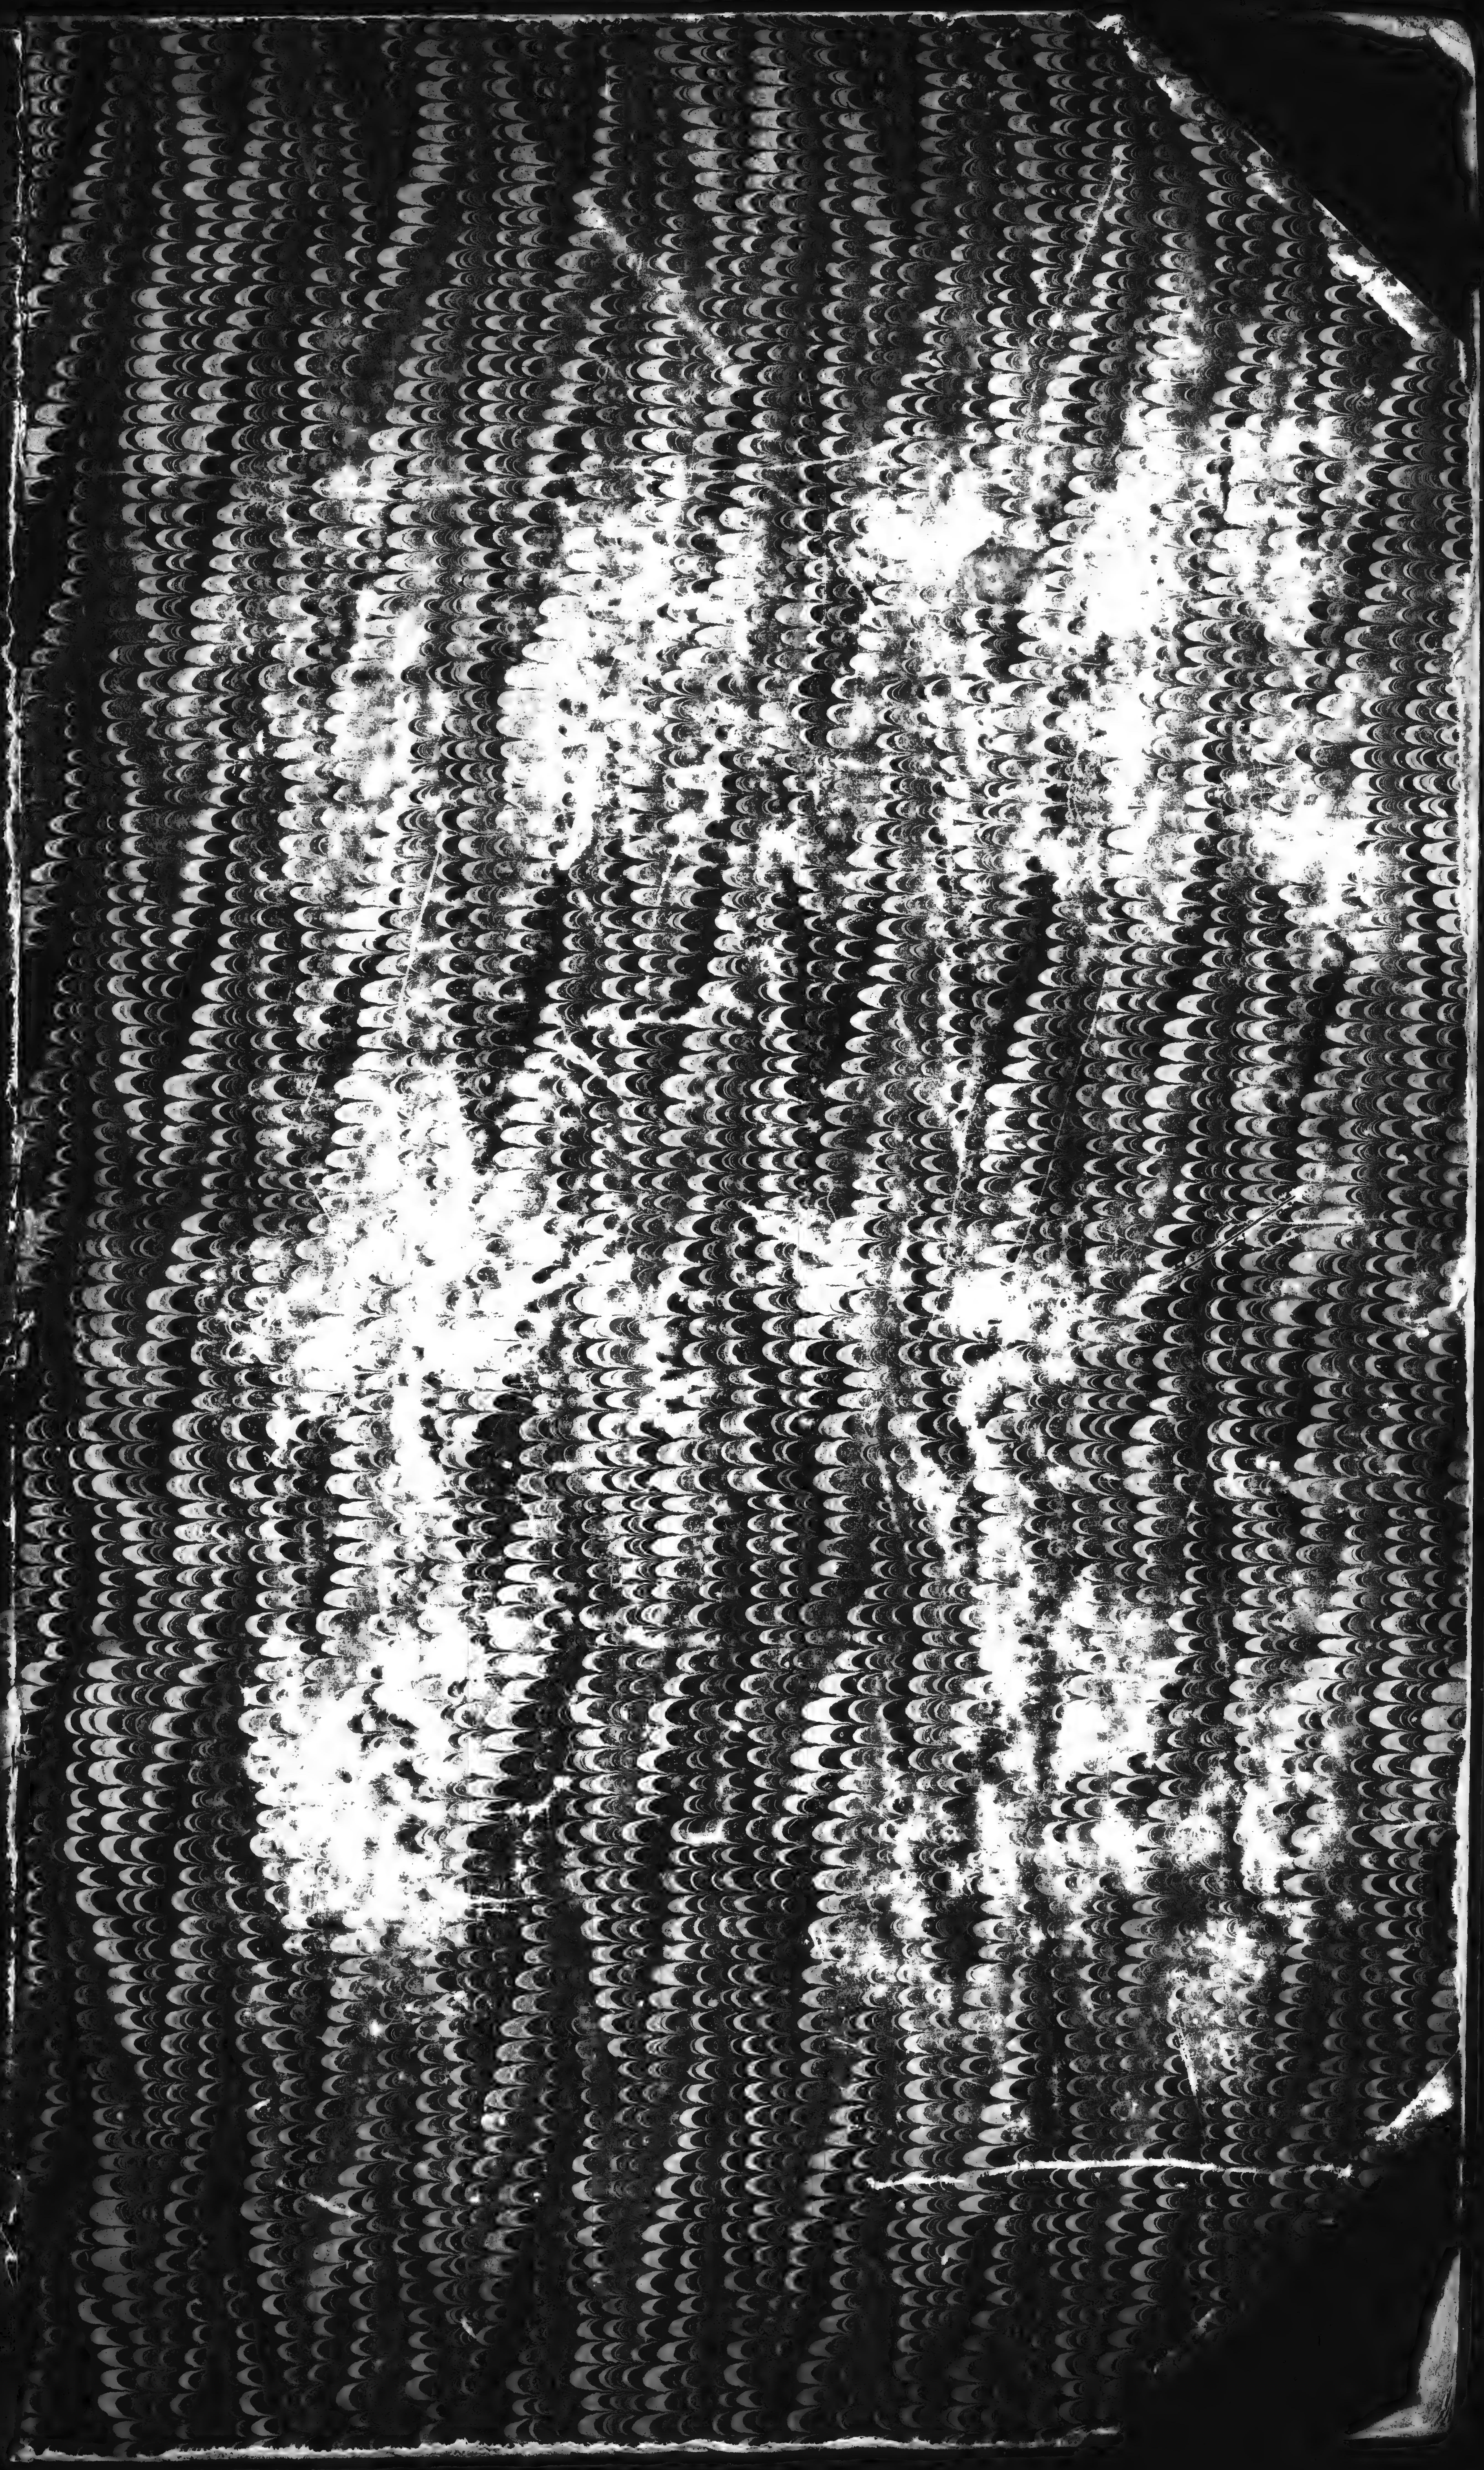
VOLUME 54

BSO
Pops

1931 - 1932



Index page

July 1931 1
August 3
September 7
October 9
November
December
January 1932
February
March April
May June

July 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

JUL 1 6 1931

ITALY FACES STRIKE OF MUSICAL ARTISTS

Toscanini Incident May Mean No Outside Talent for Nation, Gabrilowitsch Says.

Copyright, 1931, by BUFFALO EVENING NEWS and North American Newspaper Alliance.

NEW YORK, July 16.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony orchestra and son-in-law of the late Mark Twain, came into port on the Bremen Wednesday with the announcement that unless Premier Benito Mussolini took steps to protect visiting musical artists a temperamental strike would be called.

The noted musical artist spoke firmly about the future of music in Italy and told an intimate story of the beating received by Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in Bologna, Italy, on March 14.

"I read about the incident in the newspapers of Zurich, Switzerland," said Mr. Gabrilowitsch, "and my wife and I had a conference. She agreed with me that we should repair immediately to Milan and see what we could do for the old gentleman, even if we went to jail for it.

Villa Strongly Guarded.

"We knew that he took his art very seriously and could not conceive that he had been embroiled in a political dispute.

"When we reached his villa in Italy we found it strongly guarded by Fascist patrols, and only eventually was the maestro's passport returned to him. He was practically under arrest and he had plenty to say about the Italian government. He had not been slapped, as the newspapers reported, but he had been badly mauled by 30 or 40 Fascists.

"It happened that he had agreed to conduct two concerts in the memory of the great composer, Martucci, and he declined to make the Fascist hymn part of the program. His refusal was that of an artist, who instinctively senses personally the entire program, and wishes to make it another gem. The anthem would have been as out of place with the music which he had planned as "Yankee Doodle" after or before a Beethoven concert. It couldn't be done. I wouldn't have done it myself.

Conductors Should Unite.

"We went to Berlin," Mr. Gabrilowitsch proceeded, "and there I found that Serge Koussevissky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, had been contracted to go to Italy. He told me that he flatly refused after the Toscanini affair. The leading booking bureau of Europe learned that I was in Berlin, and urged me to take his place. Naturally, I would not go; it would be a blow to music and to the pride of all musicians. The result has been that Italy finds itself destitute of outside talent and alienated from much of the great talent in the country.

"All conductors," he concluded, "should band together as a protest. I saw some of the best in Europe and they agreed with me. I shall never go professionally to Italy unless this outrage is a matter of official apology."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch asserted that the economic situation had not caused the slightest slackening in musical efforts, because, as he pointed out, "artists sometimes must starve." On the contrary, he said, great genius has sprung up in the last few years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUL 1 6 1931

Gabrilowitsch Urges Musicians to Shun Italian Engagements

Declares Temperamental Strike Will Be Called Unless Mussolini Takes Steps to Protect Visiting Artists. Wants Official Apology for Toscanini "Outrage"

New York, July 15—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and son-in-law of the late Mark Twain, came into port on the Bremen today with the announcement that unless Mussolini took steps to protect visiting musical artists a temperamental strike would be called.

The noted musical artist spoke firmly about the future of music in Italy and told an intimate story of the beating received by Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in Bologna, Italy, on March 14.

"I read about the incident in the newspapers of Zurich, Switzerland, "said Mr. Gabrilowitsch, "and my wife and I had a conference. She agreed with me that we should repair immediately to Milan and see what we could for the old gentleman, even if we went to jail.

"We knew that he took his art very seriously, and could not conceive that he had been embroiled in a political dispute.

"When we reached his villa in Italy, we found it strongly guarded by Fascist patrols, and only eventually was the maestro's passport returned to him. He was practically under arrest, and he had plenty to say about the Italian Government He had not been slapped, as the newspapers reported, but he had been badly mauled by 30 or 40 Fascists.

"It happened that he had agreed to conduct two concerts in memory of the great composer, Martucci, and he declined to make the Fascist hymn part of the program. His refusal was that of an artist, who instinctively senses personally the entire program, and wishes to make it another gem. The anthem would have been as out of place with the music which he had planned as Yankee Doodle after or before a Beethoven concert. It couldn't be done. I wouldn't have done it myself.

"We went to Berlin," Mr. Gabrilowitsch proceeded, "and there I found that Serge Koussevissky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been contracted to go to Italy. He told me that he flatly refused after the Toscanini affair. The leading booking bureau of Europe learned that I was in Berlin, and urged me to take his place. Naturally, I would not go; it would be a blow to music and to the pride of all musicians. The result has been that Italy finds itself destitute of outside talent, and alienated from much of the great talent in the country.

"All conductors," he concluded, "should band together as a protest. I saw some of the best in Europe and they agreed with me. I shall never go professionally to Italy unless this outrage is a matter of official apology."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch asserted that the depression had not caused the slightest slackening in musical efforts, because, as he pointed out, "artists sometimes must starve." On the contrary, he said, great genius has sprung up in the past few years.

(Copyright, 1931, by N. A. N. A., Inc.)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST STANDARD

UL 16 1931

MUSICIANS MAY FORSAKE ITALY IF NOT GUARDED

Il Duce Urged to Protect Artists After Beating of Toscanini

NEW YORK, July 15.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and son-in-law of the late Mark Twain, came into port on the Bremen today with the announcement that unless Mussolini took steps to protect visiting musical artists a temperamental strike would be called.

The noted musical artist spoke firmly about the future of music in Italy, and told an intimate story of the beating received by Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in Bologna, Italy, on March 14.

"I read about the incident in the newspapers of Zurich, Switzerland," said Mr. Gabrilowitsch, "and my wife and I had a conference. She agreed with me that we should repair immediately to Milan and see what we could do for the old gentleman, even if we went to jail for it.

Villa Guarded

"We knew that he took his art very seriously, and could not conceive that he had been embroiled in a political dispute.

"When we reached his villa in Italy, we found it strongly guarded by Fascist patrols, and only eventually was the maestro's passport returned to him. He was practically under arrest, and he had plenty to say about the Italian government. He had not been slapped, as the newspapers reported, but he had been badly mauled by 30 or 40 Fascists.

"It happened that we had agreed to conduct two concerts in the memory of the great composer, Martucci, and he declined to make the Fascist hymn part of the program. His refusal was that of an artist, who instinctively senses personally the entire program, and wishes to make it another gem.

Anthem "Out of Place"

"The anthem would have been as out of place with the music which he had planned as Yankee Doodle after or before a Beethoven concert. It couldn't be done. I wouldn't have done it myself.

"We went to Berlin," Mr. Gabrilowitsch proceeded, "and there I found that Serge Koussevissky, director of the Boston symphony orchestra, had been contracted to go to Italy. He told me that he flatly refused after the Toscanini affair. The leading booking bureau of Europe learned that I was in Berlin, and urged me to take his place. Naturally, I would not go; it would be a blow to music and to the pride of all musicians. The result has been that Italy finds itself destitute of outside talent, and alienated from much of the great talent in the country.

Protest Urged

"All conductors," he concluded, "should band together as a protest. I saw some of the best in Europe and they agreed with me. I shall never go professionally to Italy unless this outrage is a matter of official apology."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch asserted that the depression had not caused the slightest slackening in musical efforts, because, as he pointed out, "artists sometimes must starve." On the contrary, he said, great genius has sprung up in the past few years.

Copyright, 1931, by N. A. N. A., Inc.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JUL 17 1931

Relates How Fascists Fell On Toscanini

Brother Maestro Censures Italian Group for Attacking Famous Conductor in Bologna

BY ROGER BATCHELDER.

(Copyright, 1931, by NANA, Inc.)

New York, July 16.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and son-in-law of the late Mark Twain, who arrived yesterday from Europe on the "Bremen" said that unless Mussolini took steps to protect visiting musical artists a temperamental strike would be called.

The noted musical artist spoke firmly about the future of music in Italy, and told an intimate story of the beating received by Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in Bologna, Italy, on March 14.

Decide To Go To Aid.

"I read about the incident in the newspapers of Zurich, Switzerland," said Mr. Gilbrilowitsch, "and my wife and I had a conference. She agreed with me that we should repair immediately to Milan and see what we could do for the old gentleman, even if we went to jail for it.

"We knew that he took his art very seriously, and could not conceive that he had been embroiled in a political dispute.

"When we reached his villa in Italy, we found it strongly guarded by Fascist patrols, and only eventually was the maestro's passport returned to him. He was practically under arrest, and he had plenty to say about the Italian Government. He had not been slapped, as the newspapers reported, but he had been badly mauled by 30 or 40 Fascists.

"It happened that he had agreed to conduct two concerts in the memory of the great composer, Martucci, and he declined to make the Fascist hymn part of the program. His refusal was that of an artist, who instinctively senses personally the entire program, and wishes to make it another gem. The anthem would have been as out of place with the music which he had planned as Yankee Doodle after or before a Beethoven concert. It couldn't be done. I wouldn't have done it myself.

Proceed to Berlin.

"We went to Berlin," Mr. Gabrilowitsch proceeded, "and there I found that Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been contracted to go to Italy. He told me that he flatly refused after the Toscanini affair. The leading booking bureau of Europe learned that I was in Berlin, and urged me to take his place. Naturally I would not go; it would be a blow to music and to the pride of all musicians. The result has been that Italy finds itself destitute of outside talent, and alienated from much of the great talent in the country.

"All conductors," he concluded, "should band together as a protest I saw some of the best in Europe and they agreed with me. I shall never go personally to Italy unless this outrage is a matter of official apology."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch asserted that the depression had not caused the slightest slackening in musical efforts, because, as he pointed out, 'artists sometimes must starve." On the contrary, he said, great genius has sprung up in the past few years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

JUL 16 1931

A Temperamental Strike? Gabrilowitsch Votes Yes

(Copyright, 1931, by The Detroit News and North American Newspaper Alliance.)

NEW YORK, July 16.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, came into port on the Bremen with the announcement that unless Mussolini took steps to protect visiting musical artists a temperamental strike would be called.

He spoke firmly about the future of music in Italy, and told an intimate story of the beating received by Arturo Toscanini, conducter of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in Bologna, Italy, on March 14.

"I read about the incident in the newspapers of Zurich, Switzerland," said Mr. Gabrilowitsch, "and my wife and I had a conference. She agreed with me that we should go immediately to Milan and see what we could do for the old gentleman, even if we went to jail for it.

"We knew that he took his art very seriously, and could not conceive that he had been embroiled in a political dispute.

"When we reached his villa in Italy, we found it strongly guarded by Fascist patrols, and only eventually was the maestro's passport returned to him. He was practically under arrest, and he had plenty to say about the Italian government. He had not been slapped, as the newspapers reported, but he had been badly mauled by 30 or 40 Fascists.

"It happened that he had agreed to conduct two concerts in the memory of the great composer, Martucci, and he declined to make the Fascist hymn part of the program. His refusal was that of an artist, who instinctively senses personally the entire program, and wishes to make it another gem. The anthem would have been as out of place with the music which he had planned as Yankee Doodle after or before a Beethoven concert. It couldn't be done. I wouldn't have done it myself.

Next Page, Column 5)

REFUSES TO ACT.

"We went to Berlin" Mr. Gabrilowitsch continued, "and there I found that Serge Koussevissky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been contracted to go to Italy. He told me that he flatly refused after the Toscanini affair. The leading booking bureau of Europe learned that I was in Berlin, and urged me to take his place. Naturally, I would not go; it would be a blow to music and to the pride of all musicians. The result has been that Italy finds itself destitute of outside talent and alienated from much of the great talent in the country.

"All conductors," he continued, "should band together as a protest. I saw some of the best in Europe and they agreed with me. I shall never go professionally to Italy unless this outrage is a matter of official apology."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch asserted that the depression had not caused the slightest slackening in musical efforts, because, as he pointed out, "artists sometimes must starve." On the contrary, he said, great genius has sprung up in the last few years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS

JUL 16 1931

The best band that has yet been heard on the air is the Boston Symphony orchestra. It plays with a smoothness and possesses a musicianship, the bigwigs call it virtuosity, that are not evident in any other group. Right below the Boston band we would rank the Philharmonic and Philadelphia orchestras. The latter two are probably as well trained, possess as many first class musicians as the Boston ensemble, but they don't seem to give the same superlative performance.

LOUIS REID

Can it be tradition? Can it be that the renown of this band, stretching over so many years, is comparable, say, to the renown of Notre Dame in football, the Barrymores in acting, the California universities in field and track events?

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

JUL 17 1931

Boston's Band Gets Big Hand From Reid

By Louis Reid

The best band that has yet been heard on the air is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It plays with a smoothness and possesses a musicianship, the bigwigs call it virtuosity, that are not evident in any other group.

Right below the Boston band we would rank the Philharmonic and Philadelphia orchestras. The latter two are probably as well trained, possess as many first class musicians as the Boston ensemble but they don't seem to give the same superlative performance. Can it be tradition? Can it be that the renown of this band, stretching over so many years, is comparable, say, to the renown of Notre Dame in football, the Barrymores in acting, the California universities in field and track events?

THIS CLIPPING FROM GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS

UL 20 1931

Gabrilowitsch, Too, Banning Italy Until Amend to Toscanini

Detroit, July 20.—(AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, said Saturday night that he would not appear at any concerts in Italy until an official opology was given Arthuro Toscanini for the latter's treatment at the hands of the Fascisti at Bologna. Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, was roughly handled by a mob of young Fascisti at the stage door of a concert hall in Bologna last spring when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch said he had been asked to conduct two concerts in Italy in place of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who refused to ap[illegible] after the Toscanini incident.

2

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES STAR
JUL 28 1931

Who's News Today

By LEMUEL F. PARTON
(Copyright, 1931, by Cincinnati Times-Star.)

NEW YORK, July 28—(CPA)—In a curious, round-about way, Calvin Coolidge had a lot to do with the blasting critique of American penology by the Wickersham Commission. Mr. Coolidge made Sanford Bates a penologist when he had never dreamed of being one, and the figure of Sanford Bates looms large in the administration's intelligent attack on prison problems, and in the Wickersham report. Serving as director of the Bureau of Prisons on the Department of Justice, he is rated as possibly the leading penologist of America.

"You have been appointed Massachusetts commissioner of corrections," Gov. Coolidge telephoned his friend, State Senator Sanford Bates. "Why—I don't know whether I want to be commissioner—I don't know what to say," replied Bates. "Say nothing," snapped Gov. Coolidge, and hung up.

That was in 1919. Bates, 35-year-old lawyer, schooled in Old English High, where J. P. Morgan was graduated, began a liberal, enlightened and aggressive assault on the old iniquities of the State prison system. He was a pioneer in the application of psychiatry, in the isolation of hardened or congenital criminals, in re-education and rehabilitation of reclaimable prisoners, in humanitarian methods and in an informed and scientific program of enlightened penology. During those years, other States were digging up antiquarian statutes, habitual criminal laws and, in general, meeting all problems with force.

Students of criminology rate Bates's ten years' incumbency as Massachusetts prison commissioner as the period of greatest advance in any State in the history of America. President Hoover is credited with one of his best appointments in making Bates head of the Federal system, disbursing $10,000,000 annually in the five Federal prisons.

Down in Washington, there are three beautiful old brick houses, remodeled into a single stately mansion by Ruth Hanna McCormick, when Mrs. McCormick was battling James Hamilton Lewis for the Illinois senatorship. Mrs. McCormick didn't go back to Washington and the transfer of her brilliant salon to the new mansion didn't take place. It was presumed, of course, that when Mrs. McCormick got around to it, she would pick up her place in Congress again, but today it is announced that she will not be a candidate in the 1931 Republican primaries.

The daughter of Mark Hanna is a dairy farmer. She has a 2,400-acre farm on the Rock River in Illinois, where she has entertained as many as 15,000 guests on a single occasion. She manages two great estates, publishes a newspaper and maintains business offices in Chicago. If she has permanently withdrawn from politics, there will be gloom and doom in salon diplomacy in Washington for, between them, Mrs. McCormick and Alice Roosevelt Longworth kept things humming. Tall, pale and slender, with arresting dark eyes, gowned for formal occasions in black and silver, Mrs. McCormick was a brilliant and potent figure in the overlapping zone of capital society and politics. Of the Ohio school, transplanted to Illinois, she devoted thirty years to politics, to be defeated by the orchidaceous J. Ham Lewis, after an embarrassing mixup with the drys.

Some future Lytton Strachey may find in Bishop William T. Manning the portrait of a great cleric. The monumental activities of Bishop Manning, astute and powerful head of the Episcopal Church in America, culminate in leadership of a new movement for church unity, raising $13,000,000 for the building of St. John Cathedral, Bishop Manning has emerged triumphantly from innumerable bitter controversies and, as a stanch defender of all orthodoxies, law and ecclesiastic, is the unchallenged leader of the church militant in America.

There is no more alert or powerful foe of heresy in the United States. When Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was accused of smuggling pro-German arpeggios into his rendition of the classics, it was Bishop Manning who led the fiery attack against him and sent him to barracks. Fighting the Protestant Episcopal Church League, he has scotched heresy wherever it reared its head. It was he who trained heavy artillery on Judge Ben Lindsey and his subversive doctrines of marriage and divorce. Born in England and arriving in America at the age of 16, he refused four bishoprics before accepting the New York diocese in 1921. He is an advocate of Sunday sports and takes great pride in the sports bay in St. Johns, to which Abe Zitelzky, Hester street newsboy, contributed 3 cents, and John D. Rockefeller, Jr., $500,000.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER
JUL 17 1931

ARTISTS THREATEN TO BOYCOTT ITALY

Gabrilowitsch Says All Musicians Protest Toscanini Incident.

(Copyright, 1931, by N. A. N. A., Inc.)

NEW YORK, July 16.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and son-in-law of the late Mark Twain, came into port on the Bremen with the announcement that unless Mussolini took steps to protect visiting musical artists a temperamental strike would be called.

The noted musical artist spoke firmly about the future of music in Italy, and told an intimate story of the beating received by Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in Bologna, Italy, March 14.

"I read about the incident in the newspapers of Zurich, Switzerland," said Gabrilowitsch, "and my wife and I had a conference. She agreed with me that we should repair immediately to Milan and see what we could do for the old gentleman, even if we went to jail for it.

Takes Art Seriously.

"We knew that he took his art very seriously, and could not conceive that he had been embroiled in a political dispute.

"When we reached his villa in Italy, we found it strongly guarded by Fascist patrols, and only eventually was the maestro's passport returned to him. He was practically under arrest, and he had plenty to say about the Italian government. He had not been slapped, as the newspapers reported, but he had been badly mauled by 30 or 40 Fascists.

"It happened that he had agreed to conduct two concerts in the memory of the great composer, Martucci, and he declined to make the Fascist hymn part of the program. His refusal was that of an artist, who distinctly senses personally the entire program, and wishes to make it another gem.

'The anthem would have been as out of place with the music which he had planned as 'Yankee Doodle' after or before a Beethoven concert. It couldn't be done. I wouldn't have done it myself."

"We went to Berlin," Gabrilowitsch proceeded, "and there I found that Serge Koussevissky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been contracted to go to Italy. He told me that he flatly refused after the Toscanini affair.

"The leading booking bureau of Europe learned that I was in Berlin, and urged me to take his place. Naturally I would not go; it would be a blow to music and to the pride of all musicians. The result has been that Italy finds itself destitute of outside talent, and alienated from much of the great talent in the country.

"All conductors," he concluded, "should band together as a protest. I saw some of the best in Europe and they agreed with me. I shall never go professionally to Italy unless this outrage is a matter of official apology."

Gabrilowitsch asserted that the depression had not caused the slightest slackening in musical efforts, because, as he pointed out, "artists sometimes must starve," on the contrary, he said, great genius has sprung up in the past few years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLESTON, S. C.
POST
JUL 17 1931

Italians Mauled Music Director

(©, 1931, N. A. N. A., Inc.)

New York, July 17.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and son-in-law of the late Mark Twain, came into port on the Bremen today with the announcement that unless Mussolini took steps to protect visiting musical artists a temperamental strike would be called.

The noted musical artist spoke firmly about the future of music in Italy, and told an intimate story of the beating received by Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, when he refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in Bologna, Italy, on March 14.

"I read about the incident in the newspapers of Zurich, Switzerland," said Mr. Gabrilowitsch, "and my wife and I had a conference. She agreed with me that we should repair immediately to Milan and see what we could do for the old gentleman, even if we went to jail for it.

"We knew that he took his art very seriously, and could not conceive that he had been embroiled in a political dispute.

"When we reached his villa in Italy, we found it strongly guarded by Fascist patrols, and only eventually was the maestro's passport returned to him. He was practically under arrest, and he had plenty to say about the Italian government. He had not been slapped, as the newspapers reported, but he had been badly mauled by thirty or forty Fascists.

"It happened that he had agreed to conduct two concerts in the memory of the great composer, Martucci, and he declined to make the Fascist hymn part of the program. His refusal was that of an artist, who instinctively senses personally the entire program, and wishes to make it another gem. The anthem would have been as out of place with the music which he had planned as Yankee Doodle after or before a Beethoven concert. It couldn't be done and I wouldn't have done it myself.

"We went to Berlin," Mr. Gabrilowitsch proceeded, "and there I found that Serge Koussevissky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, had been contracted to go to Italy. He told me that he flatly refused after the Toscanini affair. The leading booking bureau of Europe learned that I was in Berlin, and urged me to take his place. Naturally, I would not go; it would be a blow to music and to the pride of all musicians. The result has been that Italy finds itself destitute of outside talent, and alienated from much of the great talent in the country.

"All conductors," he concluded, "should band together as a protest. I saw some of the best in Europe and they agreed with me. I shall never go professionally to Italy unless this outrage is a matter of official apology."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch asserted that the depression had not caused the slightest slackening in musical efforts, because, as he pointed out, "artists sometimes must starve." On the contrary, he said, great genius has sprung up in the past few years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

Parabolic Mikes Praised by Critic

Appreciation of the effectiveness of the parabolic microphone developed by technical experts of the National Broadcasting company as an aid to the broadcasting of symphonic music was expressed recently by Prof H. W. Gardner of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Writing to George E. Judd, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, shortly after an NBC broadcast of a Pop concert from Boston Symphony hall, this scholarly radio listener and music lover said:—

"I am only too glad to confirm by letter my recent remarks to you about the broadcast of the Pop concert on Saturday evening, June 6.

"Of all the programs of this type of music that we have heard over our Victor radio this past season the Pop concert program seemed to my family and myself the most perfect to which we have listened.

"It was so perfectly clear and smooth as to give us the impression that we were in Symphony hall itself and not hearing the orchestra through some intervening medium.

"In short, it was a splendid performance of a very attractive program and I congratulate you and those responsible for it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR
JUL 19 1931

Pictures With Sound, but Not Sound Pictures.

More interesting from the connoisseur's point of view, perhaps, is Victor's release of Moussorgsky's delightful little suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged from the piano score by Maurice Ravel and played by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, at whose suggestion Ravel is said to have made the arrangement. The "pictures," which are musically represented in the suite, were those of a Russian artist and architect named Victor Hartmann, a close friend of Moussorgsky and the others who comprised the famous "Five" protagonists of Russian nationalist music in the latter half of the last century. Hartmann died young under circumstances particularly distressing to his friends, and Stassov, the critic, took the responsibility of honoring his memory with an exhibition of his pictures. Moussorgsky's interesting suite is a promenade through the gallery, viewing the pictures one by one—The Old Castle, Gnomes, The Tuileries, a Ballet of the Unhatched Chickens, several portraits, a market place and the Great Gate of Kiev. The music is as varied as the subjects portrayed, and is strung together with a curious little "walking" tune which carries the listener in his fancy from one canvas to another. Ravel's arrangement is masterly, and much more effective than the music as Moussorgsky left it for the piano; and it is, of course, excellently played. Koussevitzky is never better than when playing in Russian. The suite is in five parts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
JUL 17 1931

Former Colleague Extolls Philip Hale's Symphony Program Notes.

Concerning the program notes of the Boston Symphony orchestra, compiled by Philip Hale, music reviewers of the Boston Herald, Olin Downes, formerly on the staff of the Boston Post, says in the New York Times:

"The latest volume of the most brilliant and informative program notes written today, annotations engrossing to layman and musician alike, is at hand. The reference is to a bound volume of the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which are compiled and edited by Philip Hale. * * * The author of these program notes should properly have been entrusted with the task of writing the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has been treated by far more amateurish, less informed and less skilled hands. It is a task which Mr. Hale could have completed as no one else. Possibly he was asked to do it, and declined, with the utter unwillingness to compile a book which has always characterized him. History does not relate. The program books are Mr. Hale's history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and they say more for the fame and standing of that institution than many a blazing journalistic tribute to its management or conductors."

August 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

Around and About

By QUIPPE QUI

DIARY of a Mrs. Pepys—Up to stagger through another day of heat and to pour enough liquid into me to float a battleship. . . . To casting my accounts and whooping with joy that my checkbook and the bank statements agree, for generally I spend many minutes and sometimes hours hunting for thirty-five cents that the bank statement shows I'm wrong about. . . . And wondering if there isn't such a thing as a miniature household adding machine for keeping accounts straight. . . . To a ride in the country and saw a mother giving her son a scrubbing right in front of the window and he was as unembarrassed at our seeing him so taking his Sunday bath as we were, for the weather was so hot that few clothes or no clothes at all somehow seemed the sensible thing. . . . Feeling very housewifely at the end of the day, decided to do the dishes, with disastrous effects for I cut my hand badly on a broken glass, and in the hurry for iodin and cotton my son did something queer to a light that blew out all the fuses so we were in darkness, and the flashlight would not flash, and my finger kept on dripping gore, and then somehow I stepped particularly heavy and smashed the arch support in my right shoe—and I drew a moral that I was not built for doing dishes. . . . And so to bed after reading parts of M. A. DeWolfe Howe's "The Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1881-1931," and highly entertained at the critics' contempt for Wagner and Brahms in the early eighties, one critic likening Brahms to the "sapient musings of some brilliant idiot," and another considering an entire concert of Wagner music "an elgiac nightmare."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
AUG 21 1931

Our Local Symphony

The directors of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra have, in our opinion, made a wise decision in refusing because of depression to cut down the size of the orchestra, thereby depriving several musicians of employment. Instead they have planned five concerts, four by their own orchestra with distinguished assisting artists, and one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. By this plan they hope that real music lovers will give support as heretofore, especially as this city is now rather arid in the way of good music.

The Springfield Symphony Orchestra has gained a good musical organization through the difficulties of doubt, of the halting support given local talent and of lack of funds for orchestra scores. But it has "arrived," and offers Springfield people a musical treat each season. Only by rigid economy, however, has it been able to keep out of the deficit column. This suggests the possibility of the financing of the orchestra by some Springfield philanthropist, as the Boston Symphony was by Henry Lee Higginson. The Boston orchestra is a monument to his name.

The Boston orchestra, according to M. A. DeWolfe Howe's book, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," had its modest and fearful beginnings, and only after much experience became the great musical organization it is, with the unwavering backing of Mr. Higginson. The Springfield orchestra may not aspire to such hights as the Boston orchestra, but with good financial backing it could develop into a great credit to the city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE
AUG 16 193

Stravinsky Violin Concerto To Have Premiere in Berlin

Igor Stravinsky will conduct the world premiere of his new violin concerto on a program of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on October 9, with Samuel Dushkin as soloist. Mr. Dushkin, who has been working with the composer on the concerto on the Riviera, writes that the orchestration is now complete.

Mr. Dushkin will also be the soloist in performance of the concerto, Stravinsky's only work thus far for violin and orchestra, in London, Paris and Amsterdam, and in its first American performance by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky in Boston on Friday afternoon, January 1. A New York performance will presumably follow, either in the January or the February visit of the orchestra to Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
AUG 5 - 1931

25,000 HEAR CONCERT ON CHARLES ESPLANADE

BOSTON, Aug. 5 (AP)—Twenty-five thousand persons sat under the stars last night while Arthur Fielder led his musicians through a series of request numbers at an Esplanade orchestra concert.

Visitors from many sections of New England gathered on the bank of the Charles to swell the audience which was probably the largest in the history of concert entertainment in New England.

The orchestra is composed of members of the Boston Symphony and plays classical and semi-classical music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WAKEFIELD, MASS.
ITEM
AUG 5 1931

More than 20,000 persons gather on Boston Esplanade for next to last of Boston Symphony Orchestra's open air concerts. Popular program arranged by Arthur Fiedler thrills crowd.

MUSICAL COURIER
AUG. 29. 1931

CONDUCTORS OF THE DETROIT, CHICAGO AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Frederick Stock and Serge Koussevitzky photographed at Gastein, Austria, where they spent part of the summer.

4

September 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

SEP 7 - 1931

Koussevitsky's Story Out Soon

A biography of Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, known as one of the foremost apostles of modern music, will soon be brought out by Alfred A. Knopf under the title of "Sergei Koussevitsky and His Epoch." The author is Arthur Lourie, the composer, who has been an intimate friend of Koussevitsky's for fifteen years.

The book is announced as not only a biography of Koussevitsky, but also a chronicle of the musical life of his time, for he has been the first performer, and frequently the publisher, of important works of such composers as Debussy, Ravel, Dukas, Prokoviev, Stravinsky, Scriabin, Rachmaninoff, Copland, Honegger, Kodaly and Bartok.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

SEP 8 - 1931

Boston Symphony Will Open Oct. 9

Concert in Springfield Included Among 107 Scheduled for Season.

BOSTON, Sept. 8—Its personnel of 111 players unchanged from last year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 51st season Oct. 9 in Symphony Hall in the first of a total of 107 concerts arranged for Boston and elsewhere which will provide for the orchestra one of the busiest seasons in its career.

Serge Koussevitsky, who will direct the orchestra for the eighth successive season, will retprn from Europe on the Ile de France, Sept. 29 and will immediately assemble the players in preparation for the season's opening. Mr. Koussevitsky has spent the greater part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his Paris home.

As in other years the orchestra will give 15 concerts in Greater New York, and during the week of Oct. 26 will tour the Middle West, making appearances at Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven (under the auspices of Wellesley College, Smith College and Yale University), also Hartford and Springfield.

In Boston there will be the usual five series, which with pension fund concerts and young people's concerts, brings a total of 107—as many as the orchestra can undertake in one season. With an advance subscription which has never been larger, there is every promise of a highly successful year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 12 1931

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past half-dozen years and universally known as a leading apostle of modern music, is the subject of a biography by Arthur Lourie, which Knoff will soon publish. The title will be "Serge Koussevitsky and His Epoch." The author has been an intimate friend of Koussevitsky's for 15 years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
JOURNAL-POST

SEP 13 1931

KOUSSEVITSKY BIOGRAPHY.

A biography of Sergei Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is universally known as perhaps the foremost apostle of modern music, will soon be brought out by Alfred A. Knopf under the title of "Sergei Koussevitsky and His Epoch." The author is Arthur Lourie, the composer, who has been an intimate friend of Kousevtisky's for fifteen years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

SEP 9 1931

SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON ON OCTOBER 9

Boston Orchestra Prepares for 51st Season Without Change

Its personnel of 111 players unchanged from last year, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 51st season October 9 in Symphony hall in the first of a total of 107 concerts arranged for Boston and elsewhere which will provide for the orchestra one of the busiest seasons in its career.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will direct the orchestra for the eighth successive season, will return from Europe on the Ile de France, Sept. 29 and will immediately assemble the players in preparation for the season's opening. Mr. Koussevitzky has spent the greater part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his Paris home.

As in other years the orchestra will give 15 concerts in Greater New York, and during the week of October 26 will tour the middle west, making appearances at Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh, and Ithaca.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven (under the auspices of Wellesley college, Smith College, and Yale university), also Hartford and Springfield.

In Boston there will be the usual five series, which with pension fund concerts and young people's concerts, brings a total of 107—as many as the orchestra can undertake in one season. With an advance subscription which has never been larger, there is every promise of a highly successful year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

SEP 13 1931

Boston Symphony Plans for Season

Richmond Included in Itinerary of Noted Orchestra

BOSTON, Sept. 12—Elaborate plans for the new season are being made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which again this year will include Richmond in its limited itinerary of concerts.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will sail from Europe this month on the "Ile de France," which is due in New York September 29. He will then assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra to prepare for the opening of its fifty-first season on October 9 in Symphony Hall. This will be the eighth season under the Russian leader. Dr. Koussevitzky has spent the larger part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his Paris home.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is engaged to make a week's tour of the Middle West in the week of October 26. Concerts will be given in Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca.

There will be fifteen concerts in Greater New York, in continuation of the customary visits which this orchestra has been making since 1886.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven (under the auspices of Wellesley College, Smith College and Yale University); also Hartford and Springfield.

In Boston there will be the usual five series which, with pension fund concerts and young people's concerts will bring a total of 107—as many as the orchestra can undertake in one season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

SEP 9 - 1931

SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON ON OCTOBER 9

Boston Orchestra Prepares for 51st Season Without Change

Its personnel of 111 players unchanged from last year, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 51st season October 9 in Symphony hall in the first of a total of 107 concerts arranged for Boston and elsewhere which will provide for the orchestra one of the busiest seasons in its career.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will direct the orchestra for the eighth successive season, will return from Europe on the Ile de France, Sept. 29 and will immediately assemble the players in preparation for the season's opening. Mr. Koussevitzky has spent the greater part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his Paris home.

As in other years the orchestra will give 15 concerts in Greater New York, and during the week of October 26 will tour the middle west, making appearances at Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh, and Ithaca.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven (under the auspices of Wellesley college, Smith College, and Yale university), also Hartford and Springfield.

In Boston there will be the usual five series, which with pension fund concerts and young people's concerts, brings a total of 107—as many as the orchestra can undertake in one season. With an advance subscription which has never been larger, there is every promise of a highly successful year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 13 1931

SYMPHONY PROGRAM TALKS TO CONTINUE

Owing to the popularity of the lectures given last winter on the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts, special arrangements have been made with Dr. W. Louis Chapman to continue them this season. Illustrated by music they will be free to the public.

Through the courtesy of the Providence Public Library the lectures will again be given in the children's room of the library the Sunday prior to each concert. They are under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

◆ ◆ ◆

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLANS

With its personnel of 111 players unchanged from the past season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will launch its 51st year with a concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9. A total of 107 concerts makes up the orchestra's schedule for the season, which will be the eighth under Dr. Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky is booked to return to this country on Oct. 29 on the Ile de France and will immediately proceed to assemble his players and start rehearsals. The popular Russian conductor has spent the larger part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his home in Paris. As is his custom it is expected that he will bring a number of new scores with him.

Soon after the start in Boston the orchestra will make a week's tour of the Middle West beginning Oct. 26. Concerts will be given in Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca. There will be 15 concerts in Greater New York, continuing the customary visits which the orchestra has been making since 1886. New England concerts will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in this city on Nov. 17, Dec. 8, Jan. 19 and April 12, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton and New Haven, under the auspices of Wellesley College, Smith College and Yale University, also Hartford and Springfield.

In Boston there will be the usual five series which, with pension fund and young people's concerts, brings a total of 107, as many as the orchestra can undertake in one season. It is reported from Boston that the advance subscriptions have never been larger than for the coming programs, giving promise of a successful year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

SEP 13 1931

A DOUBLE bass is, more often than other instruments, the butt of heavy humor and the object of disrespectful comment. "Bull-fiddle," it is nicknamed, and in theater orchestras players refer to it as a "dog-house."

But it was by means of the double bass that Serge Koussevitzky first entered the world of music in which he is so important a figure. Now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the engagement of which will mark the opening of the concert season here, he was first wonderingly recognized as a virtuoso on this unwieldy instrument.

At the Petrograd Conservatory, where he was a student in the 1880's, every one was required to study some orchestral instrment. Koussevitzky chose the double bass, and evolved his own method of playing it. Under his hands it became an eloquent solo instrument, rather than merely the ground work of the orchestra.

He went about astonishing sophisticated European audiences with the beauty of the tones he could produce from the monster. Forgetting the precepts of his teachers, he drew his solid bow fist-wise across the strings with the subtlety of a great cellist. He was able to evoke the most delicate harmonics.

Under Nikisch at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, he played the first performance of a concerto he had written for double bass. Although he but rarely plays it in public, he has a valuable old Guarnerius near at hand in his Paris or his Boston home.

Commentators say that, just as he accomplished the unexpected with his bulky contra-bass, so he has shown originality and force as an orchestral conductor. The same instinct that made him choose this extraordinary instrument makes him shun routine and welcome the unusual in his repertory. His flnowledge of the tefhnique of stringed instruments has made the string section of the Boston orchestra the miracle that it is today. Columbus had experience, four seasons ago, of his ability to excite an audience by goading his orchestra to a sort of furious eloquence.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which presented Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra in 1928-29, will inaugurate the new season with them on Oct. 29. To follow later on their list are the orchestras from Chicago, Cincinnati, Detroit and Cleveland.

Box office dates will be announced later, but season reservations may be made now with the club's secretary, Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

Contra-bassist turned conductor. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will bring the Boston orchestra to a Symphony Club audience Oct. 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

Sergei Koussevitzky Biography Is to Be Published This Fall

A biography of Sergei Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra who is universally known as one of the foremost apostles of modern music, will soon be brought out by Alfred A. Knopf under the title of "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch." The author is Arthur Lourie, the composer, who has been an intimate friend of Kousevitsky's for 15 years.

The book is announced as not only a biography of Koussevitzky but also a provocative chronicle of the musical life of his time, for he has been the first performer, and frequently the publisher, of important works by such composers as Debussy, Ravel, Dukas, Prokoviev, Stravinsky, Scriabin, Rachmoninoff, Copland, Honegger, Kodaly, and Bartok.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

SEP 12 1931

Boston Orchestra to Leave Europe Soon for New York

Symphony Group Will Open Season Oct. 9; to Play in Ann Arbor

An announcement comes from Boston of the season's plans of Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to visit Ann Arbor in the Choral Union series this coming season.

Serge Koussevitzky will sail from Europe this month on the Ile de France, which is due in New York Sept. 29. He will then assemble the Boston Symphony orchestra to prepare for the opening of its fifty-first season Oct. 9, in Symphony hall. This will be the eighth season under the Russian leader. Dr. Koussevitzky has spent the larger part of the summer in the Austrian Alps, and at his Paris home.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is engaged to make a week's tour of the middle west in the week of Oct. 26. Concerts will be given in Ann Arbor, Buffalo, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh, and Ithaca. There will also be fifteen concerts in greater New York, in continuation of the customary visits which this orchestra has been making since 1886.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven, (under the auspices of Wellesley college, Smith college and Yale university); also Hartford and Springfield.

In Boston, there will be the usual five series, which with Pension Fund concerts, and Young People's concerts, brings a total of 107—as many as the orchestra can undertake in one season. With an advance subscription which has never been larger, there is every promise of a highly successful year.

The personnel, consisting of 111 players, remains unchanged from the fiftieth season just past. Indeed, in constancy of personnel and leadership, no other American orchestra in recent seasons has been so fortunate as this one, it is said.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 20 1931

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

BOSTON, Sept. 15.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins the second half-century and the fifty-first season of its notable career with the pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 9 and 10 in Symphony Hall. October 9 also can be considered as the opening date of Boston's music season, although the United States Navy Band, under Lieutenant Charles Benter, will give two Symphony Hall concerts next Monday. The first 1931-'32 solo recital of importance scheduled for Symphony Hall will be Fritz Kreisler's appearance on October 11.

The Boston Symphony's schedule for the coming season follows familiar lines. The principal home series are the regular twenty-four Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series in Symphony Hall. These are already fully subscribed, although tickets are still available for the two more recently established series of six Monday and six Tuesday concerts. The usual five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon New York concerts in Carnegie Hall are also fully subscribed.

The orchestra will hold a series of six concerts for children, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin. Members of the orchestra will also take part in a special children's series of four concerts conducted by Ernest Schelling.

At the end of October the orchestra will make a fairly extensive tour, playing in Buffalo, Cincinnati, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca. Its New York appearances will include the usual series of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Four concerts will be given in Providence, and the orchestra will also appear during the coming season in New Haven, Hartford, Springfield and Northampton. Nearer home, it will be heard in the long-established Cambridge series at Sanders Theater, Harvard University.

Serge Koussevitzky returns to begin rehearsals for his eighth season with the Boston Symphony in the Isle de France, due Tuesday, September 29, and probably will announce at that time some of the novelties and special features of the new season. In a recent editorial in "The Boston Herald," Philip Hale quoted an interview with the conductor in "Candide," of Paris. "Dr. Koussevitzky said," writes Mr. Hale, "that he purposed in the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform a symphony by Ferroud, works by Florent Schmitt, Stravinsky, Toch, Carpenter and by 'young Martelli, who interests me greatly.' He will repeat performances of Roussel's suite in F and his third symphony. There will be 'monumental works' as Mahler's sixth and ninth symphonies, 'for which the public is now prepared.'

"Have you noticed," the conductor is further quoted as saying, "that serenity has returned? With the close of the war, life changed. Ears again being patient prefer the grand forms to amusing little pieces. Excesses have passed. One is now simpler, more classic." Nothing about Bruckner, notes Mr. Hale, although the conductor is an honorary member of the recently organized Bruckner Society of America.

As usual, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct most of the orchestra's concerts, with the same instrumental personnel as last season. The Boston Symphony has never run to guest conductors for long periods, although Dr. Koussevitzky usually takes a few weeks off in January, when three or four other conductors take charge for single successive weeks. William J. Brennan continues as manager and J. D. Judd as assistant manager. The orchestra is supported by contributions from a large group of patrons, and Mr. Brennan spoke with warm appreciation yesterday of the support thus extended the orchestra by Boston music lovers, despite prevailing conditions.

Besides the activities of the orchestra, a feature of the coming Boston music season will be a double subscription recital series at Symphony Hall. Rosa Ponselle, the Don Cossack Choir, Yehudi Menuhin, Lawrence Tibbett and J. M. Sanroma will be heard in the afternoon series and Lily Pons, John Goss and the London Singers, La Argentina, Walter Gieseking and Roland Hayes will appear in the evening series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 20 1931

The Boston Symphony's Season.

Announcement is made of the concert plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the coming season, which opens at Boston on October 9 when Dr. Koussevitsky will begin the eight year of his American reign. A Western tour, with concerts in Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca will comprise the orchestra's first activities out of Boston and Cambridge, and of course the usual New York series of fifteen concerts, in five groups of three each, will be played.

New England outlanders will have four concerts in Providence, which is a sort of musical suburb of Boston and always has good luck in getting the orchestra; and Wellesley, Smith and Yale are allotted performances. And Hartford and Springfield are the only non-university or large-college centers to be honored!

Once again the wonder at the number of concerts given in Boston comes before one in that the schedule now made calls for one hundred and seven—and this may not include the concerts that come in a special "festival" of the works of some chosen composer, during the Spring season. Last year, it will be remembered, a brilliant Bach Festival was in order, with Brahms honored the year before.

An item regarding the personnel of the orchestra for the coming season seems of unusual interest, for it is said that no changes have been made among the one hundred and eleven players from last season, the orchestra's fiftieth!

It is understood that most of the players are engaged on yearly contracts; and that shifts in personnel have not been made from last season indicates, certainly, that those in authority with the orchestra are satisfied with the artists making up the organization, and that the artists themselves are well satisfied to remain members of a great orchestra under a great conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

SEP 20 1931

Boston Group Due Oct. 29

First of the musical offerings of the fall season by the Symphony Club of central Ohio will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 29, at Memorial Hall. This orchestra comes here close after one of the high lights of its career, its fiftieth anniversary celebration.

The Boston Herald describes the ovation given the orchestra last spring when the anniversary was reached, as follows:

"At the close of the concert the audience that packed the hall expressed its delight in this great music and in the outstanding brilliance of its performances with an enthusiasm more tempestuous than any other demonstration of the kind within recent memory. Dr. Koussevitzky, to whose devotion and enthusiasm the success of the festival just ended was so largely due, was presented with a large wreath by representatives of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, amid a storm of congratulatory noises to which the great throng of singers and players upon the platform added their quota."

The Bach Festival which the Boston orchestra completed in Symphony Hall, Boston, as part of the celebration proved the peak of the anniversary season. The Bach Festival, given on six days, was attended by overflowing audiences.

One evening was devoted to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, and its sole sustainer for 37 years, when an address was delivered by Bliss Perry, his friend and biographer.

The festival included the Mass in B minor, the Magnificat, four cantatas, orchestral concertos and suites, and music for piano, harpsichord and organ. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses and the Bach Cantata Club of Radcliffe performed the choral scores.

Information on the Symphony Club of central Ohio series, and reservations for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and other organizations to be heard in this series, may be obtained from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood Ave.

• • •

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

SEP 20 1931

Last Time Here Was 4 Years Ago

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give a concert in the Masonic Auditorium on Wednesday evening, October 28. This will mark the first appearance of the great orchestra in Detroit under Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian leader, in four years, the orchestra having last visited this city on Nov. 2, 1927.

This concert will be one of the limited number which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to give outside of Boston each season, being part of a week's tour which is also to include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Columbus, Pittsburgh, and Ithaca. The season, which is to be the 51st of the Orchestra, will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

Fiftieth Anniversary

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will round out next month the first half century of its existence. The 50th anniversary season celebrated last year has proved one of the most momentous in the Orchestra's history. It included the first performance of a number of significant scores especially composed for the occasion by foremost living composers, including Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Respighi, Roussel, Hill, Copland, Honegger and Hindemith.

A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital, and a Bach Festival was given in Boston last March in special honor to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the Orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for 37 years.

Koussevitsky Again

Serge Koussevitzky will sail from Europe in the last week of this month and assemble the Orchestra in Boston on Oct. 1 for the season's opening. This will be the eighth season under the Russian leader who has brought the organization a new fame, in many ways exceeding even its illustrious past.

* * *

THE PERSONNEL, consisting of 111 players, remains unchanged from the fiftieth season, just past. Indeed, in constancy of personnel and leadership, no other American orchestra in recent seasons has been so fortunate as this one.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

SEP 2 1931

Back of Koussevitzky

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, which is being brought to Columbus Oct. 29 as the first of the five offerings this season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, with a triumphant series of musical events last spring, finished its fiftieth year as a Boston institution.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what became to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. He has won a greatly enlarged public.

Information as to the entire Symphony club series and reservations for the Boston Symphony orchestra appearance here may be obtained from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N.Y. HERALD

Koussevitzky in New York Today

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returns here this morning in the Ile de France and will leave immediately for Boston with William H. Brennan, manager of the orchestra, which begins its fifty-first season and its eighth under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction on October 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

SEP 27 1931

PLANS OF FOUR ORCHESTRAS

FOUR out-of-town orchestras, two of which customarily visit New York, have announced the plans of their respective seasons.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently discussed with a representative of THE NEW YORK TIMES in Paris the make-up of his programs for the new season. They will emphasize the classics more than formerly, while including as usual many new works. In view of Mr. Koussevitsky's consistent crusading in the field of contemporary composition, his comment was particularly interesting.

"I have changed my idea of modern music," he said in part. "I think the period of experimentation is no more. During the past seven years I have devoted much of my time and energy to new compositions. Now . . . our outlook is much clearer . . . a great number of works highly appreciated a few years ago have completely disappeared. It seems to me we have reached a definite stage in the twentieth century music. A slow but definite selection is becoming apparent and I feel it is our duty to cooperate toward its achievement to the best of our ability, for the sake of the art of music. I do not wish to say that we must not play new compositions, but it is necessary to appreciate what we must play and what we must not. Composers like Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Hindemith, and Honegger are already 'classified'; their works can not any longer be considered new music; they are almost classics for us."

It need not be inferred from the above, however, that Mr. Koussevitsky has regressed from his position as a champion of new works. The orchestra's programs for the forthcoming season prove the contrary. They will present world premières of the following: Sibelius' Eighth Symphony, Rachmaninoff's "Etudes-Tableaux" orchestrated by Respighi, Arnold Bax's piano concerto, Aaron Copland's "Symphony-Ode," Anton Webern's "Six Little Pieces for Great Orchestra," Martelli's "Concerto Grosso," Ernest Toch's "Suite," Florent Schmitt's piano concerto with the composer as soloist, Philip Lazar's "Concerto Grosso No. 2," and Lambert's Music for Orchestra. There will also be Haydn, Mozart and two Stravinsky festivals and an all-American program.

Vladimir Golschmann, who begins his first season as conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, will give the following works their first American hearing: Nabakoff's "Ouverture Symphonique," Alexander Tansman's "Tryptique" for string orchestra, and Marcel Mihalovici's "Cortège des Divinités Inferales." Gabrilowitsch, Myra Hess, Adolf Busch, Albert Spalding and others will appear as soloists with the orchestra.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra is facing a crisis in its financial life which may determine whether or not the organization is to continue, according to an article by George A. Leighton in the Cincinnati Enquirer. Mr. Leighton says that funds subscribed several years ago to support the orchestra have not all been paid in owing to hard times, and that the orchestra's continuance virtually rests upon the success of the subscribed seat sale of this season as an index of actual popular support. He even advocates that other music clubs, study circles, etc., which usually bring out-of-town artists for concerts, "declare a holiday on personally conducted series" and transfer their energy and money to the cause of the orchestra.

The Cleveland Orchestra will open its season on Oct. 8 under its conductor, Nikolai Sokoloff. Rachmaninoff and Georges Enesco will be among the soloists, the latter conducting a work of his own. During Mr. Sokoloff's mid-season absence Bernardino Molinari will conduct.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 20 1931

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in October will round out the first half century of its existence. The 50th anniversary season, celebrated last year, has proved one of the most momentous in the orchestra's history. It included the first performance of a number of significant scores especially composed for the occasion by foremost living composers, including Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Respighi, Roussel, Hill, Copland, Honegger and Hindemith. A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital, and a Bach Festival was given in Boston last March in special honor to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for 37 years.

A biography of Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, perhaps the foremost apostle of modern music, will soon be brought out by Alfred A. Knopf under the title of "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch." The author is Arthur Lourie, the composer, who has been an intimate friend of Koussevitzky for 15 years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

Volga Boatman

INDEPENDENT wealth gave Serge Koussevitzky opportunity to develop himself as an orchestral conductor such as few other men have had.

Following his student work at the Petrograd Conservatory and his sensational success as a double bass virtuoso, he organized an orchestra of his own in the Russian capital where, as well as in Moscow, he gave classical festivals, choral concerts and series which advanced the cause of modern Russian music, to which he has always been very sympathetic.

Then came a series of fantastic exploits—summer voyages 2000 miles up the Volga, with pauses in this village and that with his orchestra to agitate the peasantry with Scriabin and Beethoven.

From 1917 to 1920 Koussevitzky acted as director of the subsidized State Orchestras, but things did not go smoothly, for he was not in the least in sympathy with the Communist movement. He moved westward and, with a series of "concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris and London, impressed himself upon the musical consciousness of those capitals.

A "Ninth Symphony" in London caused the sagacious Ernest Newman to say that he played it "as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man."

The reputation of the eloquent Russian was such, even before he set sail for his first American season, that concert series, both in Boston and in New York, were subscribed to the last seat, a thing which had never happened before.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the season of the Symphony Club of central Ohio, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Memorial Hall, Oct. 29. It is the first of a series of five orchestral concerts, for which season subscriptions may be had of Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER RETURNS

NEW YORK, Sept. 29 (AP) Serge Koussevitsky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mrs. Kousevitsky, returned today on the Ile da France. The conductor refused to discuss his plans or his trip abroad, saying he would make no statement until he reached Boston.

Walter Edge, son of the United States ambassador to France; Monsignor John Mark Gannon, Bishop of Erie, Pa.; Samuel Insull, public utilities magnate of Chicago; Rosa Ponselle and Leonia Corona of the Metropolitan Opera Co., were other passengers.

6

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Standard Unio

SEP 21 1931

BUSCH WITH SIX ORCHESTRAS

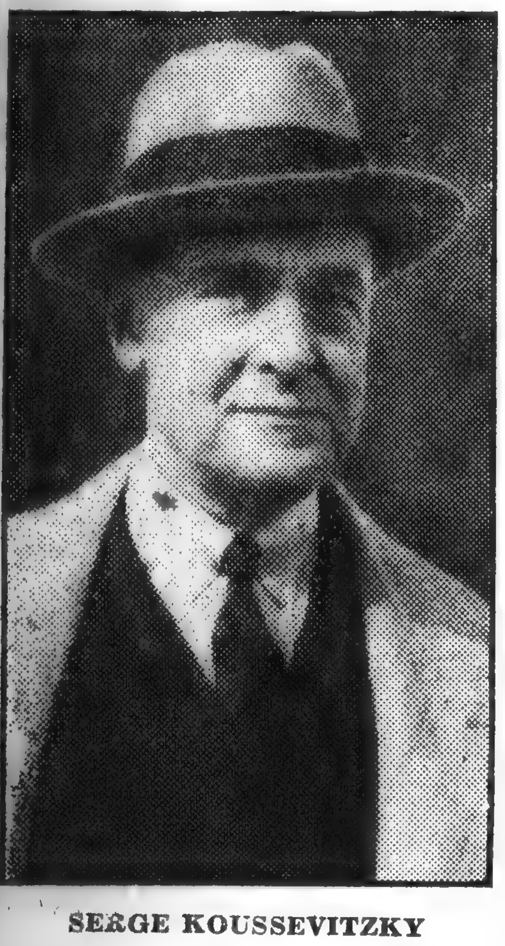
Due to the pressure of his European engagements, Adolf Busch's first American tour will be limited to five weeks, in the course of which he will make sixteen appearances with six different orchestras. On November 13 and 14 he makes his debut in this country playing with the Boston Symphony. On November 19 and 20 he appears with the Detroit Symphony. On November 26 and 27 he will be heard under the baton of Arturo Toscanini at Carnegie Hall with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and on December 14, 15 and 16 he will play on tour with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore respectively. On December 3 and 4 he will be soloist with the Minneapolis Symphony; on December 8, 10 and 11 with the Chicago Symphony, and on December 18 and 19 with the St. Louis Symphony.

Adolf Busch is the first soloist, with the exception of Alexander Siloti, to appear with Mr. Toscanini, except for artists participating in special works requiring vocal assistance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

SEP 27 1931

On Way to U. S.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will arrive in New York on the Ile de France Tuesday. He will go directly to Boston and assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal on October 1st for the season's opening on October 9th.

The orchestra will play in the Elmwood Music Hall, Buffalo, Monday night, October 26th, under auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, Inc.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 27 1931

"La Valse" Recordings.

By one of the chances that happen about once every so often the next dip into the heap of records brings out a duplication. Both Brunswick and Victor have sent out recordings of Ravel's "La Valse." Brunswick's is from the Lamoureux orchestra of Paris with Albert Wolff as conductor, Hall of Fame-International, 90186 and 90187; Victor's by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Red Seal 7413 and 7414.

There is no intention of starting trouble with Brunswick in saying that the Victor version of this piece is somewhat the better. To begin, the recording is rather clearer. Then, too, Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation is more dramatic. Ravel's symphonic treatment of a Viennese waltz is quite likely to turn into unrelieved gloom unless the conductor is on his guard, as Mr. Koussevitzky has been in this instance. Finally, the Brunswick version is so divided as to need four sides for its performance, while Victor has economized space to the extent of getting the whole work upon three, the fourth being devoted to Debussy's charming "Danse" in the Ravel orchestration, also played by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The added number is an added reason for owning the set. Columbia, No. G [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD

Dr. Koussevitzky Arrives to Open Eighth Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Plans to Offer New Scores

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned here yesterday afternoon on the Ile de France to begin his eighth season with this organization, which is entering its second half century.

The conductor named several new scores, both American and European, which he plans to offer in Boston during the coming season, but placed less importance upon the element of novelty in his programs than upon the presentation of good and interesting music. He noted a stabilizing of musical tastes after a period of "storm and stress," and spoke of the desirability of offering great music of the past not often played, as well as music by contemporaries who are known to be good composers. Among music in the former category, he considered that it was time for the performance of more of the works of Mahler and Bruckner. He plans to offer two symphonies by each of these composers on his Boston programs, Bruckner's third and eighth symphonies and the sixth and ninth symphonies of Mahler.

Dr. Koussevitzky spoke warmly in praise of two American works which he is planning to offer this season, a piano concerto by Harold Morris, with the composer as soloist, and a symphony by Aaron Copland. Both composers are residents of New York, and the latter is well known as a modernist among the younger generation of American musicians.

Pierre Octave Ferroud, a French composer whose "Foules" was played here by the Philharmonic under Mengelberg in 1927, will be represented by a symphony. Another new symphony to be heard in Boston is by the Russian composer, Arthur Lourie, whose principal work heard here thus far was a "Concerto Spirituale" which received its world premiere in 1930 in a concert of the Schola Cantorum under Hugh Ross. Since settling in Paris in 1923, Lourie, according to Mr. Ross, has striven to perfect "a form of expression which tends towards a modern religious art."

Dr. Koussevitzky also will present the first American performance of Stravinsky's new violin concerto. The soloist will be Samuel Dushkin, who has the performing rights for this work for eighteen months. Among choral works to be heard in the Boston season are Mozart's Requiem, Bach's B minor Mass and Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue."

The conductor was met at the pier by William H. Brennan and G. E. Judd, manager and assistant manager of the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Brennan will go this morning to Boston, where the symphony season opens on October 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP

Koussevitzky Returns

Koussevitzky the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises. The Symphony's great leader exerts a stimulating effect which a trafficker in hyperbole might almost liken to that of the ultra-violet ray. Occasionally it shocks, it may even burn—for it embodies an energy at high tension—but for the most part its influence is strengthening and therapeutic. This could not be so, of course, were the conductor merely a remarkable individualist, as undoubtedly he is. The wealth of his resource finds its broader explanation in the excellence of the orchestra itself, and, beyond that, in the inherited fund of the Western World's greatest music—a fund to which the masters of many centuries have contributed.

The restful and spiritually strengthening service of noble music Koussevitzky himself recognized in the remarks he made yesterday, at the moment of his return from abroad. "Music is like religion," he said, "a comfort and joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are the more they crave music." We believe this is so, and welcome the approach of the new Symphony season both for the stimulus it will give and the restoring power of its tranquillities and of its moments of musical majesty.

COLUMBUS CITIZEN

SEP. 8

A DOUBLE bass is, more often than other instruments, the butt of heavy humor and the object of disrespectful comment. "Bull-fiddle," it is nicknamed, and in theater orchestras players refer to it as a "dog-house."

But it was by means of the double bass that Serge Koussevitzky first entered the world of music in which he is so important a figure. Now conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the engagement of which will mark the opening of the concert season here, he was first wonderingly recognized as a virtuoso on this unwieldy instrument.

At the Petrograd Conservatory, where he was a student in the 1880's, every one was required to study some orchestral instrment. Koussevitzky chose the double bass, and evolved his own method of playing it. Under his hands it became an eloquent solo instrument, rather than merely the ground work of the orchestra.

He went about astonishing sophisticated European audiences with the beauty of the tones he could produce from the monster. Forgetting the precepts of his teachers, he drew his solid bow fist-wise across the strings with the subtlety of a great cellist. He was able to evoke the most delicate harmonics.

Under Nikisch at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, he played the first performance of a concerto he had written for double bass. Although he but rarely plays it in public, he has a valuable old Guarnerius near at hand in his Paris or his Boston home.

Commentators say that, just as he accomplished the unexpected with his bulky contra-bass, so he has shown originality and force as an orchestral conductor. The same instinct that made him choose this extraordinary instrument makes him shun routine and welcome the unusual in his repertory. His finowledge of the tefhnique of stringed instruments has made the string section of the Boston orchestra the miracle that it is today. Columbus had experience, four seasons ago, of his ability to excite an audience by goading his orchestra to a sort of furious eloquence.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which presented Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra in 1928-29, will inaugurate the new season with them on Oct. 29. To follow later on their list are the orchestras from Chicago, Cincinnati, Detroit and Cleveland.

Box office dates will be announced later, but season reservations may be made now with the club's secretary, Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

Contra-bassist turned conductor. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will bring the Boston orchestra to a Symphony Club audience Oct. 29.

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS HERE

Says People Crave Good Music in Hard Times

Post Sept. 30

NEW YORK, Sept. 29—The much talked of depression both here and abroad cannot possibly have any ill effects on the desire of people to hear good music, it was declared by Serge Koussevitzky on his arrival here late this afternoon with his wife aboard the S. S. Ile de France, returning to Boston to inaugurate his eighth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Music is just like religion," the famous musician said. "Music—good music—is a great comfort and joy when people are depressed and this depression will have no ill effect on it. Sometimes it is just the opposite—the more depressed people are, the more they crave music."

As proof of this statement Mr. Koussevitzky pointed out that every ticket for his orchestra's concerts in Boston and New York has been sold. "During the crossing many people asked me how they might buy tickets for the concerts, but I was forced to tell them there was none available," he said.

The first pair of concerts, the conductor stated, will be given Oct. 9 and 10 and will be followed by alternating pairs each week until the beginning of May. Once a month the orchestra will come to New York, he said.

SYMPHONY SEASON WILL OPEN OCT. 9

Koussevitzky Returns from Europe Sept. 29

Herald

Its personnel of 111 players unchanged from last year, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 51st season Oct. 9 in Symphony hall in the first of a total of 107 concerts arranged for Boston and elsewhere which will provide for the orchestra one of the busiest seasons in its career.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will direct the orchestra for the eighth successive season, will return from Europe on the Ile de France Sept. 29 and will immediately assemble the players in preparation for the season's opening. Mr. Koussevitzky has spent the greater part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his Paris home.

As in other years the orchestra will give 15 concerts in Greater New York, and during the week of Oct. 26 will tour the middle West, making appearances at Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven (under the auspices of Wellesley College, Smith College and Yale University), also Hartford and Springfield.

In Boston there will be the usual five series, which with pension fund concerts and young people's concerts, brings a total of 107—as many as the orchestra can undertake in one season. With an advance subscription which has never been larger, there is every promise of a highly successful year.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS FROM ABROAD

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived in New York yesterday afternoon with Mrs. Koussevitzky aboard the Ile de France, was expected to come directly to Boston late last night or this morning. The new address to which the famous conductor and his wife are to go on their arrival is 88 Druce road, in the Fisher hill section of Brookline. The Koussevitzkys have been abroad since last May.

Herald Sept 30

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK FOR EIGHTH SEASON

Promises Boston People Good Music

Globe Sept. 30

Special Dispatch to the Globe

NEW YORK, Sept 29—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last seven seasons, returned to this country on board the French liner Ile de France today ready and eager to wield his baton at the opening of his eighth season as director of the famous organization. He was accompanied by Mme Koussevitzky.

"I cannot tell you how happy I am to be returning to Boston to renew my work among my old friends," he told the Globe correspondent who met the liner at quarantine to greet the famed musician. He cannot yet reveal all his plans for the coming season, he declared, since he has not completed the selection of his programs. "But the people of Boston will have good music," he exclaimed. "Not just music, but good music."

Favorite works, including those of Carpenter, Ferroud, Martelli and Florent Smith, will be on the concert programs this season, the conductor said, as well as a number of symphonic poems, which he declined to name.

While abroad, Dr Koussevitzky revealed, he wrote some music which will be played by the phony this season, but describe its nature. "I'm [illegible] as a secret," he explained.

Also to be performed are the works of several little-known American composers whose efforts have favorably impressed the conductor. "I am always ready to give young musicians a chance to show their ability and this year I hope to present the best from among them," he declared.

© Bachrach

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Dr Koussevitzky is perhaps the only returning traveler who finds the present economic depression doing some good—and that, he declared, was an increased desire for good music.

"Music is just like religion," he explained. "Good music is a great comfort and joy when people are depressed. This present depression can have no ill-effect on it. The more depressed people are the more they crave music."

And as proof the conductor pointed to the highly successful sale of tickets for the Boston orchestra's concerts in that city and in New York.

"During the crossing many asked me where they could obtain tickets for the concerts, but I was forced to tell them there were none available."

The concerts, he said, begin Oct 9 and 10 and are to be followed by alternating pairs each week until the early part of May. The orchestra will be heard in New York once a month.

During his visit abroad Dr Koussevitzky spent a month in Paris and another in Bad Gastein, Austria, where he rested and composed music. He received an invitation to attend the International Music Festival at Oxford, but was unable to do so, he said. He remarked that the DuKelsky Symphony, introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, was played at the festival.

Dr Koussevitzky was met at the pier by W. H. Brennan, director of the orchestra. With his entourage, including a secretary, valet and maid, he left with Mr Brennan for Boston shortly after disembarking.

COLUMBUS DISPATCH SEP 20

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 30 1931

Dr. Koussevitzky Back for Season

Symphony Orchestra Leader in New York Outlines His Plans

New York, Sept. 30—"I have been to Europe, yes?—and it is terrible—heart breaking." But I have come back to America, yes, to Boston, and I am glad, for America is the hope of the whole world today." Such was the greeting given to a correspondent on shipboard by Serge Koussevitsky, world famous symphonic conductor, eminent virtuoso on the bass violin and the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitsky stood in the shadow of his two precious instruments, which he always takes with him on extended journeys. Around him were clustered his entourage, Mrs. Koussevitsky, his manager, Mr. W. H. Brennan, and his servants, a valet and a maid. As he talked, the correspondent learned that he was indeed happy to be able to return to Boston, that he had gathered in his trip abroad many unusual compositions which he intended to play during the coming season and that, and here his voice lowered mysteriously, he had even composed something new himself, something which had occupied most of his time..

But what it was, ah; that he reserved for the Boston audience, his audience. They would have the pleasure of learning it from him personally, when he returned to their city. "It is my city too now," he said.

According to Dr. Koussevitsky, there will be a greater musical season in America this winter than ever before, despite the depression. "Americans are a great musical race," he said, "they must have music to match their moods. Are they sad about their unemployment? very well, then I will play them happy music, music that will make them think of other things, that will lift them away from business, music by our great and modern Americans, by Gershwin, by Copland, ah, there are two young Americans who will go far. They are so expressionistically modern. They feel the spirit of our day, they are experimental, they do not do always the expected but the novel and it is beautiful. I consider George Gershwin has great talent and is typically American."

Among the selections which Dr. Koussevitsky will play during his fall and winter concert season, which begins on Oct. 9 and 10, will be a new symphony by Copland and another by the Russ'an, Arthur Lurie. Both are in one movement. In addition many favorite works popular in previous seasons will be played, among them the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Franck, Mozart. Already, according to his manager, Mr. Brennan, the concerts have been oversubscribed, as have those which he will give monthly in New York.

DR. KOUSSEVITZY is the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which the Symphony club presents Oct. 29. Tibbett, outstanding baritone, will be offered by the Women's Music club, Nov. 13, on tour between movie and operatic engagements. Miss Sands, teacher of dancing, has removed her studio

---

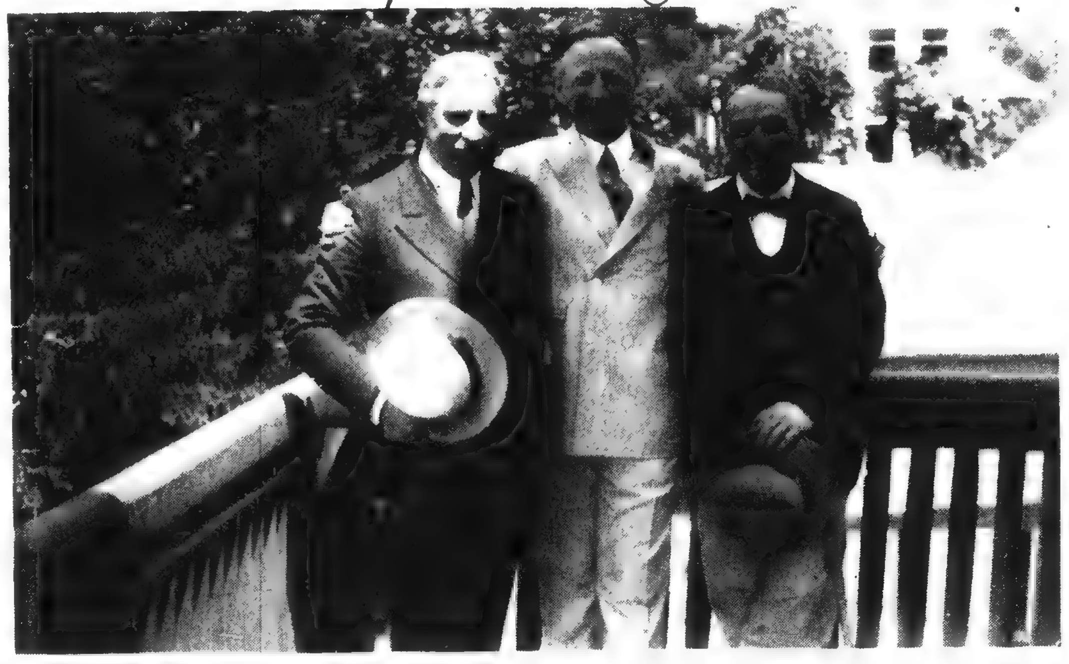
Back of Koussevitzky

THE Boston Symphony ochestra, which is being brought to Columbus Oct. 29 as the first of the five offerings this season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, with a triumphant series of musical events last spring, finished its fiftieth year as a Boston institution.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what became to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. He has won a greatly enlarged public.

Information as to the entire Symphony club series and reservations for the Boston Symphony orchestra appearance here may be obtained from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

Musical Digest Sept Oct '31



Detroit reaches out a friendly hand to both Boston and Chicago, as three distinguished gentlemen of the bâton meet in Switzerland: Ossip Gabrilowitsch (center), Detroit Orchestra leader, with Frederick Stock, Windy City conductor (left), and Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony

---

Gabrilowitsch a Conductor? No, Sir, He's a DIRECTOR

DETROIT NEWS SEP 27

By CLIFFORD EPSTEIN.

When the Detroit Symphony Orchestra assembles Monday in Orchestra Hall for its first rehearsal, it will not be under Ossip Gabrilowitsch as conductor.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch.

For as conductor of the orchestra, or any orchestra, for that matter, Ossip Gabrilowitsch no longer exists. The effacement of Conductor Gabrilowitsch was announced Saturday by Mr. Gabrilowitsch himself. And to Conductor Gabrilowitsch succeeds Director Gabrilowitsch.

When patrons of the orchestra examine the printed programs this season, they will note that Mr. Gabrilowitsch is referred to as director, and Victor Kolar as associate director.

"There is no greater inaccuracy," Mr. Gabrilowitsch said Saturday, "than to refer to the leader of a symphony orchestra as its conductor. Where does he conduct it? How can he conduct a concert? The leader directs the orchestra."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch pointed out that in Italy the leader of an orchestra is designated as the maestro direttore e concertatore. In Germany he is known as the dirigent; in France as the chef d'orchestre, and in Russia as the dirigeur.

IT RANKLED.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch admitted Saturday that this conductor business has been rankling in his breast for many months. Last season, it just come out, he took the matter up with Leopold Stokowski, conductor, or rather director, of the Philadelphia Orchestra. (At that time Stokowski was conductor of the orchestra, so it is no anachronism to refer to him as such.)

Mr. Stokowski.

"In my opinion," Mr. Gabrilowitsch wrote to Mr. Stokowski at that time, "the word 'conductor' used in the English language for the leader of an orchestra is ridiculous. It ought to disappear from the vocabulary.

"Only in the English language has the orchestra leader a name which immediately suggests a street car conductor and gives occasion to all sorts of cheap jokes."

And so, in the latest prospectus of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the name of Leopold Stokowski appears as "musical director." But the list of guest leaders for the coming season appears under the heading "Conductors." And in that list is repeated the name of Stokowski.

"How do you explain that?" Mr. Gabrilowitsch was asked.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch seemed nonplussed. In fact, he was nonplussed.

"There is no explanation for that," he said, sadly, "except that it shows how an old habit will cling to a person."

During the summer, Mr. Gabrilowitsch said, he met a number of distinguished musicians at some baths in Switzerland frequented particularly by orchestra leaders, who go there in search of relief from neuralgic pains that frequently assail their baton arms.

Mr. Koussevitzky.

"There I met Serge Koussevitzy, of the Boston Orchestra, and Frederick Stock, of Chicago, and several other well-known conductors," he said.

"Several other well-known what?"

Mr. Gabrilowitsch smiled apologetically.

"There you are," he said. "Habit. Even I have it. Well, Koussevitzky and Stock and the others quite agreed with me when I suggested that the word 'conductor' must go. But I realize how hard it is for the public to accept something new. People will have to learn to refer to an orchestra leader as a director, just as they have to learn to swallow raw eggs. And I found it hard myself to do that."

Last Time Here Was 4 Years Ago

DETROIT TIMES SEP 20

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give a concert in the Masonic Auditorium on Wednesday evening, October 28. This will mark the first appearance of the great orchestra in Detroit under Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian leader, in four years, the orchestra having last visited this city on Nov. 2, 1927.

This concert will be one of the limited number which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to give outside of Boston each season, being part of a week's tour which is also to include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Columbus, Pittsburgh, and Ithaca. The season, which is to be the 51st of the Orchestra, will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

Fiftieth Anniversary

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will round out next month the first half century of its existence. The 50th anniversary season celebrated last year has proved one of the most momentous in the Orchestra's history. It included the first performance of a number of significant scores especially composed for the occasion by foremost living composers, including Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Respighi, Roussel, Hill, Copland, Honegger and Hindemith.

A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital, and a Bach Festival was given in Boston last March in special honor to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the Orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for 37 years.

Koussevitsky Again

Serge Koussevitzky will sail from Europe in the last week of this month and assemble the Orchestra in Boston on Oct. 1 for the season's opening. This will be the eighth season under the Russian leader who has brought the organization a new fame, in many ways exceeding even its illustrious past.

* * *

THE PERSONNEL, consisting of 111 players, remains unchanged from the fiftieth season, just past. Indeed, in constancy of personnel and leadership, no other American orchestra in recent seasons has been so fortunate as this one.

Boston Transcript

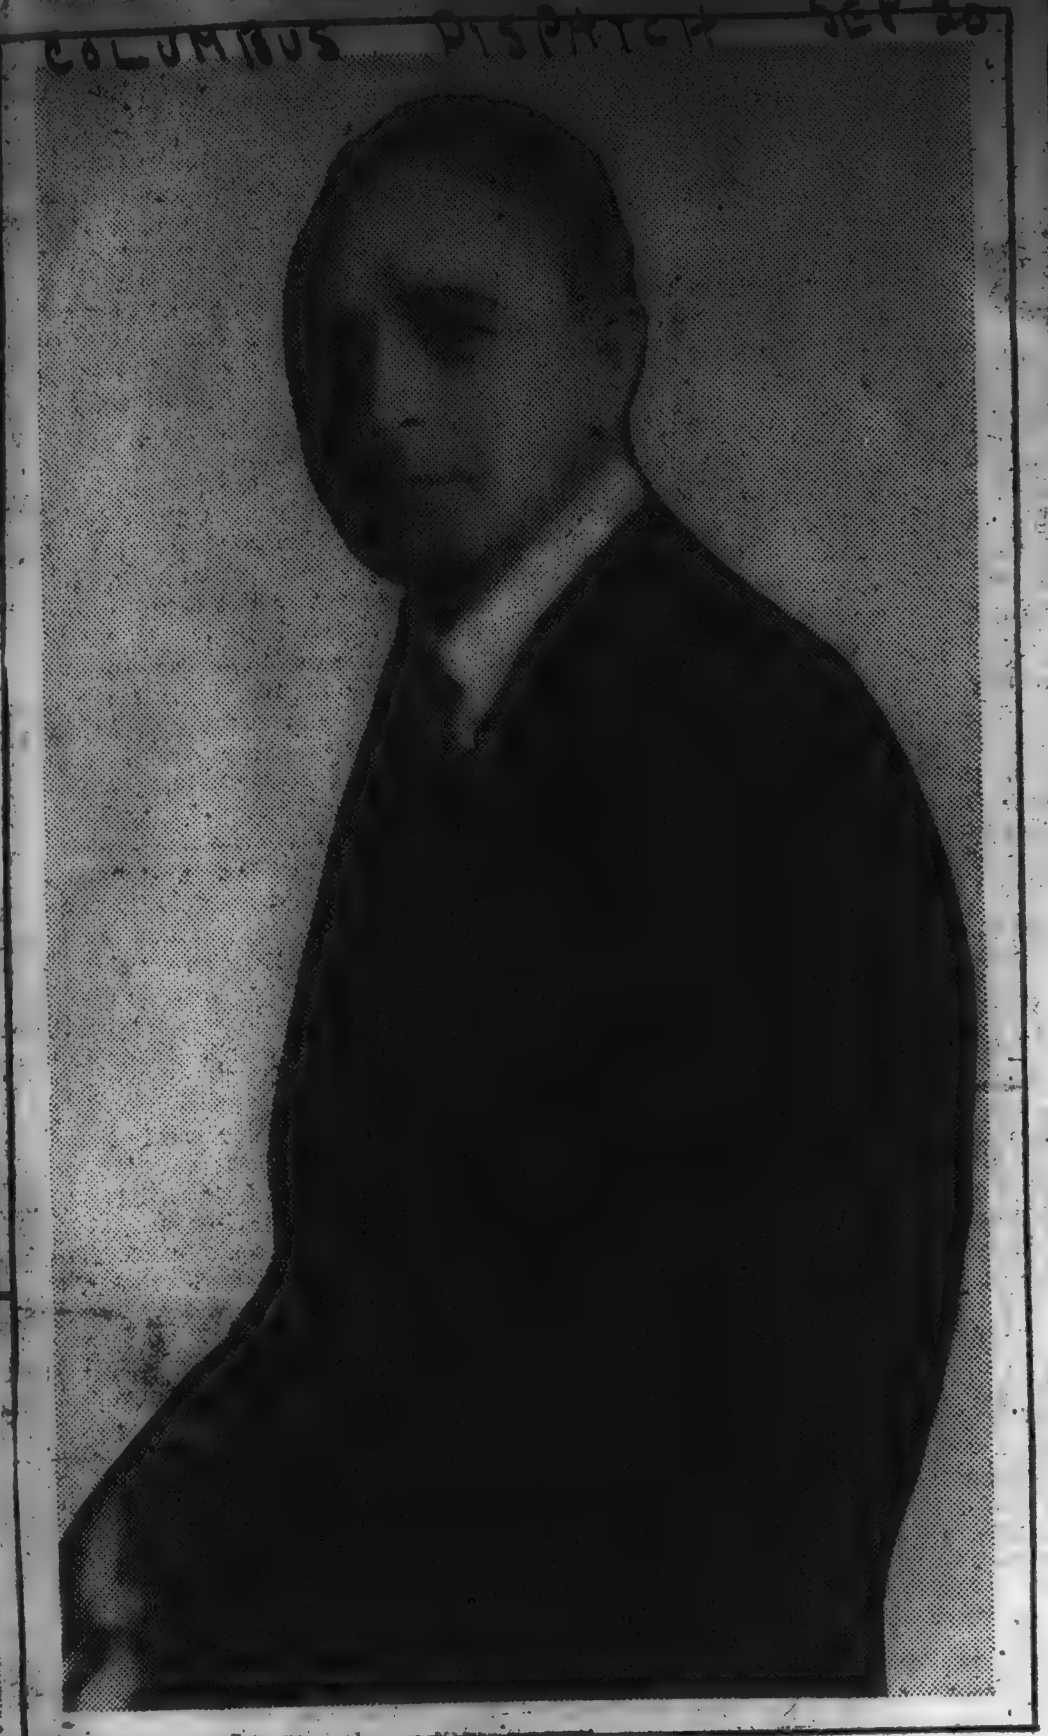
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1931

Koussevitzky Returns

Koussevitzky the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises. The Symphony's great leader exerts a stimulating effect which a trafficker in hyperbole might almost liken to that of the ultra-violet ray. Occasionally it shocks, it may even burn—for it embodies an energy at high tension—but for the most part its influence is strengthening and therapeutic. This could not be so, of course, were the conductor merely a remarkable individualist, as undoubtedly he is. The wealth of his resource finds its broader explanation in the excellence of the orchestra itself, and, beyond that, in the inherited fund of the Western World's greatest music—a fund to which the masters of many centuries have contributed.

The restful and spiritually strengthening service of noble music Koussevitzky himself recognized in the remarks he made yesterday, at the moment of his return from abroad. "Music is like religion," he said, "a comfort and joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are the more they crave music." We believe this is so, and welcome the approach of the new Symphony season both for the stimulus it will give and the restoring power of its tranquillities and of its moments of musical majesty.

COLUMBUS DISPATCH SEP 30



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 30 1931

Dr. Koussevitzky Back for Season

Symphony Orchestra Leader in New York Outlines His Plans

New York, Sept. 30—"I have been to Europe, yes?—and it is terrible—heart breaking." But I have come back to America, yes, to Boston, and I am glad, for America is the hope of the whole world today." Such was the greeting given to a correspondent on shipboard by Serge Koussevitsky, world famous symphonic conductor, eminent virtuoso on the bass violin and the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitsky stood in the shadow of his two precious instruments, which he always takes with him on extended journeys. Around him were clustered his entourage, Mrs. Koussevitsky, his manager, Mr. W. H. Brennan, and his servants, a valet and a maid. As he talked, the correspondent learned that he was indeed happy to be able to return to Boston, that he had gathered in his trip abroad many unusual compositions which he intended to play during the coming season and that, and here his voice lowered mysteriously, he had even composed something new himself, something which had occupied most of his time..

But what it was, ah, that he reserved for the Boston audience, his audience. They would have the pleasure of learning it from him personally, when he returned to their city. "It is my city too now," he said.

According to Dr. Koussevitsky, there will be a greater musical season in America this winter than ever before, despite the depression. "Americans are a great musical race," he said, "they must have music to match their moods. Are they sad about their unemployment? very well, then I will play them happy music. music that will make them think of other things, that will lift them away from business, music by our great and modern Americans, by Gershwin, by Copland, ah, there are two young Americans who will go far. They are so expressionistically modern. They feel the spirit of our day, they are experimental, they do not do always the expected but the novel and it is beautiful. I consider George Gershwin has great talent and is typically American."

Among the selections which Dr. Koussevitsky will play during his fall and winter concert season, which begins on Oct. 9 and 10, will be a new symphony by Copland and another by the Russ'an, Arthur Lurie. Both are in one movement. In addition many favorite works popular in previous seasons will be played, among them the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Franck, Mozart. Already, according to his manager, Mr. Brennan, the concerts have been oversubscribed, as have those which he will give monthly in New York.

DR. KOUSSEVITZY is the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which the Symphony club presents Oct. 29. Tibbett, outstanding baritone, will be offered by the Women's Music club, Nov. 13, on tour between movie and operatic engagements. Miss Sands, teacher of dancing, has removed her studio

---

Back of Koussevitzky

THE Boston Symphony ochestra, which is being brought to Columbus Oct. 29 as the first of the five offerings this season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, with a triumphant series of musical events last spring, finished its fiftieth year as a Boston institution.

George Henschel first established the orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled it into what became to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony hall, the orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his term in 1924. He has won a greatly enlarged public.

Information as to the entire Symphony club series and reservations for the Boston Symphony orchestra appearance here may be obtained from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

Musical Digest Sept Oct '31

Detroit reaches out a friendly hand to both Boston and Chicago, as three distinguished gentlemen of the bâton meet in Switzerland: Ossip Gabrilowitsch (center), Detroit Orchestra leader, with Frederick Stock, Windy City conductor (left), and Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony

---

Gabrilowitsch a Conductor? No, Sir, He's a DIRECTOR

DETROIT NEWS SEP 27

By CLIFFORD EPSTEIN.

When the Detroit Symphony Orchestra assembles Monday in Orchestra Hall for its first rehearsal, it will not be under Ossip Gabrilowitsch as conductor.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch.

For as conductor of the orchestra, or any orchestra, for that matter, Ossip Gabrilowitsch no longer exists. The effacement of Conductor Gabrilowitsch was announced Saturday by Mr. Gabrilowitsch himself. And to Conductor Gabrilowitsch succeeds Director Gabrilowitsch.

When patrons of the orchestra examine the printed programs this season, they will note that Mr. Gabrilowitsch is referred to as director, and Victor Kolar as associate director.

"There is no greater inaccuracy," Mr. Gabrilowitsch said Saturday, "than to refer to the leader of a symphony orchestra as its conductor. Where does he conduct it? How can he conduct a concert? The leader directs the orchestra."

Mr. Gabrilowitsch pointed out that in Italy the leader of an orchestra is designated as the maestro direttore e concertatore. In Germany he is known as the dirigent; in France as the chef d'orchestre, and in Russia as the dirigeur.

IT RANKLED.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch admitted Saturday that this conductor business has been rankling in his breast for many months. Last season, it just come out, he took the matter up with Leopold Stokowski, conductor, or rather director, of the Philadelphia Orchestra. (At that time Stokowski was conductor of the orchestra, so it is no anachronism to refer to him as such.)

Mr. Stokowski.

"In my opinion," Mr. Gabrilowitsch wrote to Mr. Stokowski at that time, "the word 'conductor' used in the English language for the leader of an orchestra is ridiculous. It ought to disappear from the vocabulary.

"Only in the English language has the orchestra leader a name which immediately suggests a street car conductor and gives occasion to all sorts of cheap jokes."

And so, in the latest prospectus of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the name of Leopold Stokowski appears as "musical director." But the list of guest leaders for the coming season appears under the heading "Conductors." And in that list is repeated the name of Stokowski.

"How do you explain that?" Mr. Gabrilowitsch was asked.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch seemed nonplussed. In fact, he was nonplussed.

"There is no explanation for that," he said, sadly, "except that it shows how an old habit will cling to a person."

During the summer, Mr. Gabrilowitsch said, he met a number of distinguished musicians at some baths in Switzerland frequented particularly by orchestra leaders, who go there in search of relief from neuralgic pains that frequently assail their baton arms.

Mr. Koussevitzky.

"There I met Serge Koussevitzy, of the Boston Orchestra, and Frederick Stock, of Chicago, and several other well-known conductors," he said.

"Several other well-known what?"

Mr. Gabrilowitsch smiled apologetically.

"There you are," he said. "Habit. Even I have it. Well, Koussevitzky and Stock and the others quite agreed with me when I suggested that the word 'conductor' must go. But I realize how hard it is for the public to accept something new. People will have to learn to refer to an orchestra leader as a director, just as they have to learn to swallow raw eggs. And I found it hard myself to do that."

DETROIT TIMES SEP 30

Last Time Here Was 4 Years Ago

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give a concert in the Masonic Auditorium on Wednesday evening, October 28. This will mark the first appearance of the great orchestra in Detroit under Serge Koussevitzky, its Russian leader, in four years, the orchestra having last visited this city on Nov. 2, 1927.

This concert will be one of the limited number which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to give outside of Boston each season, being part of a week's tour which is also to include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Columbus, Pittsburgh, and Ithaca. The season, which is to be the 51st of the Orchestra, will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 9.

Fiftieth Anniversary

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will round out next month the first half century of its existence. The 50th anniversary season celebrated last year has proved one of the most momentous in the Orchestra's history. It included the first performance of a number of significant scores especially composed for the occasion by foremost living composers, including Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Respighi, Roussel, Hill, Copland, Honegger and Hindemith.

A Beethoven Festival was given in the nation's capital, and a Bach Festival was given in Boston last March in special honor to the memory of Henry L. Higginson, the Orchestra's founder and sole sustainer for 37 years.

Koussevitsky Again

Serge Koussevitzky will sail from Europe in the last week of this month and assemble the Orchestra in Boston on Oct. 1 for the season's opening. This will be the eighth season under the Russian leader who has brought the organization a new fame, in many ways exceeding even its illustrious past.

• • •

THE PERSONNEL, consisting of 111 players, remains unchanged from the fiftieth season, just past. Indeed, in constancy of personnel and leadership, no other American orchestra in recent seasons has been so fortunate as this one.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1931

Koussevitzky Returns

Koussevitzky the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises. The Symphony's great leader exerts a stimulating effect which a trafficker in hyperbole might almost liken to that of the ultra-violet ray. Occasionally it shocks, it may even burn—for it embodies an energy at high tension—but for the most part its influence is strengthening and therapeutic. This could not be so, of course, were the conductor merely a remarkable individualist, as undoubtedly he is. The wealth of his resource finds its broader explanation in the excellence of the orchestra itself, and, beyond that, in the inherited fund of the Western World's greatest music—a fund to which the masters of many centuries have contributed.

The restful and spiritually strengthening service of noble music Koussevitzky himself recognized in the remarks he made yesterday, at the moment of his return from abroad. "Music is like religion," he said, "a comfort and joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are the more they crave music." We believe this is so, and welcome the approach of the new Symphony season both for the stimulus it will give and the restoring power of its tranquillities and of its moments of musical majesty.

8

PLANS OF FOUR ORCHESTRAS

NY Times Sept. 27

FOUR out-of-town orchestras, two of which customarily visit New York, have announced the plans of their respective seasons.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recently discussed with a representative of THE NEW YORK TIMES in Paris the make-up of his programs for the new season. These will emphasize the classics more than formerly, while including as usual many new works. In view of Mr. Koussevitzky's consistent crusading in the field of contemporary composition, his comment was particularly interesting.

"I have changed my idea of modern music," he said in part. "I think the period of experimentation is no more. During the past seven years I have devoted much of my time and energy to new compositions. Now . . . our outlook is much clearer . . . a great number of works highly appreciated a few years ago have completely disappeared. It seems to me we have reached a definite stage in the twentieth century music. A slow but definite selection is becoming apparent and I feel it is our duty to cooperate toward its achievement to the best of our ability, for the sake of the art of music. I do not wish to say that we must not play new compositions, but it is necessary to appreciate what we must play and what we must not. Composers like Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Hindemith, and Honegger are already 'classified'; their works can not any longer be considered new music; they are almost classics for us."

It need not be inferred from the above, however, that Mr. Koussevitzky has regressed from his position as a champion of new works. The orchestra's programs for the forthcoming season prove the contrary. They will present world premières of the following: Sibelius' Eighth Symphony, Rachmaninoff's "Etudes-Tableaux" orchestrated by Respighi, Arnold Bax's piano concerto, Aaron Copland's "Symphony-Ode," Anton Webern's "Six Little Pieces for Great Orchestra," Martelli's "Concerto Grosso," Ernest Toch's "Suite," Florent Schmitt's piano concerto with the composer as soloist, Philip Lazar's "Concerto Grosso No. 2," and Lambert's Music for Orchestra. There will also be Haydn, Mozart and two Stravinsky festivals and an all-American program.

Vladimir Golschmann, who begins his first season as conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, will give the following works their first American hearing: Nabakoff's "Ouverture Symphonique," Alexander [illegible] "Tryptique" for string orchestra, and Marcel Mihalovici's "Cortège des Divinités Inferales." Gabrilowitsch, Myra Hess, Adolf Busch, Albert Spalding and others will appear as soloists with the orchestra.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra is facing a crisis in its financial life which may determine whether or not the organization is to continue, according to an article by George A. Leighton in the Cincinnati Enquirer. Mr. Leighton says that funds subscribed several years ago to support the orchestra have not all been paid in owing to hard times, and that the orchestra's continuance virtually rests upon the success of the subscribed seat sale of this season as an index of actual popular support. He even advocates that other music clubs, study circles, etc., which usually bring out-of-town artists for concerts, "declare a holiday on personally conducted series" and transfer their energy and money to the cause of the orchestra.

The Cleveland Orchestra will open its season on Oct. 8 under its conductor, Nikolai Sokoloff. Rachmaninoff and Georges Enesco will be among the soloists, the latter conducting a work of his own. During Mr. Sokoloff's mid-season absence Bernardino Molinari will conduct

---

Ohio State Journal

Music Praised for Newspaper by New Yorker

Sept 27

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which will open the season of the Symphony Club of central Ohio at Memorial Hall, on Thursday, Oct. 29, is "unsurpassed and seldom equalled" in the judgment of Olin Downes, music critic of The New York Times.

Writing of one of the closing concerts of last season in New York City, Mr. Downes said:

"The unsurpassed and seldom equaled Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave an extremely brilliant concert in Carnegie Hall. Not often has the writer heard as fine a performance from this orchestra, at any time in its career. The Boston Symphony orchestra is now a superb ensemble of virtuosi. Not only this: Mr. Koussevitzky has sensitized the orchestra until it is a model of flexibility and fineness of texture.

"This magnificent instrument glowed with beauty and color; the sheer tonal qualities of the playing would have bestowed significance upon the music. The audience, deeply impressed by the performance, applauded and cheered.

"No new works were introduced at this concert, but the program had matter of uncommon interest. It opened with two Bach preludes, as arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, followed by the unfamiliar and unique symphony of Sibelius—his seventh—and finally with the Strauss 'Sinfonia Domestica.'

"Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Strauss minimized his vulgarities and long-windedness and glorified those pages—and there are many—in which the Straussian lyricism and the sheer richness of the Strauss style are most conspiciously present.

"The Bach preludes, admirably contrasted, were prophetic of the quality of the evening."

Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony Club, expects to call a meeting of the executive board soon to make final plans for the season.

Information as to the entire Symphony Club series, and reservations for tickets may be obtained from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood Ave.

* * *

October 1931

9

Boris Kreinin, Symphony Player Dead; Was Struck by Auto

Boris Kreinin, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was struck by an automobile truck late Saturday night, died this morning at the Boston City Hospital.

On learning of his death Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the members of the Symphony Orchestra stood in silence for one minute at rehearsal this morning on the stage of Symphony Hall in honor of Mr. Kreinin, their fellow musician. He was fifty-two years of age, lived at 103 Hemenway street and was on his way home when the accident happened.

Mr. Kreinin had been a member of the Symphony Orchestra since 1925, playing at the second desk of the first violin section. He was a native of Russia, and has had a distinguished musical career in his own country, having been soloist and concertmaster in Koussevitsky's orchestra in Moscow. He was also soloist and assistant conductor at the Opera Theatre, at Petrograd. He served as musician after the revolution, but suffered privations under the new regime, and left Russia in 1922. He was concertmaster of the Esplanade concerts in their first season in 1929.

Trans. Oct 22

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Oct. 16

Beginning in Cambridge

IN the first concert of the new Cambridge season at Sanders Theater, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening fulfilled confident expectation. The size of the audience, which was sufficient to fill the hall with scarcely a seat vacant, in no way reflected present conditions in the economic world; program and performance gave no sign of altered skill or temper in the orchestra. Rather, every circumstance revealed the familiar band complete and fully tested, now ripened in every ability. Thus, with the exception of the pleasing acoustics of Sanders Theater and the differing responsiveness of the Cambridge audience, the concert was a duplication of the opening pair in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The program presented identical items: Schönberg's transcriptions for orchestra of two Choral Preludes of Bach, Brahms's Fourth Sympathy in E minor, Franck's symphonic poem, "The Daughter of Æolus," and the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chlöe."

The welcome which Cambridge extended was more familiar and affectionate than stirring. Here were returning old friends with whom there was a perfect understanding and for whom an effusive demonstration would be out of place. A floral decoration of roses twined about the conductor's stand offered modest tribute. Upon Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance, the orchestra stood as one, and the audience was quick to follow. With extended arms in familiar gesture, the conductor bid his listeners be seated and turned quickly to the business and the pleasure of the evening.

Schönberg's transcriptions of the Choral Preludes served for orchestral warmth and glow and Bach idealized. To most, the organ music of Bach is familiar only through score or the none too frequent performance of an occasional visiting organist of note. In either case, the impression gains that the spirit of Bach thus revealed, offers possibilities of a large and tangible grandeur through the medium of the modern orchestra. This grandeur, truly Bachian in character, despite the purist's objections to arrangements and transcriptions, came to full expression at Dr. Koussevitzky's bidding. The woodwind's glowed in organ-like tones; yet they were richer and more flavorsome than those of the keyboard instrument. The strings gave new tang. Together, all choirs exalted and amplified the symmetries of line and the sensuous beauties of tone.

The Symphony of Brahms was first for vitality, then for purity, then for animation and finally for power: qualities that Dr. Koussevitzky has displayed in this same symphony before; qualities that seem so consolidated and secure that little improvement can be looked for or desired in the conductor's now noted reading of a score which grows in significance and which increases its following with every performance. With the initial movement, Dr. Koussevitzky established the feeling of intense life and determination which continues to the end; in the second, held compact phrase, induced a trueness and lucidity of tone which the Boston Symphony itself seldom surpasses; in the third, stirred pace and sharpened attack; in the fourth, drew together the converging resources of orchestral expression—subordination and amplification of detail, nuance, instrumental accuracy and resilience—vitality of rhythm—to round an emotionally sincere and technically brilliant performance. The attentive and enthusiastic audience apparently considered it the event of the evening.

For closing pieces, Franck's orchestral poem and Ravel's Ballet Suite, both calling up images of sylvan revels by mythological characters, furnished interesting contrast. The symphonic poem evolved neat musical fancies, pleasant to the ear at any moment, and threw out cobweb-like threads about a central figure. The piece drew delighted sighs at the close. By contrast, Ravel's melodies were pungent, his harmonies biting, his dynamic strokes stunning with pagan splendor. The Suite is a typical Koussevitzkian tour de force and certain to display the amazing virtuosity of the orchestra to the best advantage, upon any occasion, as it did last evening.

N. M. J.

Ourselves and Others

Today and tomorrow Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra are playing these pieces:

Symphony, No. 9	Mahler
A Siegfried Idyl	Wagner
Overture to the Opera, "Tannhäuser"	Wagner

On the same days Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra will be heard in this program:

Overture to the Opera, "Euryanthe"	Weber
Symphony in B minor, "The Unfinished"	Schubert
A Siegfried Idyl	Wagner
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"	Strauss

Yesterday and today Mr. Stock's program for the Chicago Orchestra stands:

Overture to the Opera, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Symphony, No. 7, in A major	Beethoven
Symphonic Sketches, "The Sea"	Debussy
Suite from the Ballet, "The Fire-Bird"	Stravinsky

Mr. Kleiber's program for the week at

Concert-Chronicle

Supplementary Wagner

Trans Oct 19

FIRST on Friday afternoon, again on Saturday evening, Dr. Koussevitzky hung as pendant to Mahler's Ninth Symphony the "Siegfried Idyl," unplayed at the Symphony Concerts for eleven years. The outcome proved one of his more fortunate ventures into Wagner, this time as symphonic rather than operatic composer. Though he wrote for Cosima's delectation on her birthday morning and for intimate performance in their own villa at Triebschen, the mighty Richard put to paper no music of more delicate texture, more sublimated in nburg, the Winner. Below—The Drag I

Continued on Page Twelve

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Seven

radiance, more informed with blithe or tnder mood, the one into the other flowing. To this day, even in the amplified performance of a full string orchestra, plus the necessary quota of woodwinds, horns and trumpets, it leaves the hearer wanting for words before such gently incandescent loveliness.

While the mind is marvelling at the artful skill and the subtle, unobtrusive invention with which Wagner weaves a continuous, cumulative pattern of no orthodox form unless it be that of subdued rhapsody, the ear is enchanted by the changeful magic of the sounds it receives; the imagination set in answering glow by the tone-poetry suffusing them. Over his Mass, a vastly different and far-removed music, Beethoven set the phrase "From the heart to the heart." With more reason Wagner might have written it above this revery upon his love and Cosima's, upon their joy in the birth of their son, upon their pride in the Siegfried that should be his name. By the composer's alchemy in the crucible of our listening spirits, the personal note becomes a universal note, and these sixty years whole audiences have been spelled. They were the more holden at Symphony Hall by the poise and plasticity of the conductor and his answering orchestra, by the melting euphonies and the murmurous sweetness of their tone.

Dr. Koussevitzky read to us one of the lyric poems of music in the stilled beauty with which Wagner conceived and accomplished it. . . . The overture to "Tannhäuser" followed, and there at the end was the conductor doubling horns, trumpets, trombones, adding even an extra kettle-drum, for Pelion-upon-Ossa sonorities. And Wagner, one suspects, standing not too surly by, as he listened from the Elysian Fields. The cynic thought came that in most greatness there is also a streak of showmanship. Besides, the flesh was not beaten down under our spiritual feet. It was drowned in a deluge of sound.

H. T. P.

TRAV OCT. 2

SYMPHONY HAS ITS FIRST REHEARSAL

The first rehearsal of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held today at Symphony hall under the leadership of Serge Kousevitzky. The conductor told members of the orchestra of his experiences in Europe during the past summer. The rehearsal started with the score of Brahm's Fourth Symphony. The season will open next Friday afternoon.

Trans

Concert-Chronicle

Oct 14

evival from Wagner

AS noted already in this place, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" will be played at the Symphony Concerts, next 'riday and Saturday, for the first time 1 twelve years—long enough, as memory goes with music, for it to become a orgotten masterpiece. Last spring when Mr. Fiedler revived this Wagnerian :radle-song at a "Sunday Pop," The Transcript reprinted an illuminating article written around it by Mr. Lawrence Gilman of The Herald Tribune. Now that performance "in a higher realm" draws near, two or three paragraphs may be quoted anew:

"Mr. Ernest Newman has remarked, with felicity and justice, that in this music 'all the fountains of human tenderness are unsealed' at the thought of 'the child whose coming meant so much to him, for Wagner's imagination always took fire at a single touch. . . . This is not an individual father musing over his child's cradle, but all nature crooning a song of love for its little ones.'

"Wagner—odd as it may seem to those who choose to think of him as essentially a man of the theater, a musician of the footlights—was really 'one of the children of revery'; and nothing is more illuminative of his true nature as an artist than such revelations of the stilled depths that we find in him from time to time as he turns from his passionate contemplation of human tragedy. . . . and solaces himself and us with some interlude of rich quietude and appeasement like the 'Siegfried Idyl' or the Prelude to the Third Act of 'Die Meistersinger'—those moments when he is without an equal."

When and How

Timely also is a quotation from Mr Neville Cardus, the reviewer of concerts for The Manchester Guardian:

"The 'Siegfried Idyl' is the loveliest expression of domestic sentiment in all music. It was composed privately and furtively by Wagner as a birthday surprise for Cosima on Christmas morning of 1870. It was also intended as a thank-offering to her for the boy Siegfried. Wagner and Cosima were then living at Triebschen—the correct title of the work, indeed, is 'Triebschen Idyll'—but let the wondrous first performance of the music be told in Cosima's own words, quoted from a recent biography:

> I can tell you nothing, my children, about this day, nothing about my state of mind, nothing, nothing. I will only tell you quite drily and barely what happened: As I awoke my ear caught a sound, which swelled fuller and fuller; no longer could I imagine myself to be dreaming; music was sounding, and such music! When it died away, Richard came into my room with the five children and offered me the score of the symphonic birthday poem—I was in tears, but so was the rest of the household. Richard had arranged his orchestra on the staircase, and thus was our Triebschen consecrated forever. . . . Now did I understand Richard's mysterious work [for weeks before], and the good Richter's trumpet practice, too; he played the Siegfried theme gloriously and had learned to play the trumpet on purpose, which had brought down remonstrations from me. . . .

"Apart from the poetry of the Idyll, there are technical points in it of unique significance. Few subtler essays in musical form exist. Wagner uses in his own way the divisions of statement, development, and recapitulation—not rigidly but with a continuously organic growth and changefulness. But the true miracle of the Idyll is that the giant fist which was working in the forge of 'The Ring' was able to lay down the hammer and find ineffable sweetness in his strength, and fashion and caress this cradle of the idyll with a touch light and tender."

Discovered at Last

The Boston Symphony Orchestra . . with a solid national reputation. . .
[Boston Herald

Transcript Oct. 1

Koussevitzky Returns

Koussevitzky the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises. The Symphony's great leader exerts a stimulating effect which a trafficker in hyperbole might almost liken to that of the ultra-violet ray. Occasionally it shocks, it may even burn—for it embodies an energy at high tension—but for the most part its influence is strengthening and therapeutic. This could not be so, of course, were the conductor merely a remarkable individualist, as undoubtedly he is. The wealth of his resource finds its broader explanation in the excellence of the orchestra itself, and, beyond that, in the inherited fund of the Western World's greatest music—a fund to which the masters of many centuries have contributed.

The restful and spiritually strengthening service of noble music Koussevitzky himself recognized in the remarks he made yesterday, at the moment of his return from abroad. "Music is like religion," he said, "a comfort and joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are the more they crave music." We believe this is so, and welcome the approach of the new Symphony season both for the stimulus it will give and the restoring power of its tranquillities and of its moments of musical majesty.

OHIO STATE JOURNAL

One Music Club Giving Columbus Five Symphonies

Oct 11

Although the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play here Oct. 29 has not yet been announced by its leader, Serge Koussevitzky, at least one young American composer will be represented, the leader indicated last week in a letter to Mrs. B. G. Huntington, president of the Symphoney Club of Central Ohio.

Koussevitzky, one of the world's greatest conductors, paid this country an unexpected compliment through the newspapers a week ago when he landed in New York after a summer spent in Europe.

"What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America," he said, "is that the majority of the people have musical taste. In Europe one always finds a certain circle who attend concerts, but in America it is the rank and file who form an enthusiastic audience."

Dr. Koussevitzky gave as a specific instance of America's musical development "her 20 superb orchestras," and "her promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Roger Sessions and Carpenter."

The conductor believes that jazz has finished its major role as an influence in American music and will henceforth be relegated to the realm of the danee.

Here in Columbus, where no more than four symphony orchestras have heretofore appeared in one season, five major orchestras will compose the season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which also plans, as a sort of depression cure, to renovate the seats in Memorial Hall at once, in preparation for the opening event Oct. 19. At least 3000 of the seats will be upholstered and covered with composition leather. The excessive slant forward of the seats, familiar through many years to habitual concert-goers, will be remedied, too, the committee working with Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, associate president, promises.

Box office ticket sale opens Oct. 19 at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. Until then, tickets for the series, or for any single concert, may be obtained from Mrs. Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood Ave.

* * *

The Koussevitzkys and Dog Back But the Big Fiddle—Where Is It?

Usually It Leans Against the Wall in the House They Have Taken for the Season, but This Year the Space Was Vacant—One Wonders

By JANET MABIE

Punctually once a year now, I am received by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

I invariably look forward to the incident. It has a story-book air. It is a little like an incident in which people own an ornate clock of porcelain which they wind once a year with great ceremony, and permit then to run for 20 minutes. After that, it is stopped, likewise with ceremony, and put away until another year.

I ask him if he has had a pleasant summer, and he says yes, mentioning that he was able to see a blue mountain having a cap of snow from the window by which he wrote fresh phrases for a new composition; and a meeting in Paris with Ravel; and a little interval of complete and absurdly vacant-minded rest at some place in the Dolomites or perhaps at Bad Gastein in Austria.

He speaks politely of the fact that his programs for the new season will contain appropriate representations of Bach, and of Mozart, and of Beethoven, and that there will be at least two new symphonies; I am left to find out later if they are by Gustav Mahler or by Brückner.

We understand between us that I am not at all a music critic; we understand also that I am invariably amused that, here in Boston, the Koussevitzkys always take someone else's house furnished, reserving Paris as the city in which they have a home which is their own.

Sees Good in the Boy

I always carry away with me from the meeting a remembrance of light, effortless affability, and a collection of pleasant little, generalizing nothings about forthcoming programs. I carry away a picture of a household able to settle without waste motion, or yet emotion, into a background full-fashioned by others who are often strangers.

There will still be visible in th hall and through open doors odd and ends of a vast collection o hand luggage. And Dr. Koussevitzky's polished bass viol. And th family bulldog will be a sleek, busy pattern of black and white abou the rooms. And there will be th Russian butler with his seersucke coat and slightly mischievous eyes, and the austere woman to whom Samuel Pepys would allude as Madame Koussevitzky's "tyring woman." I never expect the order or the ingredients of the incident to be changed. They never have been.

This year, though, I was surprised.

People who read the papers have learnt that a nephew of Dr. Koussevitzky, Fabien Sevitzky, is conducting the concert orchestra at the Metropolitan Theater, in Boston. There are those who would have you believe that, since all musicians are traditionally jealous of each other, in this case Serge Koussevitzky would probably not publicly notice the musical activities of his nephew.

When we had finished all the usual formalities, we took up the subject of Fabien Sevitzky. It was my pleasure to report casually to his uncle that Fabien Sevitzky's conducting of the theater orchestra, still in its first weeks, had laid an immediately noticeable hold on audiences, and that the engagement held quite obvious promise of an unusual success.

"But yes," said Serge Koussevitzky, beaming; he has quite a good lot more English at his command this October than he had last, and he employed it now to speak as charmingly as I have ever heard one musician speak of another. "That boy is a brilliant boy. You are to wait. And you will see that what I say is true when I tell you that in three-four years you will hear his name ver' loud in this country. He plays with the Philadelphia Symphony before now.

"We, he and I, we both play the double bass, too. And he has an ensemble in Philadelphia which I must tell you is ver' good. Ver' good indeed! He has the great talent. When he left Russia he was already a soloist. He has what you call the round talent. He does many things, all ver' good. I know some things he is going to do with his music, and if I should say them to you, you would know how he is going to have a ver' big name before a long time.

"You know, I should like to have him with me. But people are funny about such things like that. They would say 'A-ha; he is the nephew of Serge Koussevitzky,' and they would smile and not see that, without his being the nephew of me, he has the great talent. But, moreover, he does not need me. His own talent is better to him than I am. You are to watch him, I tell you, and you will see."

It was quite a pleasant thing to watch this eminent and so well known conductor draw completely away from talk of his own interests for the new season, to speak quite simply, and with such enthusiasm, of the affairs of a nephew; though he, with something I think is a discrimination against trading on a name, has shortened the family name so that the doings of neither uncle nor nephew shall become entangled in the hasty judgments of the day.

"And his wife," Dr. Koussevitzky went on eagerly. "Maria Koussevitzky is a singer. You know? Ah, but she is a lovely singer. Her voice it is a great voice. And she has more than a great voice. She has the great charm and the distinction and the unusual taste. You know that not all singers have the taste. She has it; yes. They are both young. They will both make the great names for themselves in this country. You will see. You will hear more than overtures from him. And you will see Maria Koussevitzky in ver' many brilliant concerts."

Some Will Be Disappointed

So much, I thought, for people who had lately speculated idly in my hearing on how Fabien Sevitzky really felt, with an uncle uptown, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and how Serge Koussevitzky felt, with a nephew downtown, conducting a concert orchestra in a moving picture theater.

A strange situation, they said, and what about caste among musicians of symphony orchestras and of moving picture theaters. It seemed foolish to link Serge Koussevitzky with premises involving any such superficial discriminations even if I had not considered it an egregious breach of taste.

We left off about the nephew and niece, speaking of scraps of neighborhood gossip. The house was filled with flowers. Already, though there was an unpacked trunkful of music by the piano, there was a Koussevitzky air about the house, which you grow to recognize if you go, as I do, once each year, to see them in their pied-à-terre of the moment.

The Russian butler, beaming, had let me in. Upstairs I had heard Madame Koussevitzky talking in her rich, low-pitched voice to the "tyring woman." And I could hear the bulldog slipping and sliding as usual over the polished floors. I could see a long table groaning under piles of mail. An envelope, from which the cards had been removed, dangled on the handle of a great golden basket filled with roses. Immense gladioli and dahlias, maroon, gold, ivory and the purple of a mosque at midnight were everywhere in baskets and vases.

Where Was the "Bull Fiddle"?

I missed the double-bass, standing in its accustomed sedate splendor by the piano. Perhaps it had been taken upstairs, but its absence left a little rent in my otherwise perfect annual picture.

There seemed nothing more to do. The clock had run its time. Suddenly, calling attention to the less fantastic passage of actual time, the chimes and bells of a half-dozen sizable clocks began a clamor round the house, which set me to wondering with amusement if someone had to go around at 10 o'clock each night to stop all the pendulums; for surely no one could put up with such an hourly clamor through the night, except possibly in a house close enough to the sea where it would be muted by the sound of tides beating on rocks.

And that was all. Until next October I shall not see Serge Koussevitzky to speak to again. Then he will be just settled in a new house, and unpacked trunks will stand under other lamps, and flowers will bloom brilliantly on other tables. But through this year I shall remember that he varied the usual order of slight annual communications to one about his own new season with a quite spontaneous, appreciative tribute to the talent of a lesser known, much younger man, his nephew, and his nephew's lovely and talented wife.

I once heard a cynical writer of so-called sophisticated critical essays raise the slightly absurd question, "Are musicians people?"

What with one thing and another about Serge Koussevitzky, not to mention Fabien Sevitzky, I should say probably they are.

Monitor

OCTOBER 9, 1931

World Awaits the Greatest Composer, Says Koussevitzky

ADV By Morris Hastings Oct 4

HAS the art of Music come to a standstill? Has it nothing more to say? Can there be no great composers and great music in the future?

Not at all, says Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, in answer to these questions one frequently hears discussed by musicians nowadays. As a matter of fact, the brilliant conductor contends, the way is now clear for a genius who may well be the greatest composer the world has ever known.

"In the last ten years," explained Dr. Koussevitzky as he paced the length of a room in his Brookline home, "music has gone through a period of storm and stress. Composers have been experimenting with new and startling forms, with intricate polyphony and with new scales.

"But now, the storm and stress have died down. Now we know what is good and what is worthless in the new forms of musical expression.

"To say that because modern composers seem to have exhausted the mechanics of composition music is at an end is altogether false. The mechanics of music are actually no more music than a printing press is a book.

"The time is ripe," Dr. Koussevitzky's eyes flashed and he made a sweeping, dramatic gesture, "for a genius who will express himself superbly by utilizing what has been discovered during this stormy period just passed. He has the whole sweep of music at his command. He should produce something enormously fine."

Hope For the Moderns

Dr. Koussevitzky understands "the moderns" with a poet's understanding. And so we asked him if he could name a contemporary composer who might prove to be the genius in question.

"I have the greatest faith in Stravinsky," he replied, calmer now but no less "alive" as he sat down in a spacious armchair. "He is a man of superior intelligence. He has been, in turn, romanticist, ultra-modernist and, now, he is a modern classicist.

"His new violin concerto, of which the Symphony will give the first American performance this season, is a distinguished work written in his latest and, I think, most sincere manner. I believe that Stravinsky has indeed 'found himself.'"

Dr. Koussevitzky also named Prokoffieff, Hindemith, Copland, and especially Schonberg, who will gain in importance in a few years, he added, when we are able to get more of a perspective on his work.

The conductor admires Ravel for his amazing knowledge of the orchestra and as a brilliantly gifted composer of lesser music.

"But Ravel is too chic," Dr. Koussevitzky smiled gently, "too modish a composer to be a great one. His 'Bolero', which swept audiences off their feet two seasons ago, can no longer seriously be considered as a work to be played on a Symphony program."

During his summer vacation in Paris, Dr. Koussevitzky read many new scores. Everyone, he says, seems to be working feverishly trying to produce a masterpiece. But exceedingly few, he admits, have so far succeeded.

Out of the manuscript submitted him he has selected a symphonic work by Toch, a symphony by Ferroud and many others. Of the American composers, Dr. Koussevitzky plans to play a symphony by Aaron Copland and a piano concerto by a New Yorker named Morris, who will play the solo part when it is performed for the first time at the third Symphony concert this season.

He also expects to present seldom heard music by 19th century composers, such as Bruckner, Mahler—both late German romanticists—and Dvorak.

PROMISING SEASON FOR SYMPHONY

Continued from Page 8

He will repeat several of the works written especially for the anniversary season of the Boston Symphony performed last year. Among these, he hopes to do the Roussel Symphony, the Hindemith opus and, perhaps, the Respighi "Metamorphoseon."

To meet Dr. Koussevitzky in his lovely home is to understand the charm and force of his interpretations as conductor. He has the delightful gift of putting one immediately at his ease. The readiness, the intelligence and the enthusiasm of his conversation are constantly stimulating.

It is a pleasure to have him in Boston again; and we look forward with great eagerness to what will doubtless be under his direction another brilliant Symphony season.

FEW NOVELTIES FOR SYMPHONY

World Premiers of Big, Serious Works Slated

Post Oct 1

Completing the final stage of his journey from Europe, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from New York at the Back Bay station at 3:25 yesterday afternoon. With Dr. Koussevitzky were Mme. Koussevitzky, his secretary and W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fine fettle after a summer spent largely in Paris and at Bad Gastein in Austria, Dr. Koussevitzky was, as he alighted from the train yesterday, his usual smiling and enthusiastic self.

Of his plans for the coming season Dr. Koussevitzky had first to say that this year he would have fewer actual novelties than usual to offer, and that he would put a considerable emphasis on standard works that had been unduly neglected. Among the last-named is ths Ninth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, which will be introduced to Boston, and, so far as can be learned to America, at the second pair of concerts. There will in all likelihood be another symphony of Mahler as well, and the Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, unheard here since Dr. Muck's time.

As in other seasons Symphony Hall will this winter be the scene of certain orchestral world premieres, among them those of Sibelius' Eighth Symphony, the Symponic Ode of Aaron Copland, a Concerto Grosso of Martelli, a Piano Concerto by Florent Schmitt, with the composer as soloist; a Concerto Grosso by Lazar, and Constant Lambert's Music for Orchestra. There is prospect, too, of a Haydn and Mozart Festival in honor of the 200th anniversary of the former composer's birth, and of a Stravinsky Festival.

The Symphony season will open with the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 9 and 10, with a programme of compositions by Bach-Schoenberg, Franck, Brahms and Ravel.

The Koussevitzkys and Dog Back But the Big Fiddle—Where Is It?

Usually It Leans Against the Wall in the House They Have Taken for the Season, but This Year the Space Was Vacant—One Wonders

By JANET MABIE

Punctually once a year now, I am received by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

I invariably look forward to the incident. It has a story-book air. It is a little like an incident in which people own an ornate clock of porcelain which they wind once a year with great ceremony, and permit then to run for 20 minutes. After that, it is stopped, likewise with ceremony, and put away until another year.

I ask him if he has had a pleasant summer, and he says yes, mentioning that he was able to see a blue mountain having a cap of snow from the window by which he wrote fresh phrases for a new composition; and a meeting in Paris with Ravel; and a little interval of complete and absurdly vacant-minded rest at some place in the Dolomites or perhaps at Bad Gastein in Austria.

He speaks politely of the fact that his programs for the new season will contain appropriate representations of Bach, and of Mozart, and of Beethoven, and that there will be at least two new symphonies; I am left to find out later if they are by Gustav Mahler or by Brückner.

We understand between us that I am not at all a music critic; we understand also that I am invariably amused that, here in Boston, the Koussevitzkys always take someone else's house furnished, reserving Paris as the city in which they have a home which is their own.

Sees Good in the Boy

I always carry away with me from the meeting a remembrance of light, effortless affability, and a collection of pleasant little, generalizing nothings about forthcoming programs. I carry away a picture of a household able to settle without waste motion, or yet emotion, into a background full-fashioned by others who are often strangers.

There will still be visible in the hall and through open doors odd and ends of a vast collection of hand luggage. And Dr. Koussevitzky's polished bass viol. And the family bulldog will be a sleek, busy pattern of black and white about the rooms. And there will be the Russian butler with his seersucker coat and slightly mischievous eyes, and the austere woman to whom Samuel Pepys would allude as Madame Koussevitzky's "tyring woman." I never expect the order or the ingredients of the incident to be changed. They never have been.

This year, though, I was surprised.

People who read the papers have learnt that a nephew of Dr. Koussevitzky, Fabien Sevitzky, is conducting the concert orchestra at the Metropolitan Theater, in Boston. There are those who would have you believe that, since all musicians are traditionally jealous of each other, in this case Serge Koussevitzky would probably not publicly notice the musical activities of his nephew.

When we had finished all the usual formalities, we took up the subject of Fabien Sevitzky. It was my pleasure to report casually to his uncle that Fabien Sevitzky's conducting of the theater orchestra, still in its first weeks, had laid an immediately noticeable hold on audiences, and that the engagement held quite obvious promise of an unusual success.

"But yes," said Serge Koussevitzky, beaming; he has quite a good lot more English at his command this October than he had last, and he employed it now to speak as charmingly as I have ever heard one musician speak of another. "That boy is a brilliant boy. You are to wait. And you will see that what I say is true when I tell you that in three-four years you will hear his name ver' loud in this country. He plays with the Philadelphia Symphony before now.

"We, he and I, we both play the double bass, too. And he has an ensemble in Philadelphia which I must tell you is ver' good. Ver' good indeed! He has the great talent. When he left Russia he was already a soloist. He has what you call the round talent. He does many things, all ver' good. I know some things he is going to do with his music, and if I should say them to you, you would know how he is going to have a ver' big name before a long time.

"You know, I should like to have him with me. But people are funny about such things like that. They would say 'A-ha; he is the nephew of Serge Koussevitzky,' and they would smile and not see that, without his being the nephew of me, he has the great talent. But, moreover, he does not need me. His own talent is better to him than I am. You are to watch him, I tell you, and you will see."

It was quite a pleasant thing to watch this eminent and so well known conductor draw completely away from talk of his own interests for the new season, to speak quite simply, and with such enthusiasm, of the affairs of a nephew; though he, with something I think is a discrimination against trading on a name, has shortened the family name so that the doings of neither uncle nor nephew shall become entangled in the hasty judgments of the day.

"And his wife," Dr. Koussevitzky went on eagerly. "Maria Koussevitzky is a singer. You know? Ah, but she is a lovely singer. Her voice it is a great voice. And she has more than a great voice. She has the great charm and the distinction and the unusual taste. You know that not all singers have the taste. She has it; yes. They are both young. They will both make the great names for themselves in this country. You will see. You will hear more than overtures from him. And you will see Maria Koussevitzky in ver' many brilliant concerts."

Some Will Be Disappointed

So much, I thought, for people who had lately speculated idly in my hearing on how Fabien Sevitzky really felt, with an uncle uptown, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and how Serge Koussevitzky felt, with a nephew downtown, conducting a concert orchestra in a moving picture theater.

A strange situation, they said, and what about caste among musicians of symphony orchestras and of moving picture theaters. It seemed foolish to link Serge Koussevitzky with premises involving any such superficial discriminations even if I had not considered it an egregious breach of taste.

We left off about the nephew and niece, speaking of scraps of neighborhood gossip. The house was filled with flowers. Already, though there was an unpacked trunkful of music by the piano, there was a Koussevitzky air about the house, which you grow to recognize if you go, as I do, once each year, to see them in their pied-à-terre of the moment.

The Russian butler, beaming, had let me in. Upstairs I had heard Madame Koussevitzky talking in her rich, low-pitched voice to the "tyring woman." And I could hear the bulldog slipping and sliding as usual over the polished floors. I could see a long table groaning under piles of mail. An envelope, from which the cards had been removed, dangled on the handle of a great golden basket filled with roses. Immense gladioli and dahlias, maroon, gold, ivory and the purple of a mosque at midnight were everywhere in baskets and vases.

Where Was the "Bull Fiddle"?

I missed the double-bass, standing in its accustomed sedate splendor by the piano. Perhaps it had been taken upstairs, but its absence left a little rent in my otherwise perfect annual picture.

There seemed nothing more to do. The clock had run its time. Suddenly, calling attention to the less fantastic passage of actual time, the chimes and bells of a half-dozen sizable clocks began a clamor round the house, which set me to wondering with amusement if someone had to go around at 10 o'clock each night to stop all the pendulums; for surely no one could put up with such an hourly clamor through the night, except possibly in a house close enough to the sea where it would be muted by the sound of tides beating on rocks.

And that was all. Until next October I shall not see Serge Koussevitzky to speak to again. Then he will be just settled in a new house, and unpacked trunks will stand under other lamps, and flowers will bloom brilliantly on other tables. But through this year I shall remember that he varied the usual order of slight annual communications to one about his own new season with a quite spontaneous, appreciative tribute to the talent of a lesser known, much younger man, his nephew, and his nephew's lovely and talented wife.

I once heard a cynical writer of so-called sophisticated critical essays raise the slightly absurd question, "Are musicians people?"

What with one thing and another about Serge Koussevitzky, not to mention Fabien Sevitzky, I should say probably they are.

Monitor

OCTOBER 9, 1931

World Awaits the Greatest Composer, Says Koussevitzky

ADV By Morris Hastings Oct 4

HAS the art of Music come to a standstill? Has it nothing more to say? Can there be no great composers and great music in the future?

Not at all, says Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, in answer to these questions one frequently hears discussed by musicians nowadays. As a matter of fact, the brilliant conductor contends, the way is now clear for a genius who may well be the greatest composer the world has ever known.

"In the last ten years," explained Dr. Koussevitzky as he paced the length of a room in his Brookline home, "music has gone through a period of storm and stress. Composers have been experimenting with new and startling forms, with intricate polyphony and with new scales.

"But now, the storm and stress have died down. Now we know what is good and what is worthless in the new forms of musical expression.

"To say that because modern composers seem to have exhausted the mechanics of composition music is at an end is altogether false. The mechanics of music are actually no more music than a printing press is a book.

"The time is ripe," Dr. Koussevitzky's eyes flashed and he made a sweeping, dramatic gesture, "for a genius who will express himself superbly by utilizing what has been discovered during this stormy period just passed. He has the whole sweep of music at his command. He should produce something enormously fine."

Hope For the Moderns

Dr. Koussevitzky understands "the moderns" with a poet's understanding. And so we asked him if he could name a contemporary composer who might prove to be the genius in question.

"I have the greatest faith in Stravinsky," he replied, calmer now but no less "alive" as he sat down in a spacious armchair. "He is a man of superior intelligence. He has been, in turn, romanticist, ultra-modernist and, now, he is a modern classicist.

"His new violin concerto, of which the Symphony will give the first American performance this season, is a distinguished work written in his latest and, I think, most sincere manner. I believe that Stravinsky has indeed 'found himself.'"

Dr. Koussevitzky also named Prokoffieff, Hindemith, Copland, and especially Schonberg, who will gain in importance in a few years, he added, when we are able to get more of a perspective on his work.

The conductor admires Ravel for his amazing knowledge of the orchestra and as a brilliantly gifted composer of lesser music.

"But Ravel is too chic," Dr. Koussevitzky smiled gently, "too modish a composer to be a great one. His 'Bolero', which swept audiences off their feet two seasons ago, can no longer seriously be considered as a work to be played on a Symphony program."

During his summer vacation in Paris, Dr. Koussevitzky read many new scores. Everyone, he says, seems to be working feverishly trying to produce a masterpiece. But exceedingly few, he admits, have so far succeeded.

Out of the manuscript submitted him he has selected a symphonic work by Toch a symphony by Ferroud and many others. Of the American composers, Dr. Koussevitzky plans to play a symphony by Aaron Copland and a piano concerto by a New Yorker named Morris, who will play the solo part when it is performed for the first time at the third Symphony concert this season.

He also expects to present seldom heard music by 19th century composers, such as Bruckner, Mahler—both late German romanticists—and Dvorak.

PROMISING SEASON FOR SYMPHONY

Continued from Page 8

He will repeat several of the works written especially for the anniversary season of the Boston Symphony performed last year. Among these, he hopes to do the Roussel Symphony, the Hindemith opus and, perhaps, the Respighi "Metamorphoseon."

To meet Dr. Koussevitzky in his lovely home is to understand the charm and force of his interpretations as conductor. He has the delightful gift of putting one immediately at his ease. The readiness, the intelligence and the enthusiasm of his conversation are constantly stimulating.

It is a pleasure to have him in Boston again; and we look forward with great eagerness to what will doubtless be under his direction another brilliant Symphony season.

FEW NOVELTIES FOR SYMPHONY

World Premiers of Big, Serious Works Slated

Post Oct 1

Completing the final stage of his journey from Europe, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from New York at the Back Bay station at 3:25 yesterday afternoon. With Dr. Koussevitzky were Mme. Koussevitzky, his secretary and W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fine fettle after a summer spent largely in Paris and at Bad Gastein in Austria, Dr. Koussevitzky was, as he alighted from the train yesterday, his usual smiling and enthusiastic self.

Of his plans for the coming season Dr. Koussevitzky had first to say that this year he would have fewer actual novelties than usual to offer, and that he would put a considerable emphasis on standard works that had been unduly neglected. Among the last-named is ths Ninth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, which will be introduced to Boston, and, so far as can be learned to America, at the second pair of concerts. There will in all likelihood be another symphony of Mahler as well, and the Ninth Symphony of Bruckner, unheard here since Dr. Muck's time.

As in other seasons Symphony Hall will this winter be the scene of certain orchestral world premieres, among them those of Sibelius' Eighth Symphony, the Symponic Ode of Aaron Copland, a Concerto Grosso of Martelli, a Piano Concerto by Florent Schmitt, with the composer as soloist; a Concerto Grosso by Lazar, and Constant Lambert's Music for Orchestra. There is prospect, too, of a Haydn and Mozart Festival in honor of the 200th anniversary of the former composer's birth, and of a Stravinsky Festival.

The Symphony season will open with the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 9 and 10, with a programme of compositions by Bach-Schoenberg, Franck, Brahms and Ravel.

Plays and Players --- Music and Musician

Ink on Paper: Not the Man, Nor His Work

Sorry Failure of Lourie's Life of Koussevitzky, Published Today

AS if to celebrate the beginning of the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there appears, under the colophon of Alfred A. Knopf, New York city, a handsomely printed volume entitled, "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch: A Biographical Chronicle," by Arthur Lourié, with sixteen illustrations in half-tone, translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. Appropriately enough it follows hard upon the echoes of last season's semi-centenary. After the orchestra, the conductor who has brought it to new distinction. . . . Appropriately, too, it is dedicated to Natalya Konstantinovna Koussevitzky. After the conductor, the silent helpmeet, the power behind the throne, who has companioned him in his triumphs and, with a fond solicitude that is not incompatible with aristocratic mastery, has stood between him and the outside world as a shield against devitalizing contacts. It was fitting that Dr. Koussevitzky, in this day of rampant biography, should have his book. The tribute that has already been paid to Toscanini and to Mengelberg now comes, a wreath of printed leaves, to take its place beside the wreath of gold that crowned our conductor's head at the conclusion of an exciting Jubilee.

There can be no denying that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is one of the most attractive figures in contemporary music. The man has an air; to his concerts whatever their net result as expressed in terms of disinterested aesthetics, he imparts that air. To the symphony hall he brings the stir, and sometimes the commotion, of the theater. People come to watch; they remain to listen. Something of this transformation, indeed, is accomplished in himself. He approaches a score with his personal dynamism; at first the actor—and Mr. Lourié has a philosophy of conducting that attributes salient importance to the physical appearance of the conductor—he gradually becomes the musician, possessing the piece and being by it possessed. Yes; even in conducting there is room for ecstasy. We who have sat before Koussevitzky during the seven years in which he has made us his and we have made him ours, have seen, between band and leader, a similar reciprocal influence. Watching, listening closely, we have seen and heard him transform the orchestra; and we have seen and heard the orchestra transform him.

Who was this compelling personality? Speculation had begun from the very moment that he was announced as Boston's new director. Rumors had been rife. . . . Prima-donna conductor. . . . An intuitionist rather than a scholar in the Muck tradition. . . . The men had feared Muck and respected him. Rabaud had been a colorless interlude. Monteux, respected, had not been feared; expert drill master that he was, he was not a disciplinarian., Koussevitzky? A taskmaster; a martinet, as hard upon himself as upon his men; one who kept them at arm's length. He demanded, and received, submission long before he won the respect that he now enjoys from the orchestra that he sought to make over in his own image. Koussevitzky has the prejudice of our times in favor of youth. No sooner had he stepped upon the podium than he began, with an almost impersonal, ruthless determination, to weed out the older men. He wanted youth, and the spirit of youth. Something of this policy is discernible in the new music and the new composers that he has fostered. Nay, Symphony Hall itself must be rejuvenated. He re-arranged the musicians; the decorations of the auditorium were subtly altered; the lighting system gave way to a less obtrusive modernity.

There is that in us all which resists change. It can hardly be denied that in the first seasons of his tenure Koussevitzky was not so popular as he is today. He was a showman; he was sympathetic to the modernists; he was notably, and at times erratically, intuitive. Whereupon, and not always without justice, he was accused of obtruding his personality into its interpretations; excited ladies wrote that his modernist programs helped to provoke the crime wave. In these post-behavioristic days, when intuition is challenged on all sides by a new objectivism, he was found deficient in scholarship. It was bruited about that he needed help in the preparation of his scores; the only fact that was crystallized by the "whispering campaign" was this: he employed a pianist to play over the scores while he prepared them for performance. As Mr. Lourié tells us, Koussevitzky as a young man had acquired proficiency in most of the instruments of the orchestra. And as we know from the grateful evidence of our own ears, he is one of the universal virtuosi of the double-bass. It is not only an orchestra that Koussevitzky has won over; it is a public.

Mr. Lourié, friend as well as biographer, probably rationalizes some of the defects of Dr. Koussevitzky's qualities. Yet to the conductor's histrionic tendencies we are indebted for some rare evenings in which the air has been electric with portents. The man can "put on a show," as the various festivals attest, both artistically, and, as one might say, box-officially. Perhaps in some distant Utopia we shall learn to hear music with our eyes closed with an aesthetic exclusion of visual impressions. At that remote day we shall be less affected by conductorial calisthenics. Maybe this is an age of wonders, conductors will come to confine their manual and digital heroics to the privacy of the rehearsal. Until then, however, we owe a little gratiude to the leader who attempts a pleasant co-ordination between sound and sight, who tries to make his gestures (and it seems to me that Koussevitzky's gestures have been toned down since he first came to these shores) a sort of visible editing of the music.

Koussevitzky has the prejudice of progress. He began, Mr. Lourié points out, by interpreting the music of the West to Russia. He continued by bringing the music of Russia to the West. Now, rising above national boundaries, he has become an internationalist of his art. His earliest phase is symbolized by his advocacy of Skriabin; his next, by his advocacy of Stravinsky. There are those who would interpret this shifting as a species of opportunism. (One has reason to believe, by the way, that the biographer has not told the full tale of Koussevitzky's relations with Skriabin, and that the complete story would have made for better, more human reading, with a touch of poetic pathos). I see no opportunism here, however. I see, rather, the tokens of a temperament that feels the actor's necessity for immediate response.

Mr. Lourié, in his monograph, is frequently as autobiographical as he is biographical. The story of Koussevitzky's rise is often meager in detail, and is told against a running counterpoint of obiter dicta upon the philosophy, the practise, the theory and the mysticism of music. We learn quite as much about what Mr. Lourié thinks as about what Sergei Koussevitsky has done. Now and again the figure of the conductor is obscured behind a barrage of dense verbiage. Between these lines we catch a glimpse of Koussevitzky's progress from poverty to fame. . . . His birth, in June, 1874, at the town of Vyshny Volochek, Tver Government. . . . His musical parents. . . . The strolling musicians who inspired him to emulation. . . . His fondness for nature. . . . The provincial theater whose orchestra he was to lead at the age of fourteen. . . . The father's opposition to a musical career for his boy. . . . His benefactress, Mme. Ropenberg, pupil of Nikolai Rubinstein; she gave him lessons on the piano. . . . His entrance into the Philharmonic School of Moscow, as a student of the double-bass. . . . His admission to the Imperial Orchestra, at the age of seventeen, and his rise to virtuosity. . . . His tour of Russia. . . . His first appearance in 1898 at the Berlin Singakademie. . . . His arrangements and compositions for the instrument of his choice. . . . His conductorship, procured through the influence of Joachim, of the students' orchestra at the Berlin Hochschule in 1906. . . .

We follow him as a publisher, for Koussevitzky not only plays his favorites; he prints them. We attend concerts in Petersburg and Moscow, remembering showboats, we follow the ambitious youth on his tour of the Volga. Then comes the vast dissonance that was the war. During the difficulties that the conflict brought to Russia, Koussevitzky remained the artist. Despite threats and protests, he continued to place Beethoven on his programs. The Revolution of 1917, however, effectively shattered his plans. In May, 1917, he was urged by N. F. Golovin, formerly president of the eleventh Imperial Duma, to take charge of the new State Symphony Orchestra; it was a spoiled child of the Tsarist régime and, though Koussevitzky labored with characteristic energy to make of it a disciplined organization, it cannot be imagined that he was sorry to close its last concert. In the spring of 1920 he left Russia. The success of the Bolshevist coup raised Lourié into a position of artistic prominence; he became the liaison-officer for the arts, maintaining contact between Russia and the rest of Europe. Koussevitzky, openly hostile to the new régime, had already, without knowing it, begun his voyage of discovery to America.

There was a stay of two days in Berlin; then on to Paris, where Diagilev offered him a season as ballet-conductor. Koussevitzky declined. In Rome he appeared as soloist on the double bass, and as conductor, at the Augusteo. A series of twenty concerts followed as virtuoso on the double-bass, on an Italian tour. London saw him in January, 1921, as conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra; the following spring he made his bow to Paris, at the Salle Gaveau, as a conductor of Russian programs. He introduced Paris to Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and "Prometheus," as also to Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite." He commissioned Ravel to make the now noted orchestration of Musorgsky's "Pictures from an Exhibition." He conducted in opera, with side trips to Spain and Portugal. Berlin and Warsaw next surrendered to his new-found powers.

Of Koussevitzky in America—that epoch of his life which, so to say, we can control from personal observation, and from the report of which we are enabled to gauge the skill and authority of Mr. Lourié in his chapters about the periods that are less familiar—there is disappointingly little. Koussevitzky was invited to Boston in 1924. He found, writes Lourié, "an abominable routine and a lack of discipline. The concerts had lost their former prestige and subscriptions had almost ceased." It would have been a courtesy for the author to have explained why the orchestra had reached a low estate. One would like, from the business office of the Symphony Orchestra, corroboration as to the almost-cessation of the subscriptions. However, this is a minor observation. Something more than ten pages we should have welcomed on Koussevitzky in America; for, to risk repetition of a theme, if he has done much for us, we have done much for him. And we could have gladly allowed, for expatiation upon the American period, the space that Mr. Lourié consumes in printing his esoteric notions as to what may be the matter with music in the United States.

A peculiar fate seems to haunt conductors when they are placed between the covers of a volume. Toscanini had his Tobia Nicotra; Mengelberg his E. R. Sollitt, and now Koussevitzky his Arthur Lourié. Why, when the simple human being is so fascinating in his cycle of trial and error, try to make of him a knight sans peur et sans reproche—the impossible hero of a fairy tale? Conductors, as it is easy to imagine, are generally exhibitionistic in nature. This renders them all the more human, and these are the days of humanization in knowledge and in biography. It has become too easy to trace back our finer qualities to instincts and complexes not so fine. The "debunking" biographer, after all, has an unbalanced view of things. Yet the "debunking" spirit has, on the whole, clarified our conception and understanding of the great. It has weaned us (for good, let us hope) from the worshipful attitude with which we approach our heroes. We have discovered that the great, somehow, have greatness added unto them when they are presented as human beings, not as impossible paragons. Yet to look with high-powered microscopes for the clay in the feet of our idols is to fall into the opposite error. If our heroes are not divine, neither are they satanic. Between these extremes dwells humanity.

Now, it would seem that Mr. Lourié in his eagerness to present a schematic philosophy of contemporary music, has schematized Dr. Koussevitzky as well. His book is poorly organized; it is hardly distinguished for its thinking or for its writing, and this holds true regardless of the qualities of the translation. It almost seems as if Koussevitzky, in this account, were quite secondary, and that he was being used to prove some points about modern music that the composer author has in mind.

In one of two instances, indeed the biographer fails in the primary requirements of elementary biographical narrative. He makes much, in his early pages, about the question of race and country in music. Yet we are given no hint of Dr. Koussevitzky's racial origin, although it is to be found in more than one reference work and happens to be the same as that of Monsieur Lourié himself. I mention this point in no spirit of empty chauvinism; pride is merely the other face of prejudice, turned in admiration upon ourselves. Such data, however, belong in biographies as matters of statistics. A man has as much right to change his racial or religious affiliations as he has to change his citizenship. But if he is great enough to be written about, he is important enough to be treated in full, with scientific regard for the facts.

Again, the matter of Koussevitzky's marital history,—it should have been a very simple obligation to give, in this respect, the data at hand. It is general knowledge that Dr. Koussevitzky has been twice married; yet there is nothing in Mr. Lourié's allegedly authoritative book to suggest, even remotely, that there was a wife before the dedicatee of his volume. I offer this criticism not as a lover of gossip, nor is there anything in the facts to lend comfort of any sort to the prying whisperer or the gossip-monger. The more the injustice to the subject of the book, then, that this aspect should have been overlooked.

I have already said that Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the most attractive figures in contemporary music. His career and his personality offered rich opportunity to a biographer with a feeling for our fundamental humanity, with a flair for psychology, with a gift for seizing upon the friendships and the ambitions of a man and relating them to his successes, his failures and his meaning for his generation. This dynamic personality, for all the years of friendship that have linked Mr. Lourié to Koussevitzky seems to have eluded the biographer's grasp. Of a very human soul who has moved amid glamour he has managed to make a rather dull, sometimes nebulous figure, an incomplete incident imperfectly glimpsed through a mist of metaphysics. . . . Our Koussevitzky deserved far better; some day a real biography of the man will be written, and its candor, its insight, its feeling for fact and for interpretation, will be the best criticism of the volume that now lies before us.

The Will to The Deed

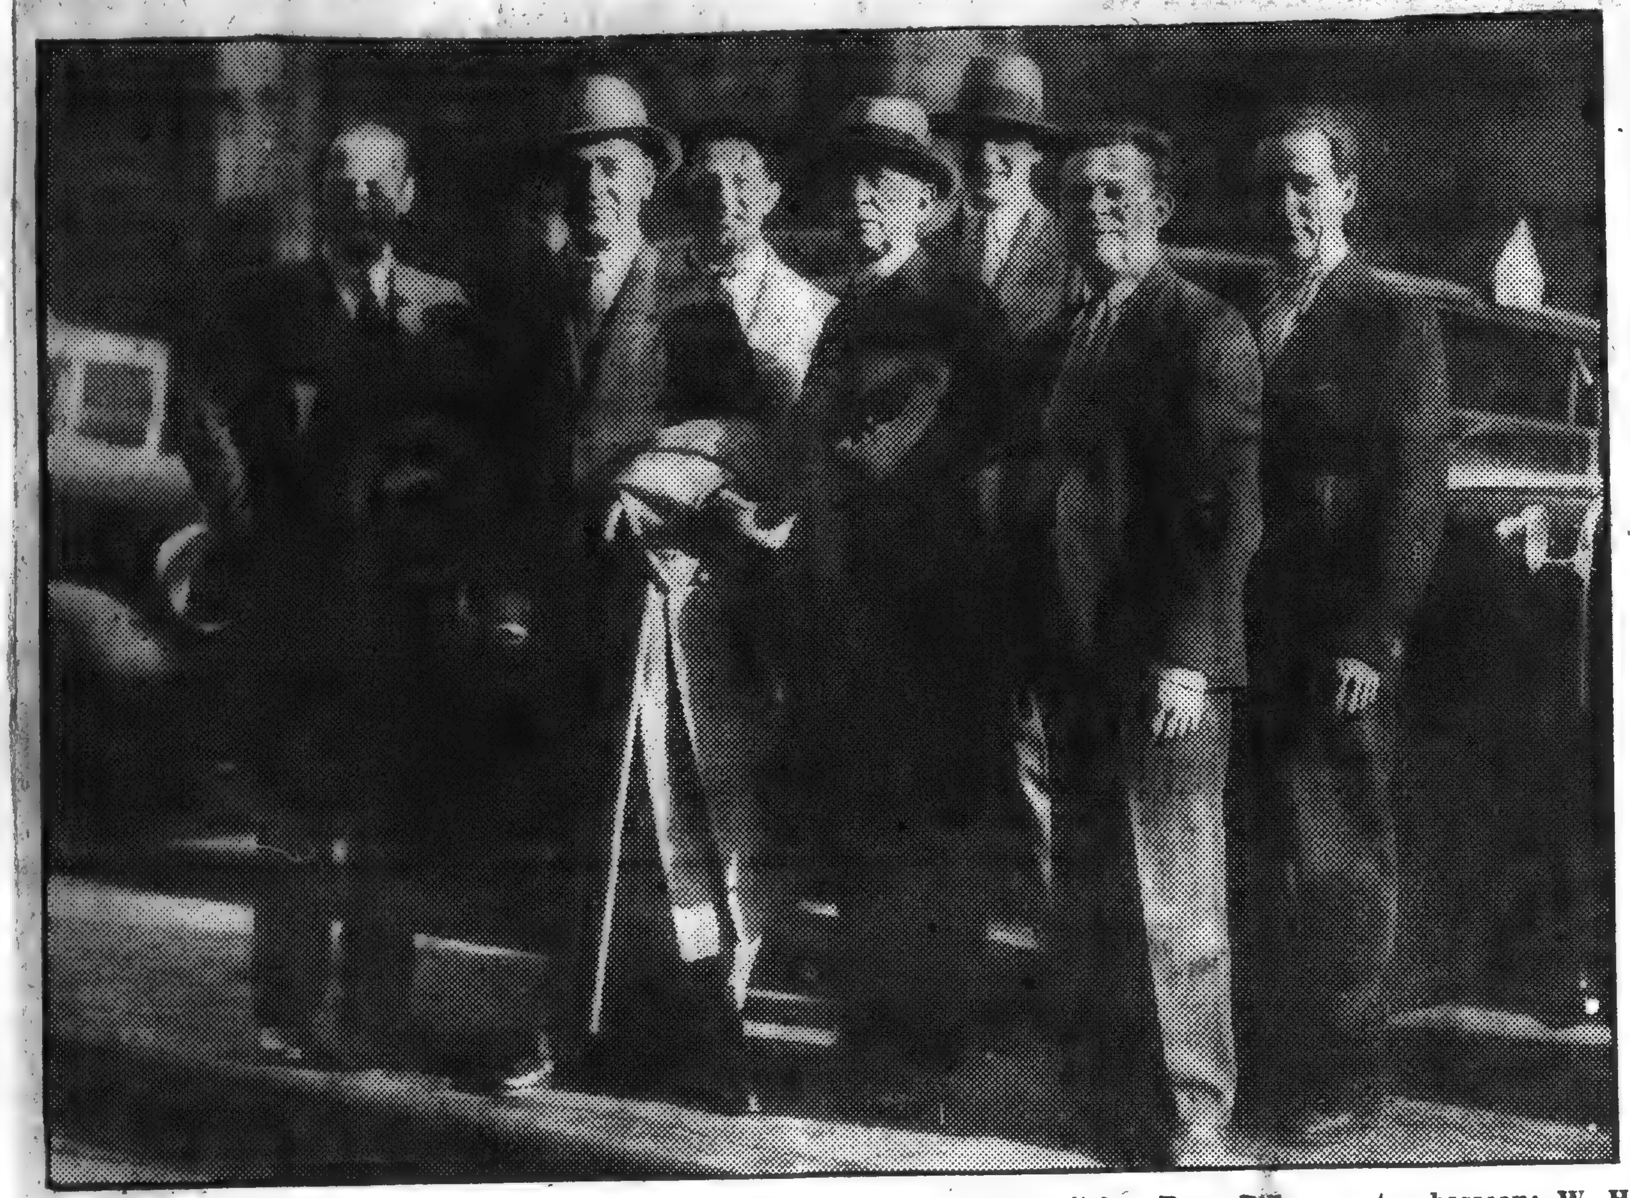
Oct 9

Serge Koussevitzky

For an Eighth Year Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

From a Photograph Taken Last Week by Garo

LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS



Left to right, Leslie Rogers, librarian at Symphony hall; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; Boag Piller, contra bassoon; W. H. Brennan of Symphony hall; Norbert Lauga, violinist; Richard Burgin, concertmeister, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, concert pianist.

Koussevitzky Returns to Boston; Says Orchestra Remains Unchanged

"To a man and to an instrument the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be the same this season as last," announced Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, who arrived in Boston yesterday, from a five-months' trip abroad with Mrs. Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky looked refreshed from his European experience and ready to meet the members of the orchestra for the first of six rehearsals in preparation for the opening concert, Oct. 9.

A number of friends and members of the Boston Symphony were at the Back Bay station to greet Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky when they arrived from New York. The conductor and his wife immediately hurried to their new home at 88 Druce road in the exclusive Fisher Hill section of Brookline. Last night their Russian servants were still busy arranging furniture and there was a driveway.

Apologizing for the slight confusion, Dr. Koussevitzky led the way to his study, where piles of unopened mail lay on his desk. Rapidly he sketched plans for the fall symphonies.

"I am happy to have the same orchestra with me," he said. "And this season our programs will contain more compositions from the great old masters than ever before. In addition to works of Mozart, Bach, Beethoven and others, we will give two symphonies by Gustav Mahler and two by Bruckner.

(Continued on Page Four)

CONDUCTOR SAYS ORCHESTRA WILL NOT BE CHANGED

(Continued from Page One)

"This does not mean, however, that our concerts shall contain nothing of a contemporary nature. But the experimental stage is definitely past and we know who among the new composers have something of interest to offer."

Turning to his European trip, which was spent largely in Paris, with occasional visits to Germany and Austria, Dr. Koussevitzky said:

"I have heard a great deal of music since leaving America in May, and I must say that I am very much disappointed in what I heard and saw. In London, Berlin and Vienna are many fine musicians but they do not have sufficient opportunity to rehearse. Before a big concert two meetings is the rule with three the absolute maximum of rehearsals. Hence their concerts lack the finish which characterizes those given by the Boston, New York and Philadelphia symphony orchestras."

"But why so few rehearsals?" came the question.

The conductor smiled sadly, and spread his hands. "No money," he said simply. "There is no support abroad for music as here. The musicians are paid very poorly. They receive money from the musicians' society, not from the patrons and lovers of music as in this country."

Dr. Koussevitzky is of the opinion that America is more appreciative of good music than any other country in the world, but has not yet produced a distinctive group of composers and so is not entitled to be called a "musical" nation.

The conductor believes that the development of the American composer would be more rapid if more distinguished European authorities on harmony and composition were to be invited to these shores.

Dr. Koussevitzky was greatly surprised at the widespread publicity which attended his refusal to conduct at the Scala Opera House in Milan, Italy, following the fascist attack on Arturo Toscanini in Bologna, last May. It will be recalled that Signor Toscanini was roughly treated by young Facists, and later kept virtually a prisoner in his home, by Fascists who objected because he refused to play either the royal march or the Fascist hymn as a prelude to the concert.

"My reaction to that affair was simply natural. In canceling my contract for the month of June with the Scala Opera House, I did only that which my feeling for a colleague demanded."

In a previous interview, Dr. Koussevitzky referred to the incident as "An unbelievable outrage . . . an offence against the whole artistic world."

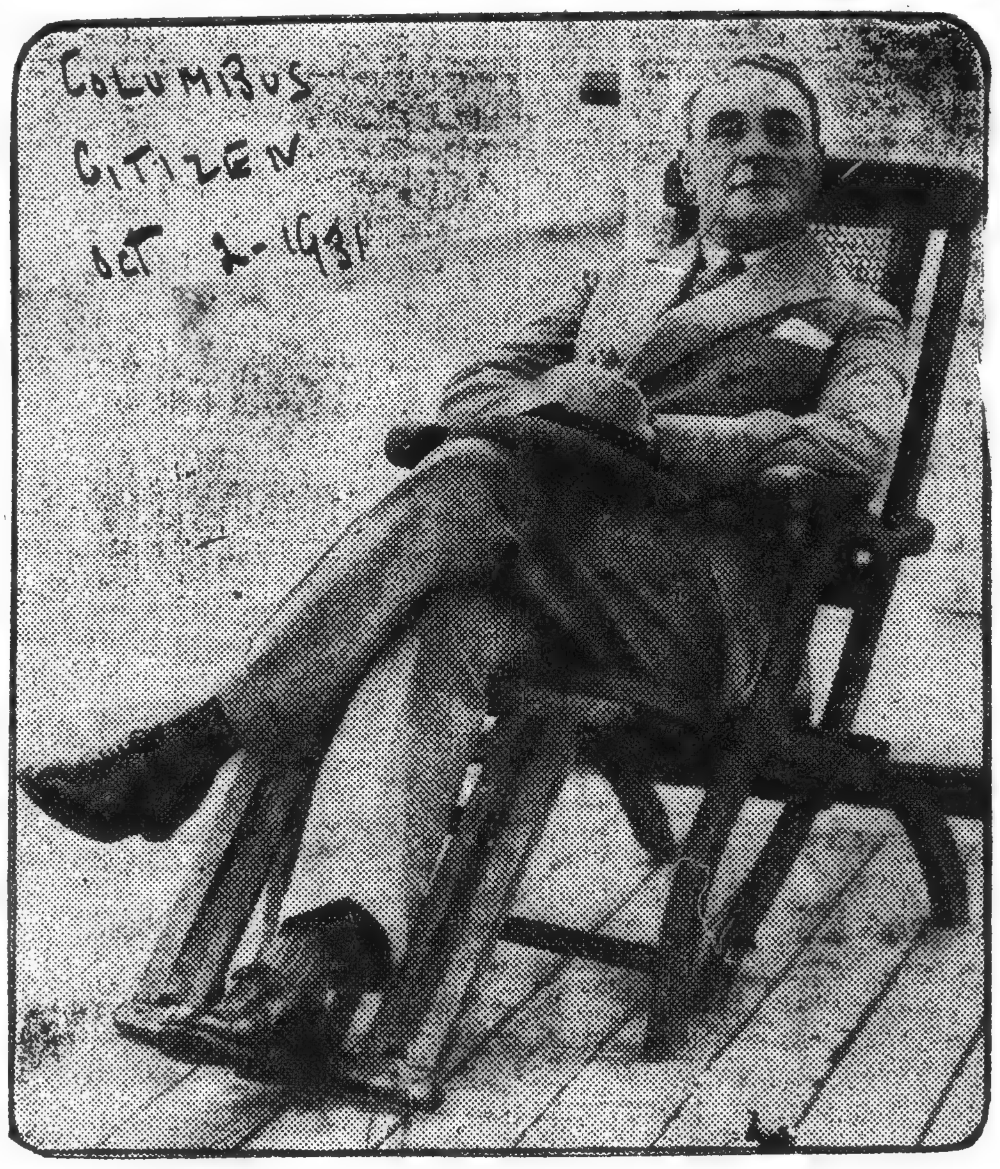
"So, you did not go to Italy at all last summer?" the conductor was asked.

"No," he replied with a smile. "And I suppose I shall not be given a visa for Italy, in the future."

FLIES 26 MILES IN GLIDER

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 30 (AP)—Hawley Bowlus, glider instructor at the Leroy airport, flew from Leroy to Rochester, a distance of 26 miles, today in a motorless ship. Bowlus circled about the city at an altitude of 4800 feet before bringing his glider down at municipal airport. The flight was made in 45 minutes.

ORCHESTRA LEADER BACK



Columbus
Citizen
Oct 2-1931

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived in New York Wednesday afternoon aboard the Ile de France.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that he found the economic depression distinctly increasing the desire for good music. "Music, like religion, affords great comfort and joy when people are depressed," he said. He cited in proof an unprecedented sell-out for the symphony series in Boston.

His season's plans include the performance of important new music, some of which will be the work of American composers.

The Boston Orchestra will make a week's tour of the middle west late in October, including among the six cities to be visited Columbus, where it will be heard Oct. 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

OCT 1 - 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK

Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned to begin his eighth season with the musical organization. The conductor will introduce several new works and novelties.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 2 1931

In the opinion of so well qualified an observer as Serge Kousscvitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it would be a mistake under present conditions to allow our musical activities and our interest in music to lag. Geoffrey O'Hara in his address here before the Community Concert Association the other day emphasized the therapeutic value of music. In the same vein Dr. Koussevitzky, interviewed on his arrival in New York said: "Music is like religion, a comfort and a joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are, the more they crave music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 2 - 1931

In the opinion of so well qualified an observer as Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it would ~~be a~~ mistake under present conditions to allow our musical activities and our interest in music to lag. Geoffrey O'Hara in his address here before the Community Concert Association the other day emphasized the therapeutic value of music. In the same vein Dr. Koussevitzky, interviewed on his arrival in New York said: "Music is like religion, a comfort and a joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are, the more they crave music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Obser

By Walter Brown

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has returned to Boston for the new season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rejoicing, ~~according~~ to the report of an interviewer, in the fact already mentioned in this column that there have been no changes made in the orchestra's personnel; and stating that in the coming season not only will the works of Mozart, Beethoven, Bach and all the old masters be heard but that two Mahler and two Bruckner symphonies will be on his coming programs. Furthermore he said that it was his feeling that "the experimental stage with the works of new composers is definitely past, and we know who, among the new composers, have something of interest to offer."

—

As to the European orchestras Dr. Koussevitzky says that their programs are not given with the finish that characterizes the work of the major orchestras here inasmuch as their conductors may have but two or three rehearsals to prepare the works. "No money" is the explanation he gives for so few rehearsals; and he adds that the musicians are poorly paid—"there is no support abroad for music"!

This is not good news for the music-lover who knows no geography in his regard for a great art; but I do not imagine it is in the nature of news of any kind to the players in our orchestras of the Boston, New York or Philadelphia caliber. These gentlemen are very much better off over here, even if this country is not always regarded abroad as high in the scale of musical culture, than they would be in the very highest positions they could attain in English or Continental orchestras. And they know it. Furthermore they know the quality of the great directors of great American orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 2 - 1931

Guessing Game

THE cables carried word last week to the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the ~~list~~ decided upon for the opening program of its 51st season. Serge Koussevitzky, returning from Europe, ~~had~~ walked the decks and marveled at immensities of sea and sky, while deciding between this musical masterpiece and that.

His decision for Boston may mean nothing for the Columbus concert on Oct. 29. But then, once again, it may. At least it gives us a foundation on which to base our guesses.

Boston subscribers will hear, on Oct. 9 and 10, two choral preludes of Bach, "Schmucke Dich, O Liebe Seele" and "Komm, Gott, Schopfer Heiliger Geist," arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schonberg; Brahm's Fourth Symphony; Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides" and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

The first "tournee" of the orchestra in 1885 under the baton of Wilhelm Gericke extended to Philadelphia. Not until some seasons later was territory as far west as St. Louis included.

Such programs as the one mentioned above would then have been unthinkable. Items long since relegated to "pop" concerts—the Boccherini Minuet in A, the Largo from Handel's "Xerxes," overtures and symphonic poems by forgotten worthies—were staples of the programs.

It is a far different West now than the one through which Gericke made his difficult way, preceded only by Theodore Thomas, who had lured audiences to Beethoven with the bait of a "Traumerei" or a "Linnet Polka." But at that time home audiences were not so sophisticated either. As late as 1900, when Symphony Hall was first opened, a waggish paragrapher wrote that the fire-escapes in the new building were marked, "This way out in case of Brahms."

The Boston Orchestra is one of five which will visit Columbus this year under the sponsorship of the Symphony Club. The famous and familiar organizations from Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati are to follow, with Florence Stage, a pianist native to Columbus, whose American debut will occur next month, and Victor de Gomez, cellist, as soloists. The usual course of four concerts has thus been increased by one.

Season subscriptions may be sent to Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 4 - 1931

FUTURE MU

The coming of the eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a concert at Syria Mosque next month will coincide with the rounding out of the organization's first 50 years. Since its last visit here a new and surpassingly brilliant era has been added to the history of the illustrious organization whose name has so long been associated with the utmost perfection in symphonic performance. Serge Kousevitzky came to America to head this organization in 1924, and has fulfilled the extraordinary reports that had come from Europe about this Russian genius. After the revolution Kousevitzky became the talk of London and Paris on account of his annual series of concerts in each city. Kousevitzky, who has spent the summer in the Austrian Alps, will arrive in America this week and will start rehearsals immediately for the opening of the Boston season.

His concert here on Oct. 30 marks the opening of the symphony concert season in Pittsburgh. Other visiting orchestras coming in the course of six under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association are the Detroit, under Gabrilowitsch; the Cleveland, under Sokoloff; the Chicago, under Frederick Stock, for two visits, and the Minneapolis, under Henri Verbrugghen. Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., is president of the association, and W. S. Arbuthnot and Samuel Harden Church vice presidents.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 2 - 1931

ORCHESTRA LEADER BACK

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived ~~in New York~~ Wednesday afternoon aboard the Ile de France.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that he found the ~~economic~~ depression distinctly increasing the desire for good music. "Music, like religion, affords great comfort and joy when people are depressed," he said. He cited in proof an unprecedented sell-out for the symphony series in Boston.

His season's plans include the performance of important new music, some of which will be the work of American composers.

The Boston Orchestra will make a week's tour of the middle west late in October, including among the six cities to be visited Columbus, where it will be heard Oct. 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

OCT 3 193

* * *

Boston Symphony Season To Open

~~Its personnel~~ of 111 players unchanged from last year, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 51st season Oct. 9 in Symphony hall in the first of a total of 107 concerts arranged for Boston and elsewhere which will provide for the orchestra one of the busiest seasons in its career.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will direct the orchestra for the eighth successive season, returned from Europe Sept. 29 and immediately assembled the players in preparation for the season's opening. Mr. Koussevitzky has spent the greater part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his Paris home.

As in other years the orchestra will give 15 concerts in Greater New York, and during the week of Oct. 26 will tour the middle West, making appearances at Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven (under the auspices of Wellesley College, Smith College and Yale University), also Hartford and Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

OCT 4 - 1931

Music

Music, said Koussevitzky upon his return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week, "Music is like religion, a comfort and a joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are, the more they crave music."

The Monday Musical Club ought to use this as an argument to fill the Stambaugh Auditorium for its concert course this year. We need music and the radio is no substitute for hearing the great artists themselves. Everyone who buys a ticket to the Monday Musical course makes an investment which will pay liberal dividends in pleasure, in mental stimulus and in spiritual strengthening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

OCT 3 - 1931

CONCERT~MUSIC RECORDS

Those New Discs — A Portable "Mikado" — More "Meistersinger"

TO the three extant recordings of Ravel's "La Valse," Victor has added one by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky (7413-4). This edition is the best, mechanically, now available, especially in the misty opening. The recent Brunswick set (née Polydor) by the Lamoureux Orchestra and Albert Wolff is more languishing and more fanciful, but some listeners may prefer the businesslike and high-paced reading of Koussevitzky. The new issue consumes three discs, the spare being devoted to a fine performance of a Debussy dance in a Ravel orchestration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

However, there are some cheerful moments. Serge Koussevitzky returns from abroad filled with plans which are good; and he comforts us with compliments on our national musical discrimination. He draws contrast between the great American orchestras, such as those of Boston, New York and Philadelphia, and European organizations, to our credit—the difference, he tells interviewers, being due to lack of rehearsals over across—and this lack being due to lack of funds. So we come to the point, that music is more generously supported in this country. Yet we are not, in his estimation, quite yet a "musical nation," because we have not developed a distinctive group of composers.

Dr Koussevitzky hits close to an American characteristic which applies in a wider field than that of music. It is our passion to look on, and pay to do so. Our national game is baseball; but it is a show rather than a sport. We are not a pugnacious people: but prize fights draw even the elect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 3 - 1931

Modern Classics

The announcement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that his programs during the coming season will include more compositions of "the great old masters" than ever before does not mark the downfall of musical modernism. On the contrary, it signalizes its triumph. The "old masters" are welcomed back to the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—from which, indeed, they have never been banished,—because in the opinion of Dr. Koussevitzky the period of experimentation with the modern composers is now over. After protracted trials, the sheep have been separated from the goats. The latter, presumably, will be cast into outer darkness, where they no longer will distress the tympani of elder subscribers, while the remaining few will be invited to sit on the right hand of Bach and Beethoven and Brahms.

For the belief of Dr. Koussevitzky that composers who, a few years ago, were looked upon as musical anarchists have now been accepted in good symphonic society, much substantiation is to be found. The day is long past when the name of Strawinsky brought a look of horror to the face of the musically orthodox. If "Le Sacre du Printemps" remains strong meat to many, "Petrouchka" is not, while "The Fire Bird" is now taken neat by even the most provincial audiences, as though it were so much Rimsky Korsakoff. The music of Prokofieff, of Honegger,—whose oratorio, "King David," promises to become as popular as "The Messiah,"—of Schonberg is undergoing the same fate, and only the few composers who sought to make idiosyncracy a virtue are suffering. How readily the modern idiom has been accepted is demonstrated by the fact that Ravel's "Bolero" is now the basis for an applauded scene in a new musical revue.

The transformation of a musical rebel into a respected composer is nothing new. It has been going on ever since the art developed. Listeners with many years of concert-going still ahead of them can recall the days when Brahms was denounced as writing unintelligibly, when Wagner was accused of playing hob with sound rules of composition, when Debussy was considered an insolent pretender. Now, apparently, it is the turn of the moderns to confound their critics by slipping into the ranks of the classics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

OCT 1 - 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY BACK

Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has returned to begin his eighth season with the musical organization. The conductor will introduce several new works and novelties.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 2 1931

In the opinion of so well qualified an observer as Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it would be a mistake under present conditions to allow our musical activities and our interest in music to lag. Geoffrey O'Hara in his address here before the Community Concert Association the other day emphasized the therapeutic value of music. In the same vein Dr. Koussevitzky, interviewed on his arrival in New York said: "Music is like religion, a comfort and a joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are, the more they crave music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 2 - 1931

In the opinion of so well qualified an observer as Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, it would be a mistake under present conditions to allow our musical activities and our interest in music to lag. Geoffrey O'Hara in his address here before the Community Concert Association the other day emphasized the therapeutic value of music. In the same vein Dr. Koussevitzky, interviewed on his arrival in New York said: "Music is like religion, a comfort and a joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are, the more they crave music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Observ

By Walter Brown

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has returned to Boston for the new season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rejoicing, according to the report of an interviewer, in the fact already mentioned in this column that there have been no changes made in the orchestra's personnel; and stating that in the coming season not only will the works of Mozart, Beethoven, Bach and all the old masters be heard but that two Mahler and two Bruckner symphonies will be on his coming programs. Furthermore he said that it was his feeling that "the experimental stage with the works of new composers is definitely past, and we know who, among the new composers, have something of interest to offer."

As to the European orchestras Dr. Koussevitzky says that their programs are not given with the finish that characterizes the work of the major orchestras here inasmuch as their conductors may have but two or three rehearsals to prepare the works. "No money" is the explanation he gives for so few rehearsals; and he adds that the musicians are poorly paid—"there is no support abroad for music"!

This is not good news for the music-lover who knows no geography in his regard for a great art; but I do not imagine it is in the nature of news of any kind to the players in our orchestras of the Boston, New York or Philadelphia caliber. These gentlemen are very much better off over here, even if this country is not always regarded abroad as high in the scale of musical culture, than they would be in the very highest positions they could attain in English or Continental orchestras. And they know it. Furthermore they know the quality of the great directors of great American orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 2 - 1931

Guessing Game

THE cables carried word last week to the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the ~~last~~ decided upon for the opening program of its 51st season. Serge Koussevitzky, returning from Europe, had walked the decks and marveled at immensities of sea and sky, while deciding between this musical masterpiece and that.

His decision for Boston may mean nothing for the Columbus concert on Oct. 29. But then, once again, it may. At least it gives us a foundation on which to base our guesses.

Boston subscribers will hear, on Oct. 9 and 10, two choral preludes of Bach, "Schmucke Dich, O Liebe Seele" and "Komm, Gott, Schopfer Heiliger Geist," arranged for orchestra by Arnold Schonberg; Brahm's Fourth Symphony; Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides" and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

The first "tournee" of the orchestra in 1885 under the baton of Wilhelm Gericke extended to Philadelphia. Not until some seasons later was territory as far west as St. Louis included.

Such programs as the one mentioned above would then have been unthinkable. Items long since relegated to "pop" concerts—the Boccherini Minuet in A, the Largo from Handel's "Xerxes," overtures and symphonic poems by forgotten worthies—were staples of the programs.

It is a far different West now than the one through which Gericke made his difficult way, preceded only by Theodore Thomas, who had lured audiences to Beethoven with the bait of a "Traumerei" or a "Linnet Polka." But at that time home audiences were not so sophisticated either. As late as 1900, when Symphony Hall was first opened, a waggish paragrapher wrote that the fire-escapes in the new building were marked, "This way out in case of Brahms."

The Boston Orchestra is one of five which will visit Columbus this year under the sponsorship of the Symphony Club. The famous and familiar organizations from Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Cincinnati are to follow, with Florence Stage, a pianist native to Columbus, whose American debut will occur next month, and Victor de Gomez, cellist, as soloists. The usual course of four concerts has thus been increased by one.

Season subscriptions may be sent to Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 4 - 1931

FUTURE MU

The coming of the eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a concert at Syria Mosque next month will coincide with the rounding out of the organization's first 50 years. Since its last visit here a new and surpassingly brilliant era has been added to the history of the illustrious organization whose name has so long been associated with the utmost perfection in symphonic performance. Serge Kousevitzky came to America to head this organization in 1924, and has fulfilled the extraordinary reports that had come from Europe about this Russian genius. After the revolution Kousevitzky became the talk of London and Paris on account of his annual series of concerts in each city. Kousevitzky, who has spent the summer in the Austrian Alps, will arrive in America this week and will start rehearsals immediately for the opening of the Boston season.

His concert here on Oct. 30 marks the opening of the symphony concert season in Pittsburgh. Other visiting orchestras coming in the course of six under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association are the Detroit, under Gabrilowitsch; the Cleveland, under Sokoloff; the Chicago, under Frederick Stock, for two visits, and the Minneapolis, under Henri Verbrugghen. Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., is president of the association, and W. S. Arbuthnot and Samuel Harden Church vice presidents.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
OCT 2 - 1931

ORCHESTRA LEADER BACK

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived in New York Wednesday afternoon aboard the Ile de France.

Dr. Koussevitzky said that he found the economic depression distinctly increasing the desire for good music. "Music, like religion, affords great comfort and joy when people are depressed," he said. He cited in proof an unprecedented sell-out for the symphony series in Boston.

His season's plans include the performance of important new music, some of which will be the work of American composers.

The Boston Orchestra will make a week's tour of the middle west late in October, including among the six cities to be visited Columbus, where it will be heard Oct. 29.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

OCT 3 193

* * *

Boston Symphony Season To Open

Its personnel of 111 players unchanged from last year, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 51st season Oct. 9 in Symphony hall in the first of a total of 107 concerts arranged for Boston and elsewhere which will provide for the orchestra one of the busiest seasons in its career.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will direct the orchestra for the eighth successive season, returned from Europe Sept. 29 and immediately assembled the players in preparation for the season's opening. Mr. Koussevitzky has spent the greater part of the summer in the Austrian Alps and at his Paris home.

As in other years the orchestra will give 15 concerts in Greater New York, and during the week of Oct. 26 will tour the middle West, making appearances at Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca.

New England appearances will include, in addition to the Boston series, four in Providence, and single concerts at Wellesley, Northampton, New Haven (under the auspices of Wellesley College, Smith College and Yale University), also Hartford and Springfield.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

OCT 4 - 1931

Music

Music, said Koussevitzky upon his return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week, "Music is like religion, a comfort and a joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are, the more they crave music."

The Monday Musical Club ought to use this as an argument to fill the Stambaugh Auditorium for its concert course this year. We need music and the radio is no substitute for hearing the great artists themselves. Everyone who buys a ticket to the Monday Musical course makes an investment which will pay liberal dividends in pleasure, in mental stimulus and in spiritual strengthening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORKER

OCT 3 - 1931

CONCERT~MUSIC RECORDS

Those New Discs — A Portable "Mikado" — More "Meistersinger"

TO the three extant recordings of Ravel's "La Valse," Victor has added one by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky (7413-4). This edition is the best, mechanically, now available, especially in the misty opening. The recent Brunswick set (née Polydor) by the Lamoureux Orchestra and Albert Wolff is more languishing and more fanciful, but some listeners may prefer the businesslike and high-paced reading of Koussevitzky. The new issue consumes three discs, the spare being devoted to a fine performance of a Debussy dance in a Ravel orchestration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 8 - 1931

However, there are some cheerful moments. Serge Koussevitzky returns from abroad filled with plans which are good; and he comforts us with compliments on our national musical discrimination. He draws contrast between the great American orchestras such as those of Boston, New York and Philadelphia, and European organizations, to our credit—the difference, he tells interviewers, being due to lack of rehearsals over across—and this lack being due to lack of funds. So we come to the point, that music is more generously supported in this country. Yet we are not, in his estimation, quite yet a "musical nation," because we have not developed a distinctive group of composers.

Dr Koussevitzky hits close to an American characteristic which applies in a wider field than that of music. It is our passion to look on, and pay to do so. Our national game is baseball; but it is a show rather than a sport. We are not a pugnacious people; but prize fights draw even the elect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 3 - 1931

Modern Classics

The announcement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that his programs during the coming season will include more compositions of "the great old masters" than ever before does not mark the downfall of musical modernism. On the contrary, it signalizes its triumph. The "old masters" are welcomed back to the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—from which, indeed, they have never been banished,—because in the opinion of Dr. Koussevitzky the period of experimentation with the modern composers is now over. After protracted trials, the sheep have been separated from the goats. The latter, presumably, will be cast into outer darkness, where they no longer will distress the tympani of elder subscribers, while the remaining few will be invited to sit on the right hand of Bach and Beethoven and Brahms.

For the belief of Dr. Koussevitzky that composers who, a few years ago, were looked upon as musical anarchists have now been accepted in good symphonic society, much substantiation is to be found. The day is long past when the name of Strawinsky brought a look of horror to the face of the musically orthodox. If "Le Sacre du Printemps" remains strong meat to many, "Petrouchka" is not, while "The Fire Bird" is now taken neat by even the most provincial audiences, as though it were so much Rimsky Korsakoff. The music of Prokofieff, of Honegger,—whose oratorio, "King David," promises to become as popular as "The Messiah,"—of Schonberg is undergoing the same fate, and only the few composers who sought to make idiosyncracy a virtue are suffering. How readily the modern idiom has been accepted is demonstrated by the fact that Ravel's "Bolero" is now the basis for an applauded scene in a new musical revue.

The transformation of a musical rebel into a respected composer is nothing new. It has been going on ever since the art developed. Listeners with many years of concert-going still ahead of them can recall the days when Brahms was denounced as writing unintelligibly, when Wagner was accused of playing hob with sound rules of composition, when Debussy was considered an insolent pretender. Now, apparently, it is the turn of the moderns to confound their critics by slipping into the ranks of the classics.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. REVIEW

OCT 3 - 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS TO PLAY LESS NEW MUSIC

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky Says Enough Experimentation Has Been Done for the Present—Cincinnati Orchestra Faces a Financial Crisis Which May End Its Long Career

Four orchestras of other cities, two of which customarily visit New York, have announced the plans of their respective seasons.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present programs which will emphasize the classics more than formerly, while including as usual many new works. In view of Mr. Koussevitzky's consistent crusading in the field of contemporary composition, his comment on this is particularly interesting.

"I have changed my idea of modern music," he said in part. "I think the period of experimentation is no more. During the past seven years I have devoted much of my time and energy to new compositions. Now . . . our outlook is much clearer . . . a great number of works highly appreciated a few years ago have completely disappeared. It seems to me we have reached a definite stage in the twentieth century music. A slow but definite selection is becoming apparent and I feel it is our duty to co-operate toward its achievement to the best of our ability, for the sake of the art of music. I do not wish to say that we must not play new compositions, but it is necessary to appreciate what we must play and what we must not. Composers like Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Hindemith, and Honegger are already 'classified'; their works can not any longer be considered new music; they are almost classics for us."

It need not be inferred from the above, however, that Mr. Koussevitzky has regressed from his position as a champion of new works. The orchestra's programs for the forthcoming season prove the contrary. They will present world premieres of the following: Sibelius' Eighth Symphony, Rachmaninoff's "Etudes-Tableaux" orchestrated by Respighi, Arnold Bax's piano concerto, Aaron Copland's "Symphony-Ode," Anton Webern's "Six Little Pieces for Great Orchestra," Martelli's "Concerto Grosso," Ernest Toch's "Suite," Florent Schmitt's piano concerto with the composer as soloist, Philip Lazar's "Concerto Grosso No. 2," and Lambert's Music for Orchestra. Most of these composers, however, are established and have earned the right to have their new output considered seriously. There will also be Haydn, Mozart and two Stravinsky festivals and an all-American program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 9 - 1931

Sergei Koussevitzky, who recently celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his career as an orchestral conductor and the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he has been the director since 1924, is the subject of the biography "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch," to be published today by Alfred A. Knopf. The book is by Arthur Lourie, a Russian musical friend of the musician. The book contains sixteen illustrations.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN CITIZEN

OCT 1 9 [illegible]

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who returned on the Ile de France last Tuesday, began rehearsals this week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the opening of its season next Friday in Symphony Hall, Boston. The Boston Symphony will make its first Brooklyn appearance on Friday evening, Nov. 20. The dates for its other concerts in Brooklyn this season are: Jan. 8, Feb. , Mar. 4 and April 8.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 9 - 1931

"Fifty Singing Years"

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1881. Its originator, Henry L. Higginson, had selected for its first conductor a German musician, Georg Henschel, who, though but 31, was known throughout musical Europe as an accomplished singer, pianist, conductor and composer. He was a close friend of Brahms, who had not then grown into universal respect, and was an ardent champion of his works.

The 50th anniversary year of the orchestra, the season of 1930-31, began with a remarkable re-enactment of the past. The first director, long an English citizen, now Sir George Henschel, came from England, a man over 80, to conduct his original program of Oct. 22, 1881.

M. A. DeWolfe Howe says in his history of the orchestra that this bit of history repeating itself was a great moment for those few in the audience who remembered Henschel in the 80's; and a greater one for those super-elect who attended the first concert of all.

"No member of the original orchestra now sat under him, but two of the small company still surviving were present.

"But it was Sir George's day—what other conductor, one wondered, has ever lived to do just this? Through rehearsals, concerts, receptions, he moved, buoyant, keen, tireless, his beat as sure as his step was springy."

Henschel is of particular interest to us here in Columbus from the fact that he chose a wife who was a native of this city—Lillian Bailey. She was a beautiful woman and an accomplished singer. Elder concertgoers remember delightful duet recitals with her at which Mr. Henschel served as both pianist and singer.

On Oct. 29, Serge Koussevitzky will bring the orchestra, grown from 72 to 113 players, to the city from which his distinguished predecessor took his bride.

The Symphony Club is responsible for the concert, as it is also for appearances here of the orchestras from Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland. Subscriptions for the five concerts may be had from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 1 1 [illegible]

A Boston concertgoer who wants fewer "novelties" and more of the less familiar old compositions played by the Boston Symphony orchestra advances his proposal on the ground of economy. But has "economy" suddenly become so popular that it can be used to clinch any argument?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

[illegible]

The fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky then conducted two Choral Preludes of Bach-Schonberg, Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Franck's "Les Eolides," and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," second suite. The first notable revival of the season will be Mahler's Ninth Symphony, which is to be performed in Boston next Friday and Saturday. This will be the first performance in America of the work. Symphonies of Mahler and Bruckner will figure upon Koussevitzky's programs this year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ANN ARBOR, MICH
NEWS

OCT 9 1931

Symphony Orchestra Lauded by Boston Music Critic

The following item in the Boston Transcript under date of Sept. 30, will be of interest to local concert goers in view of the fact that the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Koussevitzky, will appear in this season's Choral Union series, Oct. 27:

"Koussevitzky the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises. The Symphony's great leader exerts a stimulating effect which a trafficker in hyperbole might almost liken to that of the ultra-violet ray. Occasionally it shocks, it may even burn, for it embodies an energy at high tension, but for the most part its influence is strengthening and therapeutic. This could not be so, of course, were the conductor merely a remarkable individualist, as undoubtedly he is. The wealth of his rosource finds it broader explanation in the excellence of the orchestra itself, and beyond that, in the inherited fund of the Western World's greatest music, a fund to which the mastern of many centuries have contributed.

"The restful and spiritually strengthening service of noble music Koussevitzky himself recognized in the remarks he made yesterday, at the moment of his return from abroad. "Music is like religion," he said, "a comfort and joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are the more they crave music." We believe this is so, and welcome the approach of the New Symphony season both for the stimulus it will give and the restoring power of its tranquillities and of tis moments of musical majesty."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 9 - 1931

Symphony Orchestra Lauded by Boston Music Critic

The following item in the Boston Transcript under date of Sept. 30, will be of interest to local concert goers in view of the fact that the Boston Symphony orchestra, under [illegible] will appear in this season's Choral Union series, Oct. 27:

"Koussevitzky the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises. The Symphony's great leader exerts a stimulating effect which a trafficker in hyperbole might almost liken to that of the ultra-violet ray. Occasionally it shocks, it may even burn, for it embodies an energy at high tension, but for the most part its influence is strengthening and therapeutic. This could not be so, of course, were the conductor merely a remarkable individualist, as undoubtedly he is. The wealth of his rosource finds it broader explanation in the excellence of the orchestra itself, and beyond that, in the inherited fund of the Western World's greatest music, a fund to which the mastern of many centuries have contributed.

"The restful and spiritually strengthening service of noble music Koussevitzky himself recognized in the remarks he made yesterday, at the moment of his return from abroad. "Music is like religion," he said, "a comfort and joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are the more they crave music." We believe this is so, and welcome the approach of the New Symphony season both for the stimulus it will give and the restoring power of its tranquillities and of tis moments of musical majesty."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

OCT 1 1 1931

Boston Orchestra To Play Ann Arbor

SERGI KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, upon his arrival from Europe, announced that the programmes of the Boston Orchestra this season will include works of many American composers.

Reports from the Boston headquarters of the orchestra indicate that the full advance Symphony Hall subscription has already been reached.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its complete personnel of 111 men, is scheduled to give a concert at Masonic Auditorium, Detroit, Wednesday evening, October 28. The Orchestra is also announced for an appearance at Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, October 27, when an entirely different programme will be played.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 1 1 1931

Hard to Get in Boston; Easy for Central Ohio

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Columbus, Oct. 29, the first attraction on the 1931-32 series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, it will leave in its home city thousands of music lovers who have not yet heard a current season concert, and may not hear one the entire year.

In view of the fact that the orchestra offers no fewer than nine series in its own district, and even then is not able to play to all of the people who wish to hear it, Columbus may count itself particularly fortunate in being able to entertain the country's oldest symphony group in Memorial Hall, where seats will be found to accommodate all who apply, and prices have been arranged to suit every pocketbook.

So great is the demand in Boston for tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts that seats for all of its nine series are engaged in advance by subscription. In certain series, such as the 24 Friday afternoon and the 24 Saturday evening concerts in Boston, such seats as are released each spring are allotted to those upon the waiting lists, so that there is no public sale for these series.

It is, therefore, next to impossible for anyone other than a subscriber to buy a reserved seat for a Boston Symphony concert in Boston.

Box office ticket sale opens Oct. 19, at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Until then, tickets for the series, or for any single concert, may be obtained from Mrs. Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

Complete program for the 1931-32 Symphony Club series follows:

Boston Symphony Club ..	Oct. 29
Detroit Symphony	Dec. 1
Cincinnati Symphony ...	Feb. 8
Cleveland Orchestra	Mar. 7
Chicago Symphony	Apr. 5

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

[illegible]

HOLD CONCERT HERE OCT. 26

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Koussevitzky, to Play in Music Hall

Four members of the Boston Symphony orchestra which plays at Elmwood Music hall Monday evening, Oct. 26, have been members of the orchestra for 50 years.

During that time they have played in thousands of concerts and under such famed conductors as Sir George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Dr. Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and now Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

When the original orchestra was formed it contained only 60 men. Today, ranked among the great musical organizations in America, it numbers 110 musicians.

In size ,in schedule, in cultured influence and in prestige the Boston Symphony orchestra has grown rapidly.

Under the guiding hand of a succession of great conductors the orchestra had achieved fame in cymphonic performance.

And of all those conductors, Koussevitzky probably is the greatest. He has been conductor since 1924.

The concert at Elmwood Music hall Oct. 26 is the first in a series of four being presented this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

Others are the Cleveland orchestra, under Sokoloff, Monday, Nov. 30; Detroit Symphony, with Gabrilowitsch, Tuesday, Dec. 8; and the Chicago Symphony, under Stock, Tuesday, Jan. 19. Season tickets still are available.

Miss Marian de Forest, manager of the Foundation, has a limited supply of rotogravure souvenirs of the Boston Symphony orchestra which she is distributing to those interested.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

[illegible] 1 1931

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-first season last Friday afternoon and yesterday evening in Symphony Hall, Boston, where Serge Koussevitzky conducted two Bach chorale preludes, arranged by Schonberg; Brahms's fourth symphony, Franck's "Les Eolides" and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe"

Gustav Mahler's ninth symphony is the principal number on Dr. Koussevitzky's programs for next Friday and Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

[illegible]

The Boston Syphony will give the "first American performance" of Gustav Mahler's Ninth symphony next Friday in Boston. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 1 3 [illegible]

Koussevitzky Praises Our Musical Public

Serge Koussevitsky, in an interview, described music in America as it has impressed him during his experience as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, coming to Columbus soon to open the Symphony club course.

"A phenomenal musical rennaissance" was the keynote of what he told the French reporters who sought him at his home on the Rue Colignon in Paris.

"Americans have the active temperament," he declared. "Everyone is active, and especially the women. Therefore they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

In this connection Dr. Koussevitzky made the following statement: "What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. In Europe one finds always a certain circle who attend concerts, but in America it is the rank and file who form an enthusiastic audience."

Dr. Koussevitzky gave as specific instances of America's musical development "her twenty superb orchestras," and also "her promising young composers, such as Aaron Copland, Roger Sessions and Carpenter."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

OCT 1 1 1931

MUSIC

By MARY B. SWAN

Artists in Orchestra

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, plays at Elmwood Music Hall Monday evening, October 6th, Buffalo music lovers will have the opportunity of listening to an assemblage of rare virtuosi. It is historical that the greatness of the orchestra is due largely to the eminent qualities of the men who make up its personnel. The finest masters of each instrument which Europe and America has produced, always have been engaged to lead each section.

The concert master's chair is now held by Richard Burgin, the celebrated Russian musician. Mr. Burgin, who had been concert master to more than one great European conductor, was equally admired for the recitals and activities in chamber music. Known in America not only by his appearances as soloist with the orchestra, but by many recitals and by the string quartet and trio which bear his name, he was appointed the regular assistant conductor of the orchestra last year.

Julius Theodorowicz, the second concert master, was one of the original Kneisel quartet. Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist, is one of the finest in the world. Jean Lafranc, leader of the violas, is a virtuoso of the same sort. Masters of the rarest quality also are Georges Laurent, with the flute; Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Victor Polatschek, first clarinet; Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, the English horn virtuoso.

When these 110 musicians play at Elmwood Music Hall under the direction of Koussevitzky, they will be starting the 51st season for the orchestra, and will open the regular season for the Buffalo Musical Foundation. Three other orchestras will be heard in Buffalo during the winter in the Musical Foundation series, the Cleveland orchestra under Sokoloff, November 30th; the Detroit, with Gabrilowitsch conducting, Tuesday, December 8th, and the Chicago, under Stock's baton, Tuesday, January 19th. Season tickets still are available at the office of the Buffalo Musical Foundation in Denton, Cottier & Daniels. Season subscribers, in addition to having the same seats all season, get the four concerts at the single sale price of three.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 1 6 1931

Boston Program

AFTER a number of long distance conferences between Mrs. B. G. Huntington, president of the Symphony Club, and the authorities at Symphony Hall, the program has finally crystallized for the Columbus concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 29.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen as his major work the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. One of several which has been dubbed (by others than the composer) the "Pastoral," it is one of the more delightful and one of the less persistently repeated of the nine.

The list also contains the Handel Concerto Grosso for strings, number 12, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and, for modernity's sake, Ravel's "La Valse."

A story newly come out of Boston contains a hint that Dr. Koussevitzky may henceforth be barred from Italy, on account of his refusal to conduct at the Milan opera last summer following the insults to which Arturo Toscanini had been subjected. The Italian conductor, it will be remembered, had refused to conduct the Fascist Hymn as prelude to a concert at Bologna, and was handled very roughly by a group of young Fascisti. He was virtually kept prisoner in his home for weeks after.

Koussevitzky was one of a number of world famous conductors who protested at the outrage to a great colleague, and his chivalry, he fears, will prevent the necessary visas from being put on future passports.

The Symphony Club's downtown box office will open Monday at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 1 6 1931

Musical Notes

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony orchestra began the fifty-first season of its career with concerts last Friday and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, which actually open the musical season in Boston. Closely following these events was the U. S. Navy Band concert and Fritz Kreisler's appearance.

Beside the regular series the orchestra will present six concerts for children, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin. Members of the orchestra will also take part in a special children's series of four concerts conducted by Ernest Schelling.

At the end of October the orchestra will make a fairly extensive tour, playing in Buffalo, Cincinnati, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca. Its New York appearances will include the usual series of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Four concerts will be given in Providence, and the orchestra will also appear during the coming season in New Haven, Hartford, Springfield and Northampton. Nearer home, it will be heard in the long-established Cambridge series at Sanders Theater, Harvard University.

Serge Koussevitzky returns to begin rehearsals for his eighth season with the Boston Symphony in the Isle de France, due Tuesday, September 29, and probably will announce at that time some of the novelties and special features of the new season.

In a recent editorial in "The Boston Herald," Philip Hale quoted an interview with the conductor in "Candide," of Paris. "Dr. Koussevitzky said," writes Mr. Hale, "that he purposed in the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to perform a symphony by Ferroud, works by Florent Schmitt, Stravinsky, Toch, Carpenter and by young Martelli, who interests me greatly." He will repeat performances of Roussel's suite in F and his third symphony. There will be 'monumental works' as Mahler's sixth and ninth symphonies, 'for which the public is now prepared.'

Besides the activities of the orchestra, a feature of the coming Boston music season will be a double subscription recital series at Symphony Hall. Rosa Ponselle, the Don Cossack Choir, Yehudi Menuhin, Lawrence Tibbett and J. M. Sanroma will be heard in the afternoon series and Lily Pons, John Goss and the London Singers, La Argentina, Walter Gieseking and Roland Hayes will appear in the evening series.

SIEGE AND CAPTURE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 1 6 1931

News, Gossip and Announcements of Forthcoming Music of the Season

Jose Iturbi, pianist, arrives today on the steamship De Grasse for his third American tour. He will give his first concert in New York on November 29 in Carnegie Hall, when he will play for the first time several new pieces by contemporary French and Spanish composers. On the same vessel is Dino Borgioli, Italian tenor, who wll make his first American tour.

The New York engagement of the Carl Rosa Opera Company will be from January 18 to February 26 in the Jolson Theatre, the repertory including twenty-four operas in English.

The cast for the performance of "Hansel and Gretel" in English in Town Hall Saturday, October 31 at 11 A. M. is: H. Wellington Smith, Eleanor Eberhardt, Catherine Gollala, Norma Shelman, Jean Kalis, Adele Epstein and Aleta Dore.

Victor Chenkin, Russian singing actor, will include two entirely new groups of character songs—Polish and Spanish—in his program for November 1 in the Guild Theatre. Other recitals will be December 27 and January 3.

John McCormack's coast-to-coast tour this season will bring him to the Westchester County Center at White Plains, October 27. The tour began in Salt Lake City and every concert has been given to packed houses.

Two first performances are announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert next week in that city—a new orchestration by Respighi of Rachmaninoff's Five Etudes and Harold Morris's Concerto for piano in which the composer will play the piano part.

John Amans, first flutist, and Theodore Cella, first harpist, of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will be soloists tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall in the first performance by the orchestra of Mozart's Concerto in C major for those instruments.

Rubinoff, the popular violinist, and orchestra conductor is back today to the Paramount Theatre and will conduct the orchestra in an overture anthology of "Rose Songs" featuring compositions by Rudolf Friml, Chauncey Olcott, Hayden Wood, John Openshaw and Neil Moret.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

Symphony Leader Is Severely Criticized

While admitting the Boston symphony is probably the best in the world, a Boston reviewer found fault with Koussevitzky, for the lack of new music in his program, and for "injecting interpretive dramatizations in the Bach chorales and in the passadaglia finale of the Brahms." Each of these composers needs no interpretive dramatizing, their music being eloquent in nobility and seeming simplicty, wthout any touch of the theatrical, the reviewer observed.

Koussevitzky also was charged with "conceiving the Bach interpretations in quite the wrong spirit." All of which goes to show how severe some critics are toward even the greatest among artists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT

STAGE and STUDIO

THE coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to give a concert here Oct. 29 will coincide with the rounding out of the organization's first fifty years. The oldest and one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world does Columbus partncular honor in including this city in its extra-schedule tour, which is extended only to five other cities. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor of the orchestra.

The box office, where series books or single concert tickets may be obtained up until the night of the concert, will be open tomorrow at the Carl Koch company, Third and Broad streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 1 3 1931

The Boston Symphony gave the "first American performance" of Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony last Friday.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 1 8 1931

RUSSIAN BOY'S GREAT CAREER

Serge Koussevitzky Ran Away From Home to Study Music

BECAME VIRTUOSO

Chooses Double Bass as Vehicle—Later Wins Publishing Fame

By DEEMS TAYLOR

Copyright, 1931, by Universal Service

NEW YORK, Oct. 17.—A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter.

So the lad departed taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects, and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow; the conservatory and the philharmonic school. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the philharmonic school, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the Spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

Chooses Double Bass

He pasesd the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory, and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study; the French horn, the trombone, or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians Dragonetti and Bottesini). The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists, and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately choose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious; for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument. If the desire were enough, the subways would be jammed with Kreislers, Heifetzes, Zimbalists, Rachmaninoffs, Paderewskis, Casalses, and Salmonds.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

Romantic Marriage

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Madame Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian music publishing house, for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical, or too commercially unpromising, for other publishers to venture.

In order to save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrushka," on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw. When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian music publishing house, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

OCT 1 8 1931

Boston Band to Do "Heldenleben"

AN UNUSUAL orchestral programme is promised Detroiters when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, appears at Masonic Auditorium, Wednesday evening, October 28.

Following a conference with Mr. Koussevitzky early in the week, William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston organization, wired James E. Devoe, manager of the Philharmonic interests which are presenting the Boston band, that a special programme had been selected for Detroit.

It will include Handel's Concerto Gusso; Two Nocturnes by Debussy; Ravel's "La Valse" and Strauss' "Heldenleben."

The Boston Orchestra opened its season in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Thursday. Following the concert the Boston Globe said:

"Boston Symphony Orchestra season opened yesterday. The hall was completely filled, every season ticket for both series has been sold. Symphony concerts are obviously not one of the things people who economize find they can do without."

The Post said: "For Doctor Koussevitzky there is no resting on past achievements, however notable. Yesterday found them soaring to new heights."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

Boston Symphony Program Announced

The coming of Sergei Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony to open the orchestral season, Friday evening, October 30, at Syria Mosque, is an outstanding event of the early musical season. It is two years since the Boston orchestra has visited Pittsburgh, and its return is awaited with great interest. The program is announced today for the first time:

Concerto Grosso	Handel
Two Nocturnes	Debussy
La Valse	Ravel
Ein Heldenleben	Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 1

Harold Morris, New York composer-pianist, will go to Boston this week to appear as soloist in the first performances of his piano concerto, to be given by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Another novelty on the program is an orchestral arrangement by Respighi of Rachmaninoff's five "Etudes Tableaux," originally composed for piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer.
(Copyright, 1931, by Universal Service, Inc.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 17.—A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact.

So the lad departed, taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects, and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted.

CHOOSING THE BASS VIOL

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

He passed the examination with ease. But a new difficulty rose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study—the French horn, the trombone, or the double bass? He said:

"I choose the double bass."

ONE OF MASTERS

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double bass virtuosi the world has ever seen. (The other two were the Italians, Dragonetti and Bottesini.) The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitsky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

ROMANCE AND SUCCESS

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Mme. Koussevitsky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double bass almost entirely to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian Music Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, ably is, the very different one that could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du Printemps."

ar these
the sur-eve that them or ow m re individ-emselves mind on ons who he conig argu-certainty
; it does at un-

the ex-
—a re-though arly em-of such mposers, literary almost ay, pera saner
t "con-post-war t what
mposers career fifteen justified
orks as to our

on our Debussy
ed and vigor, anti-
They
, their same inated

ebussy
years ificant ime of these against to all them itative

; but not so made means have ers in

ebussy here is and Berg litary,

cious,
line what nporgoing more two
, the g of first cond
the heart

MARKED COPY

BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

OCTOBER 17, 1931

VOLUME XXXVI NUMBER 4

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer.
(Copyright, 1931, by Universal Service, Inc.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 17.—A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact.

So the lad departed, taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects, and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted.

CHOOSING THE BASS VIOL

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

He passed the examination with ease. But a new difficulty rose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study—the French horn, the trombone, or the double bass? He said:

"I choose the double bass."

ONE OF MASTERS

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double bass virtuosi the world has ever seen. (The other two were the Italians, Dragonetti and Bottesini.) The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitsky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

ROMANCE AND SUCCESS

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Mme. Koussevitsky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double bass almost entirely to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian Music Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, ably is, the very different one that could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
he sur-ve that them or ew more individ-emselves mind on ns who he cong argu-
ertainty
it does t un-

the ex-
—a re-though rly em-
of such nposers, literary almost y, persaner
"con-ost-war t what nposers
career fifteen ustified rks as to our

on our ebussy
ed and vigor,
anti-
They
, their same inated

ebussy
years ficant
me of these gainst

to all them tative
; but not so made means have ers in

bussy ere is and Berg
itary,

ious, line what nporgoing more two
, the g of first cond
the eart

MARKED COPY

BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

OCTOBER 17, 1931

VOLUME XXXVI NUMBER 4

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer.
(Copyright, 1931, by Universal Service, Inc.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 17.—A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact.

So the lad departed, taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects, and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted.

CHOOSING THE BASS VIOL

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

He passed the examination with ease. But a new difficulty rose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study—the French horn, the trombone, or the double bass? He said:

"I choose the double bass."

ONE OF MASTERS

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double bass virtuosi the world has ever seen. (The other two were the Italians, Dragonetti and Bottesini.) The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitsky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

ROMANCE AND SUCCESS

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Mme. Koussevitsky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double bass almost entirely to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian Music Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"? However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du r these he sur-ve that hem or w more individmselves ind on ns who e cong argu-rtainty

it does

t un-he ex-
—a re-though rly em-f such posers, literary almost , persaner
"const-war t what nposers
career fifteen istified rks as o our n our ebussy

d and vigor,
anti-
They their same

nated
bussy
years ficant
ne of these ainst o all them ative but ot so made neans have rs in ussy re is and Berg

tary,

ous, line hat por-oing nore two
the of irst ond
the art

MARKED COPY.

BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

OCTOBER 17, 1931

VOLUME XXXVI NUMBER 4

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer.

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, ably in the very different

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
the sur-ve that hem or ow more individ-emselves hind on ns who he cong argu-
ertainty
it does

at un-
the ex-
—a re-though rly em-
of such nposers, literary almost y, persaner
"con-ost-war st what nposers
career fifteen ustified
orks as to our

on our ebussy
ed and vigor,
anti-
They their same inated

ebussy
years
ificant
me of these gainst

to all them tative
but not so made neans have rs in bussy ere is and Berg

itary,

ious, line what nporgoing more two the g of first cond
the eart

"—a thing which nobody but Mr. Barrie would have written. It bears the stamp of his personality and genius in every scene."—

THE NATIONAL JUNIOR THEATRE

Presents

Sir James M. Barrie's

"QUALITY STREET"

A Charming Legend of a Century Ago in Four Acts

Friday Evening, October 23, at 8:15 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Members may secure one free Ticket to "Quality Street" on presentation at Box Office of WEEKLY TICKET No. 2. Additional Tickets may be secured by Members in any location according to price.

Non-Members, $1.00, $1.25, $1.75, $2.00.

"Cheers and hurrahs augmented the storm of handclapping as the juvenile audience strove to make known its delight in the superbly presented version of this favorite fraught with the mysteries of hidden treasure and the desperado of pirates and buccaneers."—Washington Evening Star.

Robert Louis Stevenson's

"TREASURE ISLAND"

The Real Boy's Story in Four Acts

Dramatized by JULES ECKERT GOODMAN

Saturday Afternoon, October 24, at 3 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

To Members	25c, 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
To Non-Members	$1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00

Debt Bends More Shoulders Than Age!

If you're loose with your money you're almost sure to go into debt. Budget your income and bank a specified sum regularly. Make your first objective a savings account amounting to at least six months' salary. Let us help you make your plans.

SOUTH BROOKLYN SAVINGS BANK
MAIN OFFICE: ATLANTIC AVENUE & COURT STREET
18th AVENUE OFFICE: 18th AVENUE & 65th STREET
Brooklyn-New York

Sixty-two Extension Courses

IN

Psychology, General Principles of Psychoanalysis, Literature, Drama, Current Events, Mental Hygiene, Art Appreciation (Methods), Water Color and Oil Painting, Block-printing, Etching, Commercial Illustration, Pencil Drawing, Methods of Teaching English, Interior Decoration, French, German, Spanish, Motion Picture Photography, etc.

REGISTER NOW
For Season's Courses

Members of the Institute entitled to reduction in tuition fee

Pamphlet giving full description of Courses mailed on request

For further Information, address:

Registrar, School of Pedagogy
Room 35, Academy of Music Building
Telephone, STerling 3-6700

THE DIME SAVINGS BANK OF BROOKLYN
announces a Quarterly Dividend

at the annual rate of 4% to be credited to all depositors thereto entitled on

OCTOBER 1st

Payable on and after October 20th

Resources Over $188,000,000
Prosperous Over 70 Years

THE DIME SAVINGS BANK
OF BROOKLYN
DE KALB AVENUE and FULTON STREET
Branch Offices:
86th Street and 19th Avenue 83 Sands Street

The value of Membership privileges is the best advocate for Membership. This BULLETIN suggests some of the many attractive features of this Season's Program. Each Member is accorded the opportunity of naming interested friends who may desire to join the Institute.

THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES,
Department of Education,
The Brooklyn Academy of Music,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

I desire to propose for membership in the Institute's Department of Education:

Name ....

Address ....

Name ....

Address ....

Member's Name ....

Address ....

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

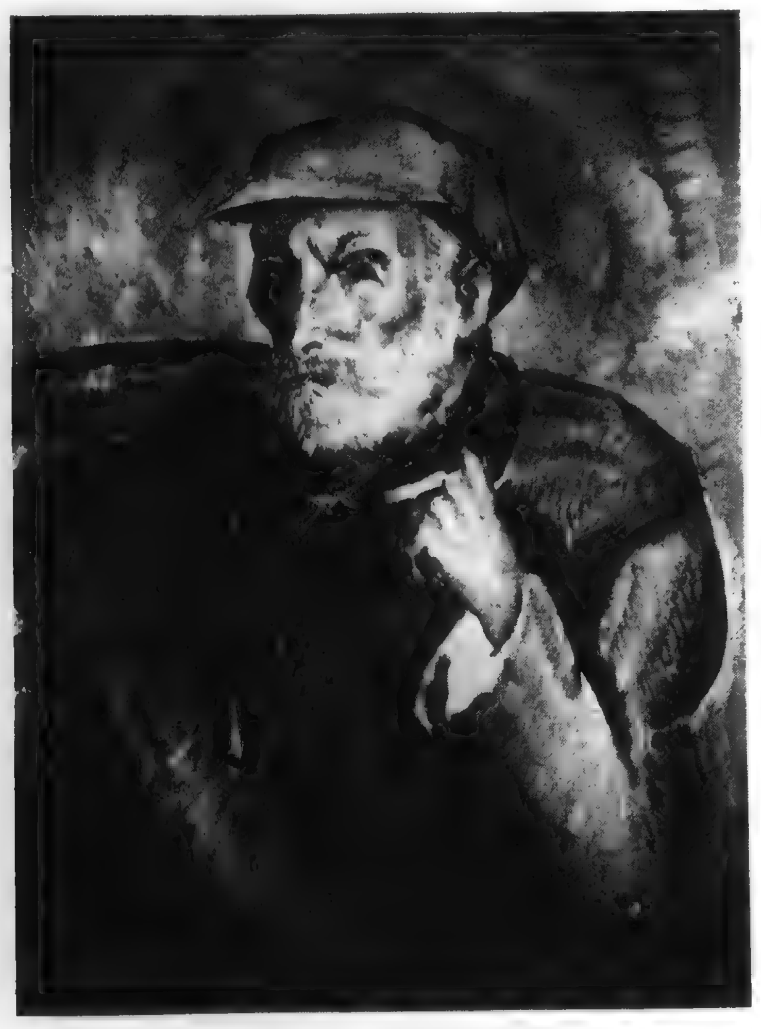
But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

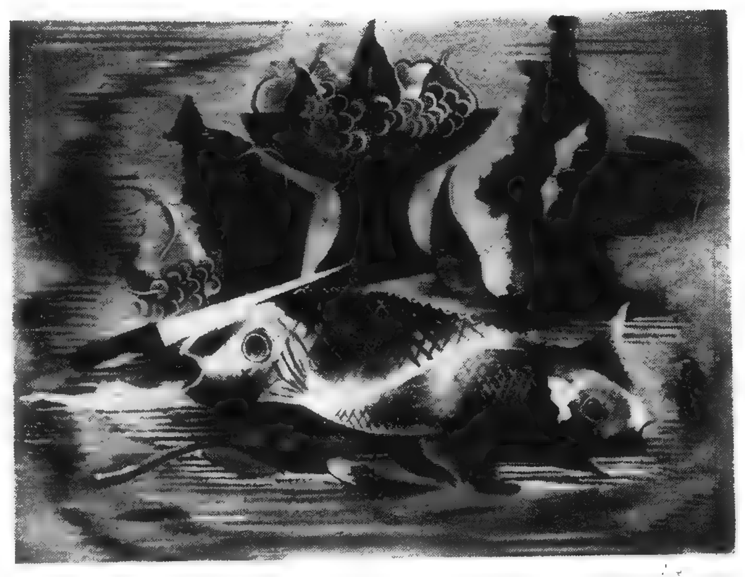
---

International Exhibition at the Brooklyn Museum



"PORTRAIT OF RENOIR"
By A. Zarraga

* * *



"STILL LIFE"
By Serge Ferat

The International Exhibition of Paintings arranged by Marie Sterner is now being shown at the Brooklyn Museum.

The following is from the preface to the catalogue of the Exhibition written by Mrs. Sterner, who for many years has been known for her appreciation and discrimination in the field of modern art.

"Chaos reigns, socially, financially and intellectually.

"In the world of culture there is evidence of a great struggle making for 'independent' effort and 'success.' Whether anything of real significance is accomplished in this endeavor is a question, as the existing confusion makes it difficult to measure progress or achievement. We have reached a moment of relentless activity, with too little plan and an almost disdainful attitude to anything resembling order, form, method or metier. This situation has created an unprecedented opportunity for amateurs and charlatans.

"The untrained, or even worse, willfully uncontrolled effusions of the so-called 'Expressionists,' exposing their complexes or affecting naïveté, have unfortunately succeeded in attracting the attention of an unsophisticated public; this particular public has been shocked out of a dull conventional tolerance for a profession for which it has hitherto had little interest, into a state of enthusiasm bordering on hysteria; nothing sound or lasting is to be gained by this manifestation, and unless a more intelligent consideration modifies this attitude and makes for honest discrimination, we cannot hope for the genuine interest and patronage that Art deserves.

"The group of pictures gathered together for this Exhibition were chosen for their art significance, regardless of national preference, or with the awe for reputation, that are made too often as the result of commercial propaganda.

"It is to be hoped that they will make their appeal on the simple and sincere ground of finding sympathetic appreciation for whatever qualities they may possess."

It is interesting to note that on the completion of the portrait of Renoir by Zarraga, reproduced herewith, the elder artist was so delighted with the picture he suggested an exchange of work, so that he might possess his portrait. Unfortunately, he died very shortly and the exchange was never completed, but to the artistic merit of this picture has been added the historical value of its being the last portrait painted of the "Grand Old Man of Modern French Art."

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES

CONTENTS

PAGE
Frontispiece, "Lennox Gap," By Chauncey F. Ryder 64
Institute Endowment 65
Professor Phelps 65, 67
Membership 65
Schedule Revision 65
H. V. Kaltenborn 66
Personal Problems (Professor Edward Howard Griggs 66
Iturbi 66, 76
Fritz Kreisler 67, 75
Koussevitzky Returns (Boston Symphony Orchestra) 67, 74, 79
Pleistocene Californians (Dr. Chester Stock) 68
Oriental Religions (Charles C. Batchelder) 68

PAGE
Socialism (Dr. Jerome Davis) 69
"The Secret Garden" (The Clare Tree Major Company) 69
Sinclair Lewis 69, 77
Floyd Dell ("Enjoyment of Literature") 70
Archæological "Pieces of Eight" (Dr. R. V. D. Magoffin) 70
Japanese Nō Drama (Mrs. W. C. Handy) 70
Victor Chenkin 70, 78
Events from November 4 to November 18 .... 72, 73, 74
British and French Moralities (Mlle. C. Sarment-M. P. Loving) 74
A Notable Anniversary 74
Institute Players ("Skidding") 80

COPYRIGHTED BY THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES, 1931

VOLUME XXXVI
NUMBER 4
OCTOBER 17, 1931
PUBLISHED BY
THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES
BROOKLYN-NEW YORK CITY
BI-WEEKLY, EXCEPT DURING MAY, JUNE, JULY AND AUGUST SINGLE NUMBER, 15 CENTS
POSTAGE (IF SENT BY MAIL) THREE CENTS A NUMBER
ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $2.00
TO MEMBERS OF THE INSTITUTE FREE

Shore Road Academy
SHORE ROAD NEAR 92nd STREET
TELEPHONE ATLANTIC 5-6735
The only Country Day School for Girls in Brooklyn
Pre-School through High School
Prepares for the leading Colleges
Bus service to all parts of the city
Illustrated catalog on request
HELEN E. REDDING, A.M.
THEODORA GOLDSMITH, A.M.
Headmistresses
HENRY P. MOLLOY
President of the Board of Trustees

The Brooklyn Eagle Press Offers Its Services to Discriminating Buyers of Printing
A representative will co-operate in the preparation of your copy 305 Washington Street, Brooklyn
Phone, MAin 4-7400

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
he sur-ve that hem or ew more individ-emselves nind on ons who he cong argu-
ertainty
it does

at un-
the ex-
—a re-though rly em-
of such mposers, literary almost y, pera saner
"con-ost-war
st what mposers career fifteen ustified
orks as to our

on our ebussy
ed and vigor,
anti-
They
, their same inated

ebussy
years
ificant
me of these gainst

to all them tative
but not so made neans have rs in bussy re is and Berg

itary,

lous line what por-going more two
the of first cond
the eart

Courtesy of the Macbeth Gallery

"LENNOX GAP"

By CHAUNCEY F. RYDER, N.A.

Much of the beauty of Mr. Ryder's "Lennox Gap," one of the finest of his nature studies, is lost in reproduction, since the effectiveness of the painting is based on its coloring. Between two frail, brown-leaved trees, one looks out over a peaceful, golden meadow. Clearly outlined, yet somehow blending into the gray sky, the purplish-blue mountain fills the horizon. The contrast between the cool, soft color of the mountain and the golden yellow of the meadow is pleasing and unusual. The scant foliage of the trees in the foreground is a soft brown. One senses the pervasive loneliness of the scene. Mr. Ryder has been a member of the National Academy since 1920. He received the first award, Honorable Mention, Paris Salon, 1907. Since then, he has won many prizes and medals for his work in oil, water color and etching.

The BULLETIN of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences
Brooklyn, New York City, October 17, 1931
VOLUME XXXVI NUMBER 4

INSTITUTE ENDOWMENT

Probably no educational program in the country carries a dollar so far or puts it to greater service than that of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The large audiences served, the great variety of cultural needs met, the years of experience in matching need with supply, the constant vigilance in searching out the latest and the best which the world of science and letters affords in each department of human learning, and the adaptation of all to the common mind and the popular intelligence, all this conspires to establish the Institute in an altogether unique position among educational forces.

The financial support of the Institute comes partly from its endowments, partly from the membership. Endowment funds have increased as the Institute's life and service have been extended, but their increase has not kept pace with the growth of this Borough, nor with the expanding program of the Institute itself. To be sure, endowments have enlarged more during the past decade than during the preceding century, yet the total is still extremely modest and is quite incommensurate with the need and with the importance of the Institute's mission. A movement so manifestly in the right direction should be greatly accelerated. The high standards now maintained can be insured for the future only as the present generation shall face obligations not only to itself but to the future. The rapidly multiplying and highly endowed foundations designed to advance the public welfare are an indication of how generally the accumulated wealth of the present generation is being conserved for permanent service to civilization. The age-long mission of the Institute cannot be fully realized unless it, too, is more highly endowed than now for its ever-expanding service.

Among the books that Professor PHELPS will discuss in his second lecture, Sunday afternoon, October 25, are: "My Father: Mark Twain," by CLARA CLEMENS; "Ellen Terry and Bernard Shaw. An Intimate Correspondence," edited by C. ST. JOHN; "The Golden Thread," by PHILO M. BUCK, JR.; "William Archer," by Colonel FRANK ARCHER, and "We Are Alaskans," by MARY LEE DAVIS.

These are all books that are receiving much attention today, particularly the TERRY-SHAW letters which cover a correspondence over a period of twenty-five years between two of the remarkable and fascinating personages of this generation. This intimate correspondence seems destined to a permanent place in the field of English literature. CLARA CLEMENS will appear in the Institute program this season in an evening of reminiscences of her famous father.

MEMBERSHIP

The progress of civilization depends largely upon the intelligent use of leisure by all citizens who have any leisure at all, and there are very few in these days who really have no spare time for the wisely directed continuation of their education. Education is a continuing process; when one stops learning, he begins to die. In truth, it has been well said that the only difference between death and stagnation is that in death one is mourned by one's friends. The Brooklyn Institute has something to offer man, woman and child—something for each stage of life's experience. Every school teacher should be a Member. Every music lover needs a Membership. One might continue the list through all callings, all classes. There are few investments capable of yielding a larger return than Institute Membership. "It has given me untold pleasure" is the gist of comment often heard from the lips of those who, through Membership, have supported the Institute for many years.

SCHEDULE REVISION

Mr. SINCLAIR LEWIS is so occupied by his literary pursuits that he has little time for lectures. When an evening can be offered, it must be accepted regardless of other scheduled arrangements. This explains the conflict with Mr. DE COU'S lecture Wednesday evening, October 28, Mr. DE COU'S dates having been planned long in advance of the lecture by Mr. LEWIS.

So widespread is the interest in Mr. LEWIS' evening and so large is the number of Members who desire to hear both lectures, it has seemed best to postpone to a later date Mr. DE COU'S Japan lecture, originally scheduled for Wednesday evening, October 28. There is the advantage in this arrangement of being able to offer an extra lecture by Mr. DE COU. The dates of these two lectures will be announced in a later issue of the BULLETIN. For the remaining evening travelogues of this series the Opera House will be used.

The Institute's lecture season opened October 1 and ends May 1. With the exception of Thanksgiving Day and the brief recess at the Christmas holidays, lectures and other events are scheduled daily, including Sunday, during this six months period. Many new speakers appear this year, and nearly all the favorite lecturers of recent seasons are listed. Out of such a program the Member will get, as out of life, what he puts into it. If beauty is put into life through art and poetry and music and good literature, the harvest reaped is priceless in the illumined intelligence and the intellectual and emotional rewards.

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
OCT 1 8 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
the sur-ve that hem or ow more individ-emselves nind on ons who he cong argu-
ertainty
it does

at un-
the ex-
—a re-though rly em-
of such mposers, literary almost y, pera saner
"con-ost-war
st what mposers career fifteen ustified
orks as to our

on our ebussy
ed and vigor,
anti-
They
, their same inated

ebussy
years
ificant
me of these gainst

to all them tative
but not so made neans have rs in bussy re is and Berg

itary,

ious, line what nporgoing more two
the of first cond
the heart

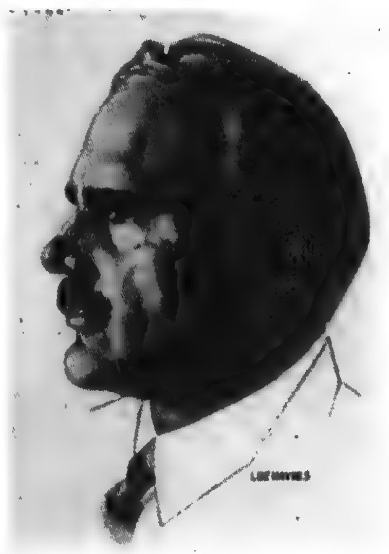
H. V. KALTENBORN



Mr. H. V. KALTENBORN spent some six weeks last summer in a tour of inspection of European affairs, during which he met and talked with Premier RAMSAY MACDONALD, MUSSOLINI, Chancellor BRUENING, and M. LAVAL,—thus going to headquarters for his information and forming his impressions at first hand. Mr. KALTENBORN'S reports of international conditions are always of interest, especially in view of the quite remarkably extended background of his experience, and his unusual equipment of knowledge. This season's reports by him will be more valuable and interesting than ever because of the tenseness of the international situation.

Mr. KALTENBORN has recently published a book, "We Look at the World," which aims particularly to give American readers a better idea of what other folks think of them. As one reviewer of this book sums it up: "The editor, globe trotter, lecturer, and commentator on the radio covers a tremendous lot of ground in his very interesting and informative survey of the world today." Mr. KALTENBORN is now giving a series of Current History lectures on Tuesday afternoons during October and early November in the Lecture Hall.

PERSONAL PROBLEMS

Those who have been Members of the Institute in former years need no comment upon the value of the lectures by Professor EDWARD HOWARD GRIGGS. To new Members, it will not be amiss to call attention to the fact that Dr. GRIGGS is one of the most valued of the Institute's established lecturers. For many years his discussions of literature, philosophy, ethics and kindred subjects have been a feature of the year's program. He speaks from long experience as a teacher, followed by more than thirty years of service on the lecture platform. There are many who owe much to his mature wisdom and to his helpful guidance.

Professor GRIGGS is now giving a course of Monday evening lectures on "Problems of Personal Life," his subject on October 19 being "Culture and Service Through the Vocation." It was KEATS who insisted that "Nothing is ever true for a man until it is proved upon his own pulses." But a course of such lectures as Professor GRIGGS is offering, designed to remind us of some of the horizons of human aspiration and the dangerous rock-shoals which must be passed before man can attain those horizons, cannot fail to be of value, especially in times like the present.

Unless otherwise stated on the WEEKLY TICKET, there are no reserved seats at Membership events. The attention of the Ushers should be called to attempts to hold chairs for late comers.

ITURBI

"I am interested in ultra-modern music, but I am also interested in BEETHOVEN and BACH," says JOSÉ ITURBI, the famous Spanish pianist who appears at the Institute in his only Brooklyn recital of the season on Tuesday evening, October 27, and whose programs are famous for their variety and for their catholicity. "I cannot say that I am a specialist in the music of any composer. I think the ultra-moderns have more or less lost their way and do not know quite where they are going. Much of what they write seems to me to be music to be read rather than to be played. In that sense it is absorbingly interesting.

"Trite though it may be to say that this is a result of the post-war state of mind, I believe it is true. The mind of all the world was sick. How could it have been otherwise? But the point many lose sight of is that there is no reason, in accepting ultra-modern music, for throwing overboard all that has gone before. When all's said and done, BACH did have a certain disposition for music.

"Let us have a modern movement, but let us respect what is good, no matter of what era. BENEDETTO MARCELLO once wrote, 'In composing an opera it is not necessary to study the old composers because they have not studied the modern composers, and it is not necessary to study the modern composers because they do not know the old composers.' In other words, be yourself. If you feel in the modern idiom, write in it, but do not jeer at MOZART and BACH and HAYDN.

"It is told of BRAHMS, of all people, that when someone made a slighting remark about MENDELSSOHN, thinking to please him, he said, 'You must not speak ill of MENDELSSOHN! He was the last of the great ones!'

"Of course, there are certain musicians at the present time who do their composing, I am told, by chemical formulas. Can that be anything but a pose? You might write a piece and say it described a beefsteak, but I cannot think it would be a success as music, and it certainly would be a failure as a dinner!

"The danger of too much of this sort of thing, however, is not so much what it is now but what it is leading to. Where is the youth of today going to end that knows so little of beauty? I mean the youth who claims that ultra-modernism is the be-all and the end-all in music, painting, sculpture, poetry, architecture, and all the other things in which the restless spirit can be expressed, even in behavior.

"It seems to me that its only salvation lies in holding on to what is fine in the past, while accepting the present and the future. The reverse of that, of course, is the dried-up pedant who lives only in the past. That is my artistic creed, and I believe it to be a safe one."

"Cimarron," featuring RICHARD DIX (Saturday evening, October 17), is a dramatic tale of the Oklahoma run and over-night building of an empire in the West. It is based on the popular novel by EDNA FERBER. With intensified dramatic power, this story of high hopes, of desperate battling with nature and outlawry in an isolated land, provides consistently thrilling action and absorbing portrayals.

FRITZ KREISLER

FRITZ KREISLER has reached the goal where his very name seems to spell all that is perfect in violin music. His large following will heartily welcome him at the Institute Tuesday evening, October 20, and those who have not heard him as yet will gain a bit of that inexplicable something which makes for a richer existence.

KREISLER has a style all his own. His technic is fluent, elastic and transparent, every note standing out clearly even in the most rapid of runs. He develops a tone famous the world over for its sensuous beauty, and plays with a depth of sincerity that never fails to explore the spirit and mood behind the composition rendered. As a background for his music, this rare artist combines a modest, alert personality with an actively intelligent and sensitive mind. A program such as KREISLER offers next Tuesday evening is a veritable garden in the beauty of musical art, an experience to be long cherished.

PROFESSOR PHELPS

Excellent evidence of the (if one may call it so) pervasiveness of Professor WILLIAM LYON PHELPS is recorded by that genial scholar himself in his "As I Like It" department of Scribner's wherein he notes that he has been promoted to the ranks of the "noble army of authors who wrote the Works of Shakespeare." An aspirant for admission to college assured the examiners that "the play, 'As You Like It,' was written by J. Lyon Phellups." It is the penalty of eminence to be often misrecorded, as MARK TWAIN pointed out in his forecast of a future biographical note on General GRANT, listing him as "URIAH Z. GRAUNT, Aztec poet. . . . He wrote 'Rock me to Sleep, Mother'."

Whatever future encyclopædists may do to his memory there is no doubt that today Professor PHELPS is the best known and certainly one of the best loved of all lecturers. And there is also no doubt that more readers follow his suggestions in the choice of their reading than can be found listening to any other literary critic. The second of his conferences on "Contemporary Books Worth Reading" will be held on Sunday afternoon, October 25.

S. C. SCHMUCKER

A member of the staff of one of Brooklyn's great banks remarked a few days ago that he had not missed one of the many lectures Dr. S. C. SCHMUCKER had given at the Institute in past seasons. The banker's countenance lightened with pleasure at the thought. Through his lectures, Dr. SCHMUCKER has made nature's ways familiar to thousands. He may be said to have almost a genius for popularizing science: informed, lucid, plain spoken, he adds by his marked individuality and contagious enthusiasm for such study a freshness of interest and approach that never fails to impart to his audience some of his own keen enjoyment in nature study.

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS

(Reprint from the Boston Transcript, 9/30/31)

KOUSSEVITZKY the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises. The Symphony's great leader exerts a stimulating effect which a trafficker in hyperbole might almost liken to that of the ultra-violet ray. Occasionally it shocks, it may even burn—for it embodies an energy at high tension—but for the most part its influence is strengthening and therapeutic. This could not be so, of course, were the conductor merely a remarkable individualist, as undoubtedly he is. The wealth of his resource finds its broader explanation in the excellence of the orchestra itself, and, beyond that, in the inherited fund of the Western World's greatest music—a fund to which the masters of many centuries have contributed.

The restful and spiritually strengthening service of noble music KOUSSEVITZKY himself recognized in the remarks he made yesterday, at the moment of his return from abroad. "Music is like religion," he said, "a comfort and joy when people are depressed. The more depressed people are the more they crave music." We believe this is so, and welcome the approach of the new Symphony season both for the stimulus it will give and the restoring power of its tranquillities and of its moments of musical majesty.

A Handbook to Professor GRIGGS' course of lectures on "Problems of Personal Life" may be obtained at the Box Office for 35 cents. This Handbook includes introductory notes, illustrative extracts, outlines of the lectures, book references, a list of topics for study and discussion of each lecture, and a carefully selected bibliography. Students will find this Handbook a great aid.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

r these
he sur-ve that hem or w more individmselves nind on ns who he cong argu-
ertainty
it does

at un-
the ex-
—a re-though rly em-
of such nposers, literary almost ay, pera saner
"con-post-war
st what mposers career fifteen ustified
orks as to our

on our Debussy
ed and vigor,
anti-
They
, their same inated

ebussy
years
ificant
me of these gainst

to all them tative
; but not so made means have rs in bussy ere is and Berg

itary.

cious,
line what por-going more two
, the g of first cond
the heart

PLEISTOCENE CALIFORNIANS

What should certainly be one of the most fascinatingly interesting of the season's scientific lectures will be the discussion on Friday evening, October 23, by Dr. CHESTER STOCK, Professor of Geology at the California Institute of Technology, of "The Tar Traps of Rancho La Brea, California." Some fifty to a hundred thousand years ago—longer ago, according to some—these asphaltic pits formed a perfect natural trap for the wandering animals of the Ice Age. From an area of less than 38 acres on the Rancho La Brea, near Los Angeles, a vast number of bones have been recovered, yielding a remarkably complete record of the fauna of that period, extraordinarily well preserved. Among the more striking examples are the great wolves and sabre-tooth cats of which hundreds of complete individuals are recorded. Others on the list are the great lions, gigantic short-faced bears, extinct bison, camels, antelopes, horses, South American ground sloths, mastodons and Imperial mammoths. These will be amply illustrated in the lecture.

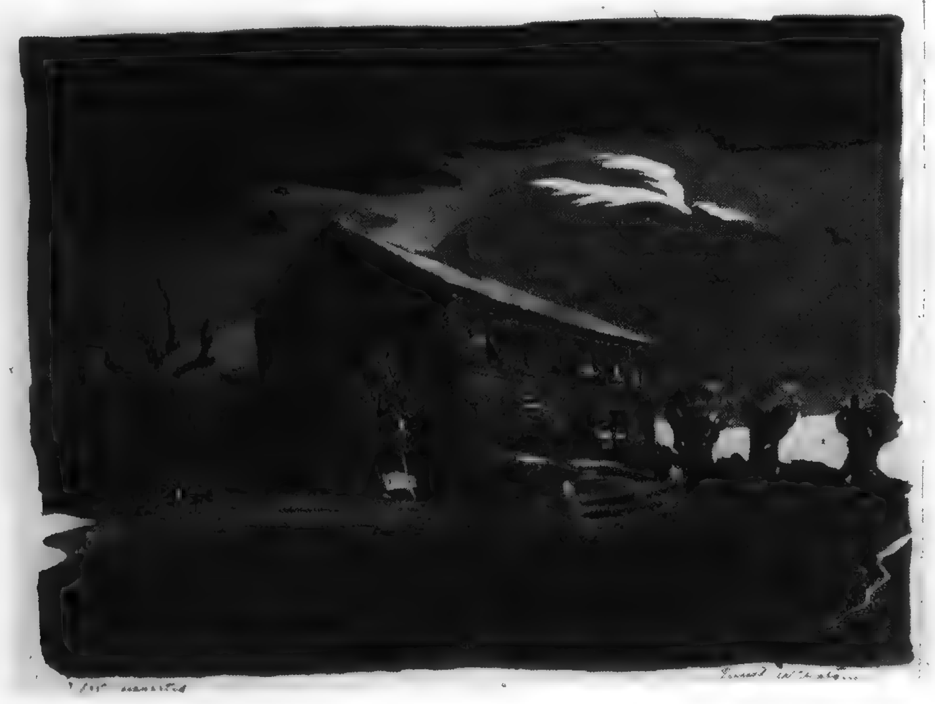
Professor STOCK has been called by no less an authority than Dr. ROBERT A. MILLIKAN "the foremost of the younger palæontologists of America." Born in San Francisco, 1892, he took his B.S. degree at the University of California in 1914; Ph.D., 1917. He held research appointments thereafter until he became an assistant professor in 1921, and professor in 1926. He has specialized in study of the Tertiary and Pleistocene vertebrates, and in comparative anatomy and historical geology.

"Often the best friend a man has," declares HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, "is the stimulus and challenge of antagonistic environment to awaken the courageous resistance." When BEACONSFIELD first addressed Parliament, that body jeered him down. GOLDSMITH was a failure as a surgeon. Turning to letters he gave the world the "Deserted Village" and "The Vicar of Wakefield." COWPER started life as a lawyer. After repeated failures, he too turned to literature and became one of England's greatest poets.

ORIENTAL RELIGIONS

A formulated, organized religion is a crystallization of the prevailing beliefs, emotions, and customary behavior of a group of people, usually of a group large enough to constitute a society. Generally this crystallization is brought about by some prophet, seer, or inspired teacher, who acts as a catalytic agent—as by MUHAMMAD for Islam—but the stuff of which the religion is made must be "in the air," ready for such precipitation. It is essentially a creation of the society. Once formulated, organized, accepted, it reacts most powerfully upon its makers, and may hold them to its shape for centuries, as Islam has done for more than twelve hundred years, and Christianity from the time of AUGUSTINE to the present. The effective continuance of a religion depends upon this conservative power.

But when the beliefs and mores of a society change so that the traditional religion no longer fits, that religion either dies completely, or is so greatly changed as to become a different religion. Such changes may be slow, even unsuspected for a long time, or they may be painfully violent. Is such a change going on today among the followers of the Prophet? That problem will be the subject of the first of three lectures on "The Great Religions of the Orient" by Mr. CHARLES C. BATCHELDER. On Monday afternoon, October 19, he will discuss: "Can the Mohammedan Religion Be Modernized to Meet the Conditions of Today?" There are now about 250,000,000 Mohammedans. Changes among them are going on in India. In Turkey the religion has been disestablished, somewhat violently. On October 26, Mr. BATCHELDER will follow out the inquiry, asking "Is the Hindu Religion Responsible for the Present Poverty and Misery of India?" and, on November 2, "Is the Buddhist Religion the Cause of the Backwardness of China and Other Buddhist Countries?" It will be remembered that the religious questions are perhaps the largest element in the difficulties of India, as appeared at the London Conference. They are vitally important issues everywhere "east of Suez." Mr. BATCHELDER knows the Orient through long residence.



"DESERTED"
A Recent Block Print
By ERNEST W. WATSON

A Saturday Afternoon Course in this interesting process of Block Printing will be given by Mr. Watson, well-known exponent of the art, beginning October 17.

SOCIALISM

Socialism is a word of such protean variability in its uses that it has come to mean little unless coupled with some specific label. It is possible to define Marxian Socialism with precision, and half a dozen other historic varieties can be tagged. But it is often also used to mean little more than a belief in the need of greater cooperation in industrial and governmental functioning, and of a fairer apportionment of the fruits of human effort. In that broad sense perhaps most intelligent people today are "Socialists." The trouble arises when a definite program of action, of any sort, is offered. And there are still conservative souls who shudder at the very word, as at a bugaboo.

Speaking generally, however, the trend of current thought is toward greater socialization—which is a safer label—in the ordering of human life. Dr. JEROME DAVIS, who is Professor of Practical Philanthropy in the Yale Divinity School, and who is a very "live wire" person, will give a course of five Tuesday evening lectures, beginning October 20, on "Contemporary Social Movements: a Critical Review and Estimate." The topic for the first lecture is "Socialism." Professor DAVIS, who was born in Japan, of American parents, 1891, and who is a Columbia Ph.D., was secretary to Dr. WILLARD GRENFELL, in Labrador in 1915, going thence to Russian war relief work, 1916-18. Before going to Yale in 1924 he was assistant professor of Sociology at Dartmouth, 1921-24. He has conducted several important field investigations of social conditions in the United States and Russia.

"THE SECRET GARDEN"

The popular Clare Tree Major Company, which has filled the Opera House of the Academy of Music with delighted audiences of children again and again in other seasons, will make their first appearance this year on Saturday afternoon, November 7, in the dramatized version of that charming story by FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT, "The Secret Garden." This appealing play, touched as it is with the elements of suspense and humor, makes a strong appeal to children.

CAST
(In order of appearance)

Mary	June White
Mrs. Medlock, the housekeeper	Ann Sherman
The Station Master	John Barry
Martha, the maid	Norma Nelson
Jane, another maid	Helen Shea
Dickon	Sheldon Loomis
Dr. Craven	Wilkins Terry
Mr. Craven, Colin's Father	Wendall Whitten
Ben Weatherstaff	James Barrett
Mrs. Sowerby, Dickon's Mother	Clare Tree Major
Colin	Neel Heath

Act I.

Scene 1: A railway carriage in England, on a rainy evening in March.
Scene 2: The next morning, in Mary's sitting room.

Act. II.

Scene 1: Outside the secret garden, a month later.
Scene 2: Colin's bedroom, just before dawn.
Scene 3: The Secret Garden, the same afternoon.

Act III.

The Secret Garden, two months later.

SINCLAIR LEWIS

The award of the Nobel Prize to SINCLAIR LEWIS puts him, ipso facto, in a position of leadership among American men of letters, especially in the eyes of the rest of the world. There are other American novelists who have done, and are doing, work of possibly finer texture and perhaps greater subtlety than his but there is no one so widely representative and no one more distinctively American. There are important regions of American life which Mr. LEWIS has not as yet touched, but it may be plausibly argued that these regions are relatively less important—and certainly less distinctively American—than the life of the "average citizen" so excellently presented in his four chief books.

SINCLAIR LEWIS was born, 1885, at Sauk Center, Minnesota, the son of a physician. After graduation from Yale in 1907, he worked for some years as a reporter, in New Haven, in San Francisco, and for the Associated Press. He passed thence to minor editorial positions in New York, culminating in editorial work for one of the important publishing houses. During this period, up to 1920, he published five very respectable, even quite good novels, which had but moderate success, although none fell flat. Then came "Main Street" with which he finally got into his stride, and since then he has never been out of the limelight. He has not made the mistake of over-production, and has well sustained the level of attainment reached in "Babbitt." Mr. LEWIS will lecture at the Institute Wednesday evening, October 28, his topic being "A World on Fire." So great is the interest in this meeting, it has been transferred to the Opera House.

MR. AND MRS. SINCLAIR LEWIS (DOROTHY THOMPSON)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

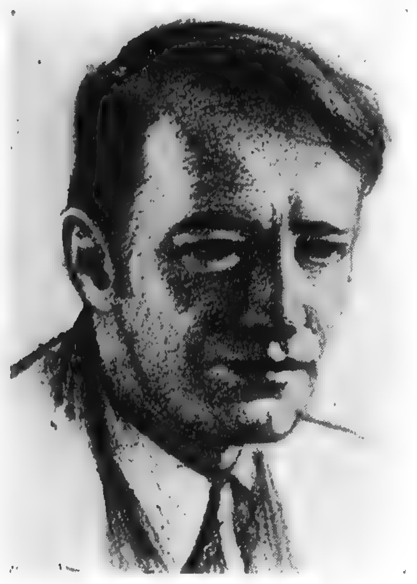
Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du Printemps."

FLOYD DELL



FLOYD DELL, now one of the foremost members of the present literary generation, was born in Barry, Illinois, in 1887. He began his literary career as a poet and his economic career as a factory-hand, leaving school to go to work at sixteen. "It was made inevitable that I should become a writer," Mr. DELL has said, "by my gradual expulsion at a very early age from most of the other available ways of making a living." He made a start with journalism, and after several years as a reporter on small town papers he went to Chicago, where, at the age of twenty-three, he became literary editor of the Chicago Evening Post, building the book section of that paper into one of the livest and most stimulating that any Western newspaper has ever published. From Chicago he came to New York where he began writing for various papers, and in the meantime composing and producing one-act plays for little theatre organizations. His recent play, "Little Accident," had great success not only in New York but all over the country. The second lecture in the "Enjoyment of Literature" course will be given by FLOYD DELL on Thursday evening, October 22. His subject will be "Literature and Life."

ARCHÆOLOGICAL "PIECES OF EIGHT"

Captain KIDD's fabulous treasure pales into insignificance before such an archæological discovery as that recorded by Dr. RALPH V. D. MAGOFFIN, in a fascinating article on "Archæology Today" published in the Mentor magazine. Dr. MAGOFFIN says: "Who would not lose sleep, spend time and money, undergo hardships, to have a thrill like that felt by a monk some years ago, who found in West China, at the 'Cave of the Thousand Buddhas', a library that had been walled up in the tenth century, which when opened disclosed a solid mass of five hundred cubic feet of manuscripts of Tibetan, Chinese, Turkish, Sogdian and Sanskrit?" The Institute will welcome Dr. MAGOFFIN, lately President of the Archæological Institute of America, to its platform Friday evening, October 30, when he will present an illustrated lecture on recent excavations in the Near East.

> "Everyone now believes that there is in man an animating, ruling, characteristic essence, or spirit which is himself. This spirit, dull or bright, petty or grand, pure or foul, looks out of the eyes, sounds in the voice, and appears in the manners of each individual. It is what we call personality."
>
> —CHARLES W. ELIOT.

JAPANESE NŌ DRAMA

As with dramatic art forms elsewhere, the Japanese Nō plays arose from earlier religious observances—from the sacred dances which were pantomimes illustrative of Shinto legend and stories of the gods and heroes. As early as the 14th century, dialogue was added to these performances. They owed something also to the Sara-guku (literally "monkey-music") of Yamato province, which consisted of juggling and crude comedy, but that, too, was originally of a religious character. In the 15th century these old quasi-dramatic rituals were transformed by two truly great artists, KAN-NAMI KIYOTSUGU and his son, SE-AMI MOTOKIYO, who gave lasting shape and character to them, lifting them to a high artistic level. Under the patronage of the Shoguns the resulting Nō plays became the chief aristocratic entertainment for centuries, and they still hold a high place, although somewhat superseded by the modern Japanese drama. They made fine use of costume and of accessories such as masks and the fan.

The subject of the Nō plays consists chiefly of the doings of the Shinto and Buddhist gods and heroes, the ghosts of warriors, and with demons or goblins, but there are classes which deal with ordinary human affairs and passions, and comedy is not lacking. An unusually attractive illustrated lecture on "The Classical Nō Drama of Japan" will be given Thursday afternoon, October 22, by Mrs. W. C. HANDY, ethnologist, of Syracuse. It will be illustrated by lantern slides, by reading of "Hagoromo" (a short play of the Hosho school) and by dancing with phonographic accompaniment. Mrs. HANDY is a member of the staff of the Bishop Museum, Honolulu, and is now on a visit to the States. She is a trained ethnologist and has given much study to the cultural legacies of Oriental peoples. Several articles by her on this theme have been published in the Yale Review.

VICTOR CHENKIN

VICTOR CHENKIN, known as "the singing actor," offers an interesting program of characterizations from the dashing, mustachioed gypsy, to the lighthearted, voluble Italian. He sings in seven different languages, making each character the voice of the folklore of an ancient people, a study of their traits, habits, and customs. His Institute program Friday evening, November 7, reflects this versatility.

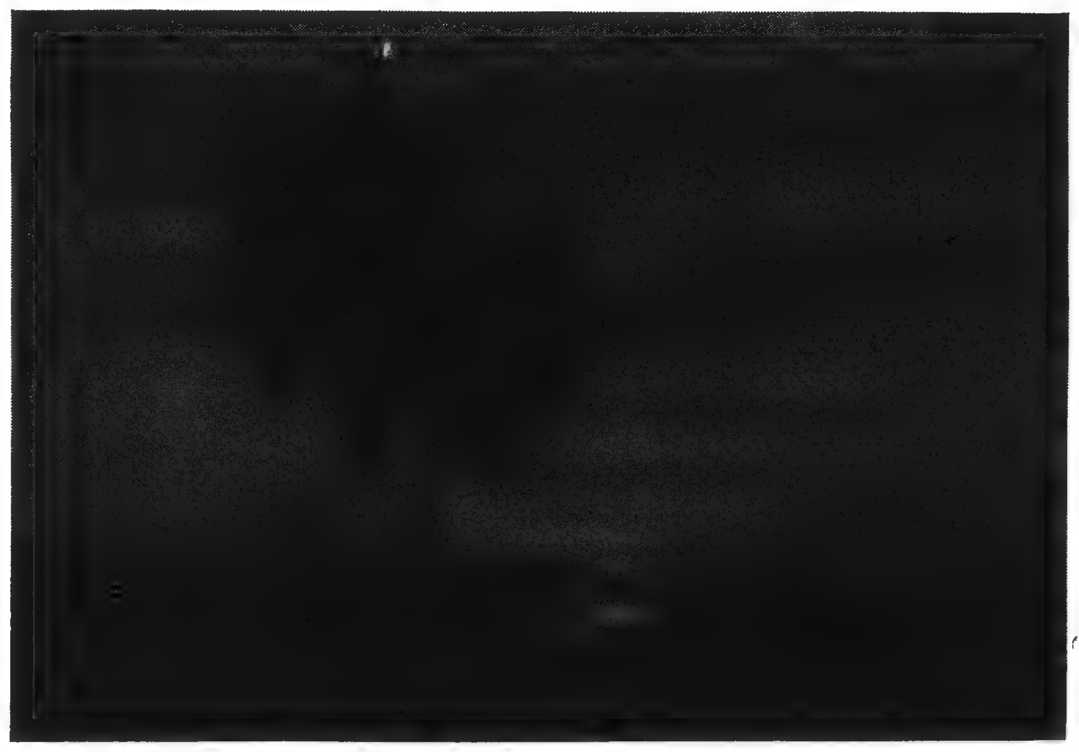
CHENKIN is, above all, an actor. Perhaps his most subtle effect is achieved by his strangely expressive hands. If it were possible to black out the entire stage, training lights only on his gesticulating hands, the audience would still see a dramatic performance. The hands seem to change in shape as well as gesture, thus fitting the personification of a young or old man, a scholar or a peasant. He gives a reality to each character which carries with it the illusion of setting and supporting cast. His singing voice is most flexible, changing at will from the requirements of the sonorous intonations of the Jewish rabbi to the liquid tones of the Italian boy.

In his two previous Brooklyn recitals his audiences have crowded the Music Hall.

Interesting Prints From the Permanent Collection of the Department of Photography of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences

The Institute's Department of Photography began, in 1928, the formation of a Permanent Collection of the best Pictorial Photographs which can be acquired to use for study and reference by its Members, Teachers and Classes. The Collection is exhibited annually and the prints are available for reference at any time. Many interesting additions have been made to the Collection during the past season.

"THE LANDING"
By MARY E. CALLAGHAN



"SUNSET"
By CHRIS. HAMMERGAARD

Among the prints of special interest in this growing Collection are examples of the work of the following noted practitioners of the photographic art: Alfred Stieglitz, Dr. D. J. Ruzicka, José Ortiz Echagüe, Nicholas Haz, Dr. Max Thorek and the late Joseph Petrocelli.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, [illegible]ably is the very different one that could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
the sur-ve that hem or ow more individ-emselves mind on ons who he cong argu-
ertainty
it does

at un-
the ex-
—a re-though arly em-
of such mposers, literary almost ay, pera saner
t "con-
post-war
st what mposers
e career fifteen justified
orks as to our

on our Debussy ved and vigor,
e anti-
They e, their same inated

Debussy
years nificant
ime of these against to all them tative

; but not so made means have ers in

ebussy ere is h and Berg
litary.

cious
line what mporgoing more two
, the g of first cond n the heart

The INSTITUTE BULLETIN

PUBLISHED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences

Annual Subscription, $2.00 To Members, Free
Single Numbers, 15 cents Postage, extra, 3 cents

Life Membership in the Institute...........$500.00
Sustaining Members, Annual Dues......... 25.00

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Associate Membership, Registration Fee.......$5.00
Associate Membership, Annual Dues..........10.00

Officers of the Board of Trustees

Frank L. Babbott.....................Honorary President

Edward C. Blum...............................President
Walter H. Crittenden...............First Vice-President
Adrian Van Sinderen...............Second Vice-President
Sumner Ford........................Third Vice-President
Edwin P. Maynard.............................Treasurer
John H. Denbigh..............................Secretary

Officers of the Council

Hon. William R. Bayes........................President
Stansbury Hagar..............................Secretary

Director

Charles D. Atkins

"Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of Truth."
—Lowell.

EVENTS FROM WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, TO WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1931

Wed., Nov. 4. Department of Geography. Fifth in a Course of five illustrated Travel Lectures, by Branson De Cou. Subject: Sicily and Southern Italy (illustrated by over 250 beautifully colored lantern views with musical settings). Music Hall, 4 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one. Tickets used for Mr. De Cou's Lecture this afternoon will not admit to the Lecture Wednesday evening, November 4.

Wed., Nov. 4. Department of Geography. Fifth in a Course of five illustrated Travel Lectures, by Branson De Cou. Subject: Sicily and Southern Italy (illustrated by over 250 beautifully colored lantern views with musical settings). Opera House, 8:15 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one. This Lecture is a repetition of the Lecture by Mr. De Cou on Wednesday afternoon, November 4. Tickets used for Wednesday afternoon will not admit to the Lecture Wednesday evening.

Thurs., Nov. 5. Department of Home Economics. First of two Lecture-Demonstrations on "Home Cookery," by Joan M. Rock, Director, Educational Department, Standard Brands Incorporated. Subject: Cooking for Two or Two Hundred. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Thurs., Nov. 5. Department of Political Science. Third in a Course of six Lectures on "Current History," by Dr. William Starr Myers, Professor of Politics, Princeton University. Music Hall, 8:15 p.m.

Fri., Nov. 6. Department of Philology. Second in a Course of five Lectures on "Masterpieces of Literature," by Edgar White Burrill, of New York. Subject: The Price of Liberty—Ibsen's "The Lady from the Sea." Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Fri., Nov. 6. Department of Engineering. The Alfred Waters Proctor Foundation. Lecture, by Arthur H. Diamant, Vice-President, Rosoff Subway Construction Company. Subject: Subway Construction (illustrated by lantern views and motion pictures). Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

Sat., Nov. 7. Department of Political Science. Third in a Course of ten Lectures on "Current History," by Dr. George Earle Raiguel, Publicist, of Philadelphia. Lecture Hall, 10:30 a.m.

Sat., Nov. 7. Chess Club. Members of the Brooklyn Institute Chess Club will meet for play from 2 to 6 p.m., and from 8 to 11 p.m. Art Room.

Sat., Nov. 7. Department of Dramatic Art. The Clare Tree Major Company in Frances Hodgson Burnett's "The Secret Garden," a Play in three Acts. Opera House, 3 p.m. For conditions of admission, see Bulletin and Weekly Ticket.

Sat., Nov. 7. Department of Dramatic Art. All-Talking Motion Picture Program, including latest News Releases and "Rango." Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one.

Sat., Nov. 7. Department of Astronomy. The Observatory of the Department will be open to Institute Members who present Weekly Ticket for observation of Stars in Andromeda and Cassiopeia. William Henry, Secretary of Department, in charge. Academy of Music, 8 to 9:30 p.m.

Sun., Nov. 8. Department of Philology. The A. Augustus Healy Foundation. Third in a Course of nine Lectures on "Contemporary Books Worth Reading," by William Lyon Phelps, Ph.D., Litt.D., Lampson Professor of English Literature, Yale University. Music Hall, 3 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one. Reserved Seat Tickets for front section of Parquet may be purchased by presenting Weekly Ticket and 50 cents at Institute Box Office. Guest Ticket, 50 cents.

Mon., Nov. 9. Department of Philology. First in a Course of three Lectures on "The Bible as Literature," by the Rev. Carroll Perry, Author of "A Professor of Life," of Ipswich, Mass. Subject: The Book of Job: The Plea beyond the Reach of Time and Circumstance. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Mon., Nov. 9. Department of Photography. Exhibition of Prints by L. H. Longwell, of Chicago. Open to Public. Department Studio, fourth floor, Academy of Music, 7:30 to 10 p.m.

Mon., Nov. 9. Department of Philosophy. First in a Course of six Lectures on "Ways of Wisdom," by Professor H. A. Overstreet, Head of Department of Philosophy, College of the City of New York. Subject: Accepting the Universe. Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one.

Tues., Nov. 10. Department of Geography. First in a Series of twelve illustrated Travel Lectures, by H. C. Ostrander, Traveler. Subject: New Journeys in Old Asia—Cambodia, Cochin-China, Annam, Tonkin. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Tues., Nov. 10. Department of Political Science. Fourth in a Course of five Lectures on "Contemporary Social Movements: A Critical Review and Estimate," by Professor Jerome Davis, Sociologist, of Yale University. Subject: The Cooperative Movement. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

Wed., Nov. 11. Department of Dramatic Art. All-Talking Motion Picture Program, including latest News Releases. Music Hall, 4 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one.

Wed., Nov. 11. Department of Geography. Second in a Series of twelve illustrated Travel Lectures, by H. C. Ostrander, Traveler. Subject: East of Suez—India (illustrated by lantern views in color and motion pictures). Opera House, 8:15 p.m.

Thurs., Nov. 12. Department of Home Economics. Lecture-Demonstration, by Marjorie Kinney, of the School of Household Science and Arts, Pratt Institute. Subject: Individuality and Fashions in the Season's Style. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Thurs., Nov. 12. Department of Ethnology. Illustrated Lecture, by Dr. T. Leslie Shear, Professor of Classic Archæology, Princeton University; Field Director, American School of Classical Studies, Athens. Subject: Excavating the Agora of Athens. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

Thurs., Nov. 12. Department of Philology. Lecture, by Rafael Sabatini, Author of "Scaramouche," "Captain Blood," "The Snare," "Sea-Hawk," and other popular books. Subject: Fiction in History and History in Fiction. Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. For conditions of admission, see Bulletin and Weekly Ticket.

Thurs., Nov. 12. Department of Philology. Section on French Language and Literature. Conférence avec projections. Sujet: La France au Maroc, par M. L. A. Loiseaux, Professeur au Collège Barnard, Université Columbia. Art Room, 8:15 p.m.

Fri., Nov. 13. Department of Philology. Third in a Course of five Lectures on "Masterpieces of Literature," by Edgar White Burrill, of New York. Subject: The Patriotism for Peace—Remarque's "The Road Back." Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Fri., Nov. 13. Department of Dramatic Art. All-Talking Motion Picture Program, including latest News Releases. Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one.

Sat., Nov. 14. Young Members' Course. Motion Pictures. Illustrated Lecture, by Major Anthony Fiala, Arctic Explorer. Subject: Arctic Ice and Polar Bears. Music Hall, 2:15 p.m.

Sat., Nov. 14. Chess Club. Members of the Brooklyn Institute Chess Club will meet for play from 2 to 6 p.m. and from 8 to 11 p.m. Art Room.

Sat., Nov. 14. Department of Engineering. The Alfred Waters Proctor Foundation. Illustrated Lecture, by Frederick K. Teichmann, Assistant Professor of Aeronautical Engineering, Daniel Guggenheim School of Aeronautics, New York University. Subject: Aviation of the Past and Aviation of the Future. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

Sat., Nov. 14. Department of Dramatic Art. The National Junior Theatre Company in Sir James M. Barrie's "The Little Minister," a Play in four Acts. Opera House, 8:15 p.m. For conditions of admission, see Bulletin and Weekly Ticket.

Sun., Nov. 15. Department of Music. Chamber Music Recital, by the Roth Quartet (Feri Roth, Violin; Albert Van Doorn, 'Cello; Jeno Antal, Violin; Ferenc Molnar, Viola). Lecture Hall, 3 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one.

Mon., Nov. 16. Department of Philology. Second in a Course of three Lectures on "The Bible as Literature," by the Rev. Carroll Perry, of Ipswich, Mass. Subject: The Book Ecclesiastes: The Evil and Good in Pessimism. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

The Hare
and Tortoise

The speculative investor may "come in like a lion and go out like a hare" occasionally.

But the conservative investor —who prefers Home Title Guaranteed First Mortgages —finds that his investment, like the tortoise, "never sleeps on the way."

Regularly — Home Title interest checks arrive to the investor; regularly, every six months; regularly, for twenty-five years!

Our Guaranteed First Mortgages are available in Certificate units from $100 up.

HOME TITLE INSURANCE COMPANY

51 WILLOUGHBY STREET
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Jamaica - Mineola - Riverhead - Scarsdale

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
the sur-ve that hem or ow more individ-emselves mind on ons who he cong argu-
certainty
it does

at un-
the ex-
—a re-though rly em-
of such mposers, literary almost ay, pera saner
t "con-
post-war
st what mposers
e career fifteen justified
orks as to our

on our Debussy ved and vigor,
anti-
They
, their same inated

Debussy
years
ificant
me of these gainst

to all them tative
; but not so made means have ers in

bussy ere is n and Berg
litary

cious line what mporgoing more two
, the g of first cond n the heart

Mon., Nov. 16. Department of Philosophy. Second in a Course of six Lectures on "Ways of Wisdom," by Professor H. A. Overstreet, Head of Department of Philosophy, College of the City of New York. Subject: Accepting Ourselves. Music Hall, 8:15 p.m. Weekly Ticket admits one.

Tues., Nov. 17. Department of Geography. Third in a Series of twelve illustrated Travel Lectures, by H. C. Ostrander, Traveler. Subject: Jerusalem and the Holy Land. Lecture Hall, 4 p.m.

Tues., Nov. 17. Department of Political Science. Last in a Course of five Lectures on "Contemporary Social Movements: A Critical Review and Estimate," by Professor Jerome Davis, Sociologist, of Yale University. Subject: The British Labor Movement. Lecture Hall, 8:15 p.m.

BRITISH AND FRENCH MORALITIES

The opening event of the series of meetings in French, under the auspices of the French Section of the Institute, will be a debate, Thursday evening, October 29, on a topic which may be labeled as très intrigant: Is the moral code of the French woman better than that of her English sister? One assumes that moral is here used in its most limited sense to mean loose behavior. The case for France will be presented by Mlle. Claire Sarment, and that of the English by M. Pierre Loving, of New York, a literary critic and translator of international experience.

One may, perhaps, wonder whether there is today any great difference between French and British in this respect, but a generation ago the contrast was obvious. The fundamental difference lay in the fact that the French are realists, and less given to sentimentalism than the British, and that French marriages were, and still are, largely arranged by the parents and families rather than by the parties themselves. One result was certainly a far greater honesty and recognition of facts in the French than in the British marriage. Perhaps one may be content with the famous summary of a debate that "much may be said on both sides."

The mail order, accompanied by stamped, addressed return envelope, and indicating a first and second choice of seat location, will be found the most convenient method to secure tickets for all special events.

Benito Mussolini and Ellery Walter, author of "High Hats and Low Bows," in the Palazzo Chigi in Rome. This picture is an illustration taken from "High Hats and Low Bows," published by G. P. Putnam's Sons.

CITIZENS' COMMITTEE

Organized to Promote Interest in the Series of Concerts in Brooklyn by

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Chairman
Mr. Adrian Van Sinderen

Vice-Chairmen

Mr. Frank L. Babbott
Mrs. Edward C. Blum
Hon. Frederick E. Crane
Mr. Walter H. Crittenden
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. William H. Good
Mr. H. F. Gunnison
Mr. Henry A. Ingraham
Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
Mr. R. Huntington Woodman

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Mr. Juan A. Almirall
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Jr.
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Charles R. Buckley
Mr. F. A. M. Burrell
Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D.
Hon. William M. Calder
Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll
Mr. J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford
Hon. James C. Cropsey
Hon. Norman S. Dike
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. Guy DuVal
Mr. S. Raymond Estey
Mrs. Lewis W. Francis
Mr. Theodore L. Frothingham
Mr. William Peter Hamilton
Mr. Walter Hammitt
Mr. George Hewlett
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
Mr. William T. Hunter
Mr. Darwin R. James
Dr. William A. Jewett
Mr. James H. Jourdan
Mr. Charles D. Lay
Mrs. Robert B. Lea
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Hon. George V. McLaughlin
Mrs. William W. Marshall
Mr. W. S. Morton Mead
Mr. Frank C. Munson
Mr. Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. George Notman
Mr. Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
Mr. James H. Post
Mr. Charles E. Potts
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, Jr.
Mr. H. Stavely Sammond
Mrs. Henry Spelman
Mr. Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Miss Marion J. Terry
Mr. William Armour Thayer
Mr. Carl H. Tollefsen
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs. James P. Warbasse
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Mr. Eugene A. Widmann
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Hon. George A. Wingate
Mr. Cornelius D. Wood
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

A NOTABLE ANNIVERSARY

(Reprint from Brooklyn Daily Eagle, October 5, 1931)

Last Thursday the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences began its 107th year of service to Brooklyn. It was in 1824 that Lafayette laid the cornerstone of the Apprentices Library at Henry and Cranberry Sts., out of which has grown the great Institute, with its world-famous Museum, Botanic Garden, Academy of Music, Children's Museum and Department of Education.

During the century no single institution has done more to enhance cultural interests in the community. Brooklyn Institute is unique among such agencies. It has many of the attributes and facilities of a great university, with some features that are quite beyond the scope of such an institution.

It serves children and adults, rich and poor, at almost all hours. It is a vital force in adult education, and is a rallying point for those concerned with art, history, music, botany, and all the other manifestations of culture.

Because of its diversity and long-established activities, Brooklynites often take the Institute as a matter of course. It is really a living vital force, something well worth getting excited about. It was never more needed and never more useful than it is today.

Always supreme—a final authority in the interpretation of the works of the masters.

"House and stage were packed, and the applause and encores—he was recalled a dozen times—indicated that for him, at least, there seems to be no bad season."—N.Y. Times, 10/6/31.

FRITZ KREISLER

Tuesday Evening,
October 20
at 8:15 o'clock

May Moore
Sydney

Opera House, Academy of Music

VIOLIN RECITAL

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

To Members with Coupons	$1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $2.50
Boxes	$1.50, $2.00, $2.50
To Non-Members	$1.50, $2.00, $2.50, $3.00
Boxes	$2.00, $2.50, $3.00

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, ably is the very different one that could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
the sur-eve that them or ow more individ-emselves mind on ons who he conng argu-
certainty
it does hat un-

the ex-y—a re-though arly em-
of such mposers, literary almost ay, pera saner
t "con-
post-war
st what mposers career fifteen justified
orks as to our

on our Debussy ved and vigor,
anti-
They
e, their same minated Debussy

years nificant
ime of these against to all them tative

but not so made means have ers in

ebussy ere is n and Berg
litary,

cious,
line what mporgoing more two
, the g of first cond n the heart

"He demonstrated that he was an artist to the tips of his fingers, an artist of fastidious taste and of keen understanding."
—New York Sun.

JOSÉ ITURBI

THE CELEBRATED SPANISH PIANIST

IN RECITAL

PROGRAM

I.

Variations on a theme by Händel	J. Brahms
Sonata in A-flat major, Opus 110 Moderato cantabile molto espressivo Allegro molto Adagio ma non troppo Fuga—Allegro ma non troppo	L. van Beethoven

II.

Three Etudes	Fr. Chopin
Jeu d'Eaux a la villa d'Este (Rome)	Fr. Liszt
La Campanella	Paganini-Liszt
Pavane	M. Ravel
Feux d'Artifice	C. Debussy
Danza ritual del fuego (from "El Amor Brujo")	M. de Falla

Tuesday Evening, October 27, at 8:15 o'clock

MUSIC HALL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

To Members	50 cents, 75 cents, $1.00, $1.50
To Non-Members	$1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $2.00

"Only a very considerable artist could see so piercingly, so relentlessly the elements of a civilization and have the craft to reproduce them in a novel."—The Nation.

SINCLAIR LEWIS

Will Lecture on

"A WORLD ON FIRE"

AUTHOR OF
"Babbitt"—"Arrowsmith"—"Main Street"—"Elmer Gantry," etc. Nobel Prize Winner in Literature, 1930

WEDNESDAY EVENING,
OCTOBER 28
at 8:15 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE, ACADEMY OF
MUSIC

WEEKLY TICKET NO. 5 ADMITS ONE. RESERVED SEAT, 50 CENTS.
GUEST TICKET, $1.00.
Admission to Non-Members .... $1.50 With Reserved Seat $2.00

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 1 8 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample

could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du

ar these
the sur-ve that hem or ow more individ-emselves mind on ons who he cong argu-
certainty
it does

at un-
the ex-
—a re-though rly em-
of such mposers, literary almost ay, pera saner
t "con-
post-war
st what mposers career fifteen justified
orks as to our

on our Debussy ved and vigor,
anti-
They
e, their same inated

Debussy
years nificant
me of these gainst

to all them tative
; but not so made means have ers in

bussy ere is n and Berg
litary,

cious,
line what mporgoing more two
, the g of first cond
the heart

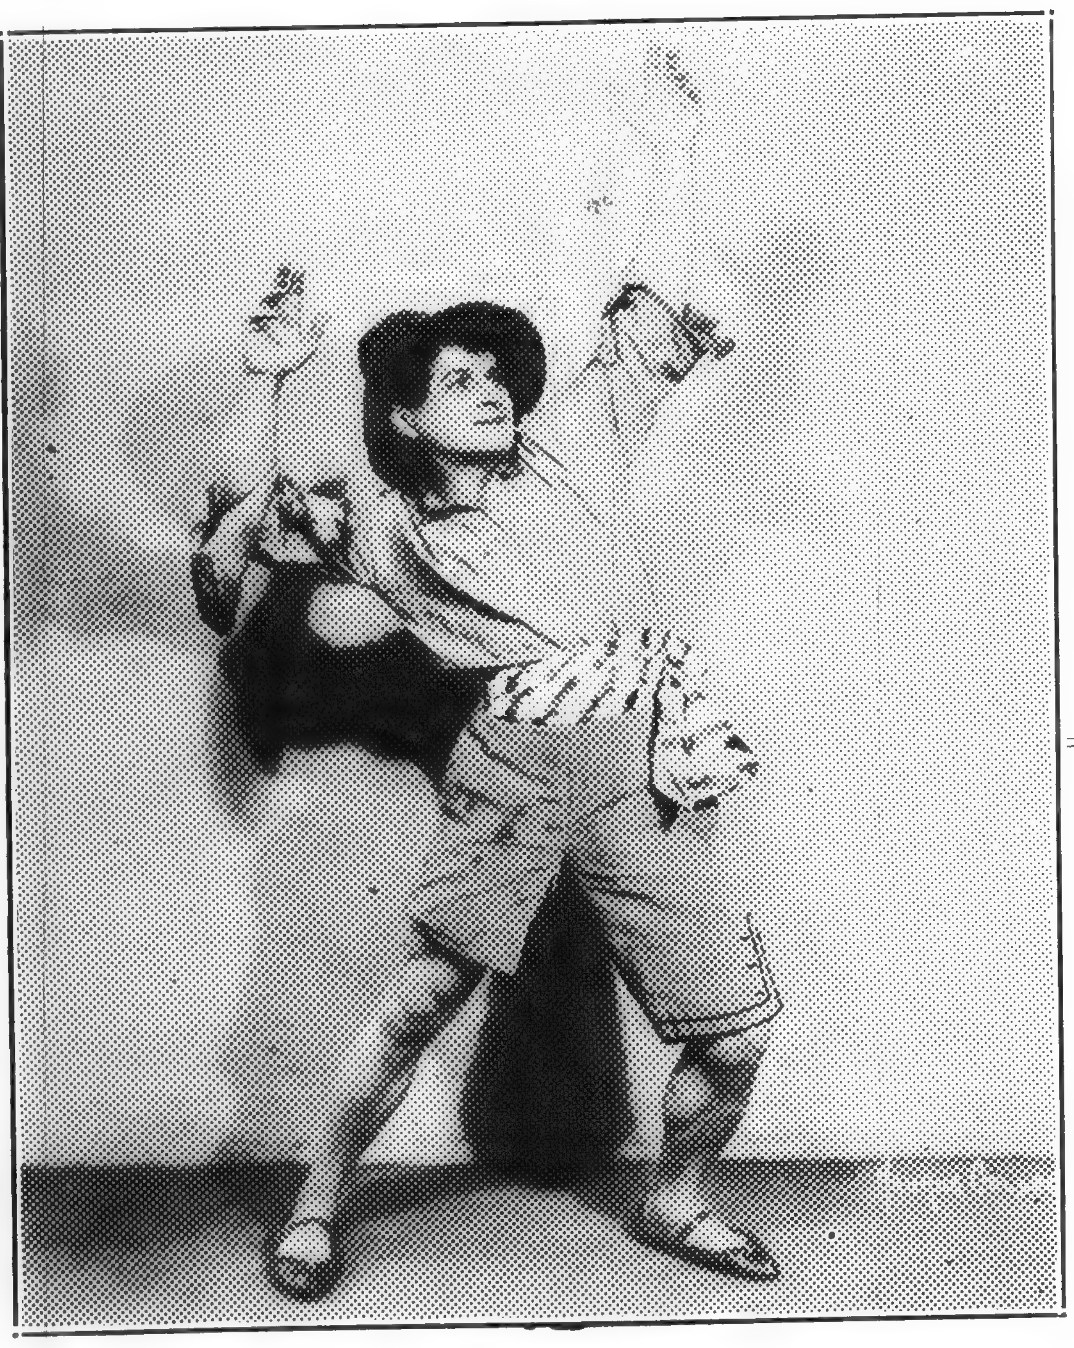
"An entertainer as great as he is unique."—Boston Post "His roles marched like a pageant of life across the stage."—N. Y. Telegram

THE SUPERB SINGING ACTOR

VICTOR CHENKIN

RUSSIAN BARITONE-DISEUR

Friday Evening, November 6,
8:15 o'clock



Music Hall, Academy of Music

In a Repertory of Continental Character Songs: Russian, Italian, French, German, Ukrainian, Hebraic, Caucasian and Gypsy Melodies

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

To Members 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
To Non-Members $1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $2.00

A great Orchestra and a great Conductor.

Opening Concert of the Season

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

FRIDAY EVENING

November 20

OPERA HOUSE at 8:15 o'clock ACADEMY OF MUSIC

REMAINING DATES

Friday Evening, January 8
Thursday Evening, February 4
Friday Evening, March 4
Friday Evening, April 8

SEASON TICKETS for the Series of Five Concerts: $12.50, $10.00, $8.00, $6.00; Boxes, $15.00, $12.50, $8.00.
SINGLE TICKETS for First Concert Only on Sale Monday, November 9, at 8:30 a.m., $2.75, $2.25, $1.75, $1.25. Boxes, $3.00, $2.50.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, ably is the very different one that could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du ear these the sur-lieve that them or now more individ-emselves mind on ons who the conng argu-certainty

it does hat un-

the ex-y—a re-though arly em-
of such mposers, literary almost ay, pera saner
t "con-
post-war ust what mposers
e career fifteen justified
orks as to our

on our Debussy ved and vigor,
anti-
They
e, their same inated

ebussy
years nificant
ime of these gainst

to all them tative
; but not so made means have ers in

ebussy ere is n and Berg
litary,

cious,
line what mporgoing more two
, the g of first cond
the heart

No Collectors
at Her Door!

She doesn't run her household haphazardly. She fixes a definite amount in advance for her expenses and for saving.

As a result she has no bills nor emergencies to worry about.

Our Booklet 35 contains a Spending Guide that will help you make home management a business. Write for it.

Interest Starts from Day of Deposit

THE BROOKLYN
SAVINGS BANK
Established 1827
Corner of Clinton and Pierrepont Streets
(With entrance also at 300 Fulton Street)

TOLLEFSEN
STUDIOS OF MUSICAL ART
946 President St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
(Nr. Prospect Park W.)
Telephone, STerling 3-3730

A School for the Thorough Training of Serious Music Students

Augusta Tollefsen, Piano; Carl H. Tollefsen, Violin; Robert Thrane, 'Cello; Felix Deyo, Harmony and Composition.

Preparatory Instrumental Courses for Beginners
Circular mailed on application—Apply to Secretary

Wilson FLOWERS
Brooklyn's
Distinctive Florist
Floral Decorations
For All Occasions
Main Store
3 and 5 GREENE AVE. BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Telephone, NEvins 8-7400-1-2-3
Flowers telegraphed or cabled to all parts of the World

"SKIDDING"

"Skidding," the initial production of the Institute Players this season on Thursday and Friday evenings, October 29 and 30, should afford Institute audiences much genuine entertainment. To be able to enjoy a good hearty laugh in this present depressed day is indeed a welcome boon and "Skidding" should succeed in exciting the risibilities of the most despondent. At the same time it is a play not without its serious and thoroughly wholesome appeal. The author, Miss ROUVEROL, is a keen observer of human nature and her characterizations reflect this quality, the Judge and Mrs. Hardy being particularly true to life.

The fact that "Skidding" broke all Box Office records at the Pasadena Community Theatre where it received its first production, and then enjoyed a highly successful run of over a year on Broadway speaks for its wide appeal.

THE INSTITUTE PLAYERS

in "SKIDDING", by Aurania Rouverol
Music Hall, Thursday and Friday evenings,
October 29 and 30, at 8:15 o'clock

CAST
(In order of appearance)

Aunt Milly	Mary Daniels Vosseler
Andy	Ray Harper
Mrs. Hardy	Edith Harcourt
Judge James Hardy	Frederick Macklyn
Grandpa Hardy	Lester Paul
Estelle Hardy Campbell	Jeanette Sweedler
Marion Hardy	Mary Noble
Wayne Trenton, III	Robert Shayne
Mr. Stubbins	William R. Harper
Myra Hardy Wilcox	Charlotte Turner

Form of Bequest to the Institute's Department of Education

Place .... Date.........

I Hereby Give and Bequeath to The Department of Education, THE BROOKLYN INSTITUTE OF ARTS AND SCIENCES, Incorporated by the Laws of 1890, the Sum of.................. Dollars ($...........), the Same to be Held in Trust by said Institute and the Annual Interest or Income thereof only to be Expended in Providing..

Witnesses { ....
{ .... Signed ....

A roaring Box Office success.

THE INSTITUTE PLAYERS

In

Aurania Rouverol's

"SKIDDING"

A Genuinely Amusing Comedy in Three Acts

Thursday and Friday Evenings,
October 29 and 30, at 8:15 o'clock

MUSIC HALL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Reserved Seat Tickets for Front Rows of Parquet and Balcony for each evening may now be obtained by presenting Weekly Ticket No. 1 or No. 2 and 25 or 50 cents at Institute Box Office.

A Member may obtain without charge a Reserved Seat Ticket for certain sections of Parquet and Balcony up to their capacity, for each performance, by presenting Weekly Ticket No. 1 at Box Office on or after Saturday, October 24. Additional seats for Rear Rows of Parquet or Balcony for each performance may be purchased by a Member at 25 cents.

Reserved Seat Tickets to Non-Members, $1.00, $1.25, $1.50.

THE CLARE TREE MAJOR COMPANY

Presents

Frances Hodgson Burnett's

"The Secret Garden"

A Delightful, Entertaining Play for Children in Three Acts

Saturday Afternoon, November 7 at 3 o'clock

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

To Members	25c, 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50
Boxes	$1.00, $1.50
To Non-Members	$1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00
Boxes	$1.75, $2.00

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

No Collectors
at Her Do

She doesn't run her housel haphazardly. She fixes a definite an in advance for her expenses and saving.

As a result she has no bills emergencies to worry about.

Our Booklet 35 contains a Spe Guide that will help you make management a business. Write f

Interest Starts from Day of De

THE BROOKL SAVINGS BA

Established 1827
Corner of Clinton and Pierrepont S
(With entrance also at 300 Fulton S

TOLLEFSE
STUDIOS OF MUSICAL ART
946 President St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
(Nr. Prospect Park W.)
Telephone, STerling 3-3730

A School for the Thorough Training of Serio Students

Augusta Tollefsen, Piano; Carl H. Tollefsen, Robert Thrane, 'Cello; Felix Deyo, Harmony a position.

Preparatory Instrumental Courses for Beg
Circular mailed on application—Apply to Sec

Form of Bequest to th

I Hereby Give and Bequeath to Th
ARTS AND SCIENCES, Incorporated
($...........), the Same to be Held thereof only to be Expended in Provid

Witnesses {...................
....

THE STEINWA GRA
DE RATIVE, BE UTIFUL
IS EASILY WITHIN YOU

IAV a einway in your living oy ma
10 ment and the balance will xtended peri f th e years! Drop i a einwa Hall today a y r inst ment. ● Steinways of prices, t there variation in quality.
S einway with the l ly tone, the pow bi ty that have m
seve y-five years,
in ur ent of the f
a composers.

STEIN OF THE I

be bought for a total a 10% down
hange. If there is no
ay & Sons, Steinway
ew York City.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, has said something which may be prophetic of an end of the dosing, or at least of a different way of administering the pills, bitter or sugar-coated. On his return from Europe he was quoted as saying that the time of experimentation is over. An era has about reached its close. Conductors should give more heed to repetitions. Certain composers have established themselves and no longer are to be regarded primarily as innovators. It is time to review an epoch that is no longer a new day. Let us pick and choose from among the many works tried out on a docile public and thereby assist the fittest to survive. These are not the Boston conductor's words, but this, for us, is the burden of his message. The time has come when second and third performances would seem now to be of more importance than a premiere.

AT FIRST blush we agree. But we would much prefer that Mr. Koussevitzky should do the picking and the choosing of the works to be repeated. He names a number of composers as having settled into almost the status of classics. To grant some of these even a real importance in a day of change would be a strain on our generosity. But that is a detail and of little consequence as compared to the principle of more repetitions as against fewer first performances. This principle gives rise to these parallel questions:

Is it better to go on playing new works, even if they yield little promise of being any worthier than those already played, because of a forlorn hope of chancing eventually on something that may prove itself beyond a doubt at its first hearing?

Or is it better to disregard new works which obviously are no better than those that already have been played and repeat the latter because of an equally desperate hope that a second or third hearing will bring belated justice to something not fully grasped, understood or appreciated the first time?

THESE questions, it should be stated, are ours, not Mr. Koussevitzky's. His assumption may be, and presumably is, the very different one, that a certain number of composers and compositions of the post-war era have established themselves, and that the conductor who gives them further performances in some measure will be meeting a public demand. This we doubt. Conductors must create the demand. Unhappily, there may be more difficulty persuading audiences to listen with open mind a second time than a first.

It is one thing to admit a contemporary composer into the conducters' own gallery of "classics." It is quite another to convince the public that it enjoys what it does not enjoy. But who is to say what the public enjoys? Who really knows? What certain proofs are there with respect to the enjoyment of any first-time or second-time novelty not so fortunate or unfortunate as to be a transitory sensation like the Ravel Bolero? Does the applause in the concert hall begin to tell the story? Or a few subsequent letters of appreciation? Or a world-wide barrage of critical derogation?

Not to go farther back than many of our elder concert habitues can remember, we may ask what clear indications there were when the Strauss tone-poems were new that they would become almost indispensable to our symphonic programs during the next four decades. In the face of much sharp criticism, what clear evidence was conveyed to conductors that this was music that would grow in popularity with inevitable repetitions? They provoked no end of discussion. They led to widespread controversy. But discussion and controversy have raged about various works that in a relatively short time were relegated to the ash heap. Severe condemnation at the outset may be a great help, but it by no means insures the future success of a composition or composer, whatever the causes of the hostility thus evoked.

THE difficulty, as we see it, with respect to such recent music as the conscientious conductor may feel should be brought back now for further hearings, is not so much that of hostility as of weariness and indifference. Has Hindemith written anything that a first-class controversy could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du Printemps."

SO FAR as any desire to hear these works manifests itself on the surface, we are inclined to believe that the conductor who repeats them or their like will have need to know more of the reactions of countless individuals than those individuals themselves know. This uncertainty of mind on the part of innumerable persons who are neither pro-modern nor the contrary may be of itself a strong argument for repetitions. But uncertainty does not make for enthusiasm; it does imply the need of conversion.

Some of the reaction that undoubtedly has set in against the experimental music of yesterday—a reaction none the less definite though against something never popularly embraced—has taken the form of such wholesale condemnation of composers, compositions, conductors and literary exegetes as to represent an almost fanatical intolerance. One way, perhaps, to maintain or restore a saner outlook is to refuse to limit "contemporary" music to the post-war period. This is, in practice, just what is done with respect to such composers as Stravinsky and Ravel. If the career of either had been cut short fifteen years ago, that would not have justified elimination of their earlier works as music not properly belonging to our era.

THIS may have some bearing on our outlook with respect to Debussy and Strauss. If Debussy had lived and preserved similarly his mental vigor, he would have been no more antiquated a figure than Strauss. They were within two years of an age, their creative gifts blossomed in the same decades.

Must either, or both, be eliminated from the contemporary scene—Debussy because he died some thirteen years ago; Strauss because his last significant work was written about the time of Debussy's death?

The longer view that takes in these men may be a logical safeguard against undue pessimism with respect to all so-called modern music. To sweep them out of the picture as not representative of the times is easy enough to do; but the reasonableness of doing so is not so unquestionable when attempt is made to reconcile the conflicting aims, means and styles of the composers who have reached the apogee of their careers in the last twenty years.

Ravel certainly is closer to Debussy than he is to Schoenberg, and there is less that is common to Hindemith and Respighi than there is to Alban Berg and Strauss. Sibelius, however solitary, is a definite tie with the past.

When we become less age-conscious, when we stop trying to draw a line as between what is modern and what is not, the task of settling contemporary composers in their places is going to be a much simpler one. If more repetitions of works of the last two decades will contribute to this end, the dread of an occasional rehearing of something that was tedious the first time and may be more so the second ought not to stand in the way. In the words of an ancient wheeze, faint heart never filled a spade flush.

16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 18 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY CAREER UNIQUE AND ROMANTIC

Boston Conductor Ran Away At 14, Became Bass Viol Virtuoso, Moderns' Friend

By DEEMS TAYLOR
Famous Critic and Composer.

CHAMPIONING MODERNISTS

To save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw.

When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

also founded the Russian Music Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

OCT 17 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Closing an Era and a Proposal That Second and Third Performances Now Are More Important Than First

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the nonmusical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Koussevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding, has said something which may be prophetic of an end of the dosing, or at least of a different way of administering the pills, bitter or sugar-coated. On his return from Europe he was quoted as saying that the time of experimentation is over. An era has about reached its close. Conductors should give more heed to repetitions. Certain composers have established themselves and no longer are to be regarded primarily as innovators. It is time to review an epoch that is no longer a new day. Let us pick and choose from among the many works tried out on a docile public and thereby assist the fittest to survive. These are not the Boston conductor's words, but this, for us, is the burden of his message. The time has come when second and third performances would seem now to be of more importance than a premiere.

AT FIRST blush we agree. But we would much prefer that Mr. Koussevitzky should do the picking and the choosing of the works to be repeated. He names a number of composers as having settled into almost the status of classics. To grant some of these even a real importance in a day of change would be a strain on our generosity. But that is a detail and of little consequence as compared to the principle of more repetitions as against fewer first performances. This principle gives rise to these parallel questions:

Is it better to go on playing new works, even if they yield little promise of being any worthier than those already played, because of a forlorn hope of chancing eventually on something that may prove itself beyond a doubt at its first hearing?

Or is it better to disregard new works which obviously are no better than those that already have been played and repeat the latter because of an equally desperate hope that a second or third hearing will bring belated justice to something not fully grasped, understood or appreciated the first time?

THESE questions, it should be stated, are ours, not Mr. Koussevitzky's. His assumption may be, and presumably is, the very different one, that a certain number of composers and compositions of the post-war era have established themselves, and that the conductor who gives them further performances in some measure will be meeting a public demand. This we doubt. Conductors must create the demand. Unhappily, there may be more difficulty persuading audiences to listen with open mind a second time than a first.

It is one thing to admit a contemporary composer into the conductors' own gallery of "classics." It is quite another to convince the public that it enjoys what it does not enjoy. But who is to say what the public enjoys? Who really knows? What certain proofs are there with respect to the enjoyment of any first-time or second-time novelty not so fortunate or unfortunate as to be a transitory sensation like the Ravel Bolero? Does the applause in the concert hall begin to tell the story? Or a few subsequent letters of appreciation? Or a world-wide barrage of critical derogation?

Not to go farther back than many of our elder concert habitues can remember, we may ask what clear indications there were when the Strauss tone-poems were new that they would become almost indispensable to our symphonic programs during the next four decades. In the face of much sharp criticism, what clear evidence was conveyed to conductors that this was music that would grow in popularity with inevitable repetitions? They provoked no end of discussion. They led to widespread controversy. But discussion and controversy have raged about various works that in a relatively short time were relegated to the ash heap. Severe condemnation at the outset may be a great help, but it by no means insures the future success of a composition or composer, whatever the causes of the hostility thus evoked.

THE difficulty, as we see it, with respect to such recent music as the conscientious conductor may feel should be brought back now for further hearings, is not so much that of hostility as of weariness and indifference. Has Hindemith written anything that a first-class controversy could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du Printemps."

SO FAR as any desire to hear these works manifests itself on the surface, we are inclined to believe that the conductor who repeats them or their like will have need to know more of the reactions of countless individuals than those individuals themselves know. This uncertainty of mind on the part of innumerable persons who are neither pro-modern nor the contrary may be of itself a strong argument for repetitions. But uncertainty does not make for enthusiasm; it does imply the need of conversion.

Some of the reaction that undoubtedly has set in against the experimental music of yesterday—a reaction none the less definite though against something never popularly embraced—has taken the form of such wholesale condemnation of composers, compositions, conductors and literary exegetes as to represent an almost fanatical intolerance. One way, perhaps, to maintain or restore a saner outlook is to refuse to limit "contemporary" music to the post-war period. This is, in practice, just what is done with respect to such composers as Stravinsky and Ravel. If the career of either had been cut short fifteen years ago, that would not have justified elimination of their earlier works as music not properly belonging to our era.

THIS may have some bearing on our outlook with respect to Debussy and Strauss. If Debussy had lived and preserved similarly his mental vigor, he would have been no more antiquated a figure than Strauss. They were within two years of an age, their creative gifts blossomed in the same decades.

Must either, or both, be eliminated from the contemporary scene—Debussy because he died some thirteen years ago; Strauss because his last significant work was written about the time of Debussy's death?

The longer view that takes in these men may be a logical safeguard against undue pessimism with respect to all so-called modern music. To sweep them out of the picture as not representative of the times is easy enough to do; but the reasonableness of doing so is not so unquestionable when attempt is made to reconcile the conflicting aims, means and styles of the composers who have reached the apogee of their careers in the last twenty years.

Ravel certainly is closer to Debussy than he is to Schoenberg, and there is less that is common to Hindemith and Respighi than there is to Alban Berg and Strauss. Sibelius, however solitary, is a definite tie with the past.

When we become less age-conscious, when we stop trying to draw a line as between what is modern and what is not, the task of settling contemporary composers in their places is going to be a much simpler one. If more repetitions of works of the last two decades will contribute to this end, the dread of an occasional rehearing of something that was tedious the first time and may be more so the second ought not to stand in the way. In the words of an ancient wheeze, faint heart never filled a spade flush.

TIN OF THE

ectors er Do her housel es a definite an expenses and has no bills ry about.
ntains a Spe lp you make ess." Write f n Day of Dep
OOKL
S BA
ed 1827
d Pierrepont St
t 300 Fulton S

EFSE
MUSICAL ART
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Park W.)
Training of Seriou
Carl H. Tollefsen,
Deyo, Harmony ar
Courses for Begin
Apply to Secre

uest to the Bequeath to Th
, Incorporated me to be Held nded in Providi
. . . .
. . . .

THE STEINWA GRA
DE RATIVE, BE UTIFUL
IS EASILY WITHIN YOU

a einway in your living ay ma
10 ment and the balance will xtended peri f th e years! Drop i a einwa Hall today a y ur insti ment.
Steinways o
prices, t there variation in quality
S einway with the l ly tone, the pow b ty that have m
seve y-five years.
in ur ent of the f
a composers.

STEIN
OF THE IM

be bought for a total a 10% down
hange. If there is no
vay & Sons, Steinwa
ew York City.

IPPING FROM LANTA, GA.
GEORGIAN

OCT 20 1931

Words and Music

By DEEMS TAYLOR

A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter.

So the lad departed, taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow, the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examinations at once.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory, and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them, Which would he choose to study: the French horn, the trombone or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians, Dragonetti and Bottesini). The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make [illegible] for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious; for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Madame Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian music publishing house for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical or too commercially unpromising for other publishers to venture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

OCT 18 1931

Life of Serge Koussevitzky, Famous Russian Conductor, Reads Like True Romance

BY DEEMS TAYLOR.
(Famous Musical Critic and Opera Composer)

NEW YORK, Oct. 17.—A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter. So the lad departed taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and 3 rubles that he had saved. The 3 rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

Admitted.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study; the French horn, the trombone or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians Dragonetti and Bottesini). The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists, and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious; for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument. If the desire were enough, the subways would be jammed with Kreislers, Heifetzes, Zimbalists, Rachmaninoffs, Paderewskis, Casalses and Salmonds.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

Romance.

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Mme. Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso. He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian Music Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical, or too commercially unpromising, for other publishers to venture.

In order to save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrushka," on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw. When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

OCT 22 1931

Kreinin, Ex-Concert Master for Koussevitsky, Is Dead

Left Moscow to Join Boston Symphony Orchestra—Succumbs to Injuries Received When Struck by an Automobile—Was Soloist in Opera Theatre in Petrograd.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitsky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when he was struck by an automobile several days ago.

He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the opera theatre in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were begun in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 19 1931

The LISTENING POST by Vic

KOUSSEVITZKY RELENTS.

IT WAS a long, long battle with the Boston Symphony to get the program which is now announced for the coming concert in Columbus. Originally the Seventh of Beethoven and some other numbers were arranged. Then it became known that Mr. Koussevitzky wanted to do the "Eroica." Mrs. Maybel Huntington, negotiating for the Symphony club, refused to accept the change. She telephoned east and a New York manager ran down to a home on Long Island to discuss the matter with Koussevitzky. Finally it was decided that this program should be given, as you perhaps read in other journals last Friday: Concerto Grosso No. 12 for String Orchestras, by Mandel, a number that Koussevitzky urged; a prelude to Lohengrin, Wagner; La Valse, Ravel; Seventh Symphony, Beethoven. Only season tickets now on sale.

The Ohio State Journal
Published Every Morning in the Year by
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL CO

Columbus Office. The Ohio State Journal Building.
Telephone: ADams 8151.
New York Office: New York Central Building.
Chicago Office: Room 1309, 75 E. Wacker Drive.
Philadelphia Office: Fidelity-Philadelphia Trust Bldg., 123 So. Broad St.
San Francisco Office: 501 Sharon Building.
Los Angeles Office: 117 W. Ninth St.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES
Delivered by Carrier.
Daily only, week...$0.15 Daily-Sunday, week..$0.25
Daily only, month.... .65 Daily-Sunday, month 1.09
Daily only, year ... 7.80 Daily-Sunday, year..13.00
MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS IN ADVANCE.
(Within 150-mile radius of Columbus.)
Daily and Sunday, one month $1.05
Daily-Sunday, year $11.00 Daily only, year..... 6.00
Daily only, month.. .55 Sunday only, year .. 5.00
(Outside of 150-mile radius, rates on application.)

Entered at Postoffice, Columbus, as second-class matter.

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper and also the local news published herein.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931.

--Here shall the Press
the people's right maintain

A Musical Treat.

LOVERS of music in Columbus and central Ohio have reason to rejoice over the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Oct. 29, when it will open a season of symphonic concerts arranged by the Central Ohio Symphony Club. For years the Boston orchestra has been acclaimed the greatest of its kind. It has been fortunate in having an abundance of wealthy friends, who pour millions into the treasury to maintain and improve it and the greatest living conductors have been employed to direct its programs. It was born under a lucky star and its career has been marked by steady progress in the direction of musical idealism. Its appearance in any city is a musical event of the first importance, and Columbus is fortunate in securing it for the first of the five programs of the season. For the present year its programs have been chosen by its patrons, a referendum request having been distributed last spring. Columbus will hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most popular offerings, and excerpts from the masterful Wagner, always welcomed by music lovers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 18 1931

TA, CA.
GIAN

OCT 2 1931

Words and Music

—By DEEMS TAYLOR—

A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter.

So the lad departed, taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow, the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examinations at once.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory, and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study: the French horn, the trombone or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians, Dragonetti and Bottesini). The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious: for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Madame Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian music publishing house for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical or too commercially unpromising for other publishers to venture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

OCT 18 1931

Life of Serge Koussevitzky, Famous Russian Conductor, Reads Like True Romance

BY DEEMS TAYLOR.
(Famous Musical Critic and Opera Composer)

NEW YORK, Oct. 17.—A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter. So the lad departed taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and 3 rubles that he had saved. The 3 rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

Admitted.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study; the French horn, the trombone or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians Dragonetti and Bottesini). The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists, and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious; for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument. If the desire were enough, the subways would be jammed with Kreislers, Heifetzes, Zimbalists, Rachmaninoffs, Paderewskis, Casalses and Salmonds.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

Romance.

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Mme. Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso. He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian Music Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical, or too commercially unpromising, for other publishers to venture.

In order to save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrushka," on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw. When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

OCT 22 1931

Kreinin, Ex-Concert Master for Koussevitsky, Is Dead

Left Moscow to Join Boston Symphony Orchestra—Succumbs to Injuries Received When Struck by an Automobile—Was Soloist in Opera Theatre in Petrograd.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitsky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when he was struck by an automobile several days ago.

He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the opera theatre in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were begun in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

the LISTENING POST by Vic

KOUSSEVITZKY RELENTS.

IT WAS a long, long battle with the Boston Symphony to get the program which is now announced for the coming concert in Columbus. Originally the Seventh of Beethoven and some other numbers were arranged. Then it became known that Mr. Koussevitzky wanted to do the "Eroica." Mrs. Maybel Huntington, negotiating for the Symphony club, refused to accept the change. She telephoned east and a New York manager ran down to a home on Long Island to discuss the matter with Koussevitzky. Finally it was decided that this program should be given, as you perhaps read in other journals last Friday: Concerto Grosso No. 12 for String Orchestras, by Mandel, a number that Koussevitzky urged; a prelude to Lohengrin, Wagner; La Valse, Ravel; Seventh Symphony, Beethoven. Only season tickets now on sale.

The Ohio State Journal
Published Every Morning in the Year by
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL CO

Columbus Office. The Ohio State Journal Building.
Telephone: ADams 8151.
New York Office: New York Central Building.
Chicago Office: Room 1309, 75 E. Wacker Drive.
Philadelphia Office: Fidelity-Philadelphia Trust Bldg., 123 So. Broad St.
San Francisco Office: 801 Sharon Building.
Los Angeles Office: 117 W. Ninth St.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES
Delivered by Carrier.
Daily only, week...$0.15 Daily-Sunday, week..$0.25
Daily only, month.... .65 Daily-Sunday, month 1.09
Daily only, year ... 7.80 Daily-Sunday, year..13.00
MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS IN ADVANCE.
(Within 150-mile radius of Columbus.)
Daily and Sunday, one month $1.05
Daily-Sunday, year $11.00 Daily only, year..... 6.00
Daily only, month.. .55 Sunday only, year .. 5.00
(Outside of 150-mile radius, rates on application.)

Entered at Postoffice, Columbus, as second-class matter.

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper and also the local news published herein.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931.

--Here shall the Press the people's right maintain

A Musical Treat.

LOVERS of music in Columbus and central Ohio have reason to rejoice over the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Oct. 29, when it will open a season of symphonic concerts arranged by the Central Ohio Symphony Club. For years the Boston orchestra has been acclaimed the greatest of its kind. It has been fortunate in having an abundance of wealthy friends, who pour millions into the treasury to maintain and improve it and the greatest living conductors have been employed to direct its programs. It was born under a lucky star and its career has been marked by steady progress in the direction of musical idealism. Its appearance in any city is a musical event of the first importance, and Columbus is fortunate in securing it for the first of the five programs of the season. For the present year its programs have been chosen by its patrons, a referendum request having been distributed last spring. Columbus will hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most popular offerings, and excerpts from the masterful Wagner, always welcomed by music lovers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

ITA. CA.
RGIAN

OCT 2 0 1931

Words and Music

—By DEEMS TAYLOR—

A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter.

So the lad departed, taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow, the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examinations at once.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory, and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study: the French horn, the trombone or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians, Dragonetti and Bottesini). The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious: for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Madame Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian music publishing house for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical or too commercially unpromising for other publishers to venture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

OCT 18 1931

Life of Serge Koussevitzky, Famous Russian Conductor, Reads Like True Romance

BY DEEMS TAYLOR.
(Famous Musical Critic and Opera Composer)

NEW YORK, Oct. 17.—A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter. So the lad departed taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and 3 rubles that he had saved. The 3 rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: the Conservatory and the Philharmonic School. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic School, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring. Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

Admitted.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study; the French horn, the trombone or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians Dragonetti and Bottesini). The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists, and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately chose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious; for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument. If the desire were enough, the subways would be jammed with Kreislers, Heifetzes, Zimbalists, Rachmaninoffs, Paderewskis, Casalses and Salmonds.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

Romance.

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Mme. Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso. He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian Music Publishing House, for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical, or too commercially unpromising, for other publishers to venture.

In order to save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrushka," on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw. When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but he bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian Music Publishing House and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

OCT 22 1931

Kreinin, Ex-Concert Master for Koussevitsky, Is Dead

Left Moscow to Join Boston Symphony Orchestra—Succumbs to Injuries Received When Struck by an Automobile—Was Soloist in Opera Theatre in Petrograd.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitsky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when he was struck by an automobile several days ago.

He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the opera theatre in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were begun in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

The LISTENING POST by Vic

KOUSSEVITZKY RELENTS.

IT WAS a long, long battle with the Boston Symphony to get the program which is now announced for the coming concert in Columbus. Originally the Seventh of Beethoven and some other numbers were arranged. Then it became known that Mr. Koussevitzky wanted to do the "Eroica." Mrs. Maybel Huntington, negotiating for the Symphony club, refused to accept the change. She telephoned east and a New York manager ran down to a home on Long Island to discuss the matter with Koussevitzky. Finally it was decided that this program should be given, as you perhaps read in other journals last Friday: Concerto Grosso No. 12 for String Orchestras, by Mandel, a number that Koussevitzky urged; a prelude to Lohengrin, Wagner; La Valse, Ravel; Seventh Symphony, Beethoven. Only season tickets now on sale.

The Ohio State Journal
Published Every Morning in the Year by
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL CO

Columbus Office. The Ohio State Journal Building.
Telephone: ADams 8151.
New York Office: New York Central Building.
Chicago Office: Room 1309, 75 E. Wacker Drive.
Philadelphia Office: Fidelity-Philadelphia Trust Bldg., 123 So. Broad St.
San Francisco Office: 301 Sharon Building.
Los Angeles Office: 117 W. Ninth St.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES
Delivered by Carrier.
Daily only, week...$0.15 Daily-Sunday, week..$0.25
Daily only, month... .65 Daily-Sunday, month 1.09
Daily only, year ... 7.80 Daily-Sunday, year..13.00
MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS IN ADVANCE.
(Within 150-mile radius of Columbus.)
Daily and Sunday, one month $1.05
Daily-Sunday, year $11.00 Daily only, year..... 6.00
Daily only, month.. .55 Sunday only, year .. 5.00
(Outside of 150-mile radius, rates on application.)

Entered at Postoffice, Columbus, as second-class matter.

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper and also the local news published herein.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931.

--Here shall the Press
the people's right maintain

A Musical Treat.

LOVERS of music in Columbus and central Ohio have reason to rejoice over the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Oct. 29, when it will open a season of symphonic concerts arranged by the Central Ohio Symphony Club. For years the Boston orchestra has been acclaimed the greatest of its kind. It has been fortunate in having an abundance of wealthy friends, who pour millions into the treasury to maintain and improve it and the greatest living conductors have been employed to direct its programs. It was born under a lucky star and its career has been marked by steady progress in the direction of musical idealism. Its appearance in any city is a musical event of the first importance, and Columbus is fortunate in securing it for the first of the five programs of the season. For the present year its programs have been chosen by its patrons, a referendum request having been distributed last spring. Columbus will hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most popular offerings, and excerpts from the masterful Wagner, always welcomed by music lovers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

18 Boston Concerts
oct 9 - 10

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1931

the World—Theatrical News

Serge Koussevitzky, From a Bust by Guirdjan; Reproduced From Arthur Lourié's "Biographical Chronicle" of the Conductor.

Koussevitzky and the B. S. O.

By L. A. SLOPER

ON THE day (Oct. 9) that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, entering upon the eighth year of his magistracy, opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Alfred A. Knopf seasonably published Arthur Lourié's "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch: a Biographical Chronicle."

In undertaking this service of love, Mr. Lourié labored under a triple handicap: he is a musician; he is a close friend of the subject of his book, and he is unfamiliar with the American musical situation. Musicians are notoriously unskillful with words; friends find it difficult to view each other objectively, and with an imperfect knowledge of American musical affairs, it is hardly possible to give a fair account of Dr. Koussevitzky since 1924.

Mr. Lourié's book, therefore, must be classed with Mrs. Sollitt's on Willem Mengelberg and Mr. Nicotra's on Arturo Toscanini. It is the product of a friend, a hero-worshiper and a rhapsodist. We must expect to find in it, then, a labored style, some interesting facts concerning the life of the hero, some critical opinions which require modification and a considerable amount of inaccuracy.

Koussevitzky in America

The inaccuracies cluster obviously round the chapters on Koussevitzky in America. Granting the Boston Orchestra "a glorious past," the author tells us that when Koussevitzky arrived he "found an abominable routine and a lack of discipline. The concerts had lost their former prestige, and subscriptions had almost ceased."

This information will be of peculiar interest to Bostonians, and particularly to symphony subscribers. It is quite true that the orchestra had had a glorious past, and that it had suffered a slump through the effects of the war and of the "strike" of 1920; but persons on the ground had been under the impression that between 1920 and 1924 it had regained much of the ground lost. That, indeed, was the general opinion of competent observers in Boston and New York. As for the subscriptions, the number of seats unsubscribed at the Friday and Saturday concerts in the spring of 1924 may have been 150 short of the hall's capacity of 2570.

Again: "Before his arrival the programs had been built up without system, impersonal and casual; they now acquired a freshness and were drawn up logically and with a sense of proportion and harmoniousness."

Yet Mr. Pierre Monteux was a conductor of some international note whose abilities as a program-maker had won approval in high quarters.

Once more: "During his (Koussevitzky's) first two years in America he gave 52 orchestral programs without repeating a single work."

Koussevitzky's first two seasons ran from October, 1924, to May, 1926. He directed Borodin's Polovtsian Dances, March 27 and May 1, 1925, and April 23, 1926; Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Oct. 24, 1924, and Jan. 22, 1926; Strauss's "Don Juan," Feb. 6, 1925, and Feb. 26, 1926; Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka" Suite, Jan. 23, 1925, and April 30, 1926; Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Piano Concerto, Dec. 12, 1924, and April, 16, 1926.

And finally: "He introduced Brahms to Boston, where he had been respected but very little played."

Before Koussevitzky arrived in Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had given 88 performances of the four Brahms symphonies, beginning in 1881; and had frequently played the overtures, concertos and miscellaneous items.

Glory Enough for All

Small matters, do you say? Very simple, then, to get them straight. It is not necessary to depreciate Monteux in order to glorify Koussevitzky. There is glory enough for both. Monteux, like Gericke, built and drilled an orchestra; Koussevitzky, like Nikisch, took over a fine instrument and played upon it. Furthermore, Koussevitzky, like any conductor of quality, has grown with the orchestra. It is no discredit to him to say that he has had a superb orchestra to work with, or that he is a much better conductor today than he was in 1924. If he had not had such an instrument provided him, he could hardly have achieved what he has achieved, especially in view of his technique of conducting, under which, as Lourié notes, "plastic gesticulation" is relied upon, rather than a clear beat. Mr. Lourié remarks, too, upor Koussevitzky's predilection for leaving no doubt that when he says slow, he means slow. Yet the conductor on several occasions has materially altered his tempi in Boston after adverse criticism.

We assume that Mr. Lourié is more familiar with his facts when he writes about European events. He tells an interesting story of Koussevitzky's necessitous childhood, youthful struggles, marriage, career as a double-bass virtuoso, voyages down the Volga with his own orchestra, publishing ventures, services under the Soviets and experiences as conductor in western Europe. He divides the conductor's career into three periods, that in which he introduced western music to Russia, that in which he introduced Russian music to the west and the present "international" period.

While denying ourselves the superlatives which Mr. Lourié, as an artist, may permit himself, we may still share his admiration for Koussevitzky as an original and exciting conductor.

The First Program

The first concert of the season gave reason for renewing this admiration. With an orchestra whose personnel remains identical with that of last season, Dr. Koussevitzky was able to offer a performance which would have been as acceptable in March as it was in October.

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms was the central item. It was then performed—as Mr. Lourié may be interested to learn—for the twenty-sixth time at these concerts. It received the usual highly dramatized Koussevitzkyan reading, with superb climaxes in the first movement and in the Chaconne with variations.

The program opened with those translucent orchestral settings by Schönberg of two Bach Choral Preludes—"Schmücke Dich, O Liebe Seele" and "Komm, Gott, Schöpfer, Heiliger Geist"—which Dr. Koussevitzky really did introduce to Boston in 1927.

In the second half of the program Dr. Koussevitzky made a genuflection toward his adoptive country by publishing César Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Éolides," and the Second Suite of excerpts from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloé."

So far as the Franck item was concerned, the tribute was not perhaps quite so warm as the conductor intended—through no fault of his. He and the orchestra did all they could for this music, whose day, however, seems to be definitely past. The Ravel Suite was a different matter. The performance matched the score for brilliance.

The conductor was warmly welcomed by the Friday audience, and the applause after the Brahms and the Ravel compositions was sufficiently prolonged to justify his calling the men to their feet. An auspicious beginning of the season

---

Symphony and Kreisler Usher in Music Season

Globe Oct 11

By Morris Hastings

THE music season is on. It was ushered in last Friday by the first Boston Symphony concert. Fritz Kreisler, as is his custom, opens the recital season this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Kreisler begins his concert with two Bach compositions, first the E-minor Suite, and then, a Sarabande and Gigue for violin alone.

There are but few violinists who care to attempt in public concert a Bach work for unaccompanied violin. But Kreisler, with his mastery over technique so great that one forgets that what he is doing is difficult, brings to this music a luminous understanding and profound musicianship.

Bach emerges from this great violinist's hands and imagination as a figure of almost romantic charm, an abidingly friendly and compassionate spirit.

In the last two seasons there has been an absence of "gumdrops" from Kreisler's printed programs. Today, in addition to the Bach, he is scheduled to play Mozart's lovely G-major Concerto, Ravel's brilliant "Habanera," an ancient minuet by Porpora and a Rimsky Korsakoff "Fantasy"—all of which are musical treats.

The place of honor on next Friday's and Saturday's Symphony program is given to Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony. This composer, once a conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has been for the most part neglected in this country. An unbridled and rather diffuse romanticism led him to compose music on such a large scale that its performance has been judged unfeasible.

The Ninth Symphony, however, Groves reassures us, is a serene and fine work, one of his most important.

However one may feel about Mahler as a composer, it appears that there were no two ways of considering him as a conductor. Brahms heard Mahler conduct a performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" in Budapest and pronounced him "a devil of a fellow."

Mahler's musical talents displayed themselves early in his life. He was peculiarly sensative, it is said, to the folktunes of his native Bohemia, and he played everything that he heard, particularly brass band marches, when he was only four years old, on his accordion.

As companions to the symphony on this week's program, Dr. Koussevitzky will present Wagner's marvelous "Siegfried Idyll" and the stirring overture play.

Big Ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky

Oct 10

Dr. Koussevitzky was given a tremendously friendly welcome back to the Hub when he stepped out on Symphony Hall stage to conduct the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra's 51st season. No conductor in the history of the orchestra has won popularity so rapidly and kept it so firmly. Under his leadership the orchestra has fully recovered the dazzling heights it reached during the Muck regime. The Russian leader himself has at the same time gained power and asurance.

The hall was crowded, as usual, at this first matinee and there was the warm enthusiasm nearly always to be found at Boston Symphony concerts. Brahms' fourth symphony, Cesar Franck's tone poem, "Les Eolides," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite and the modern arrangement of two of Bach's choral preludes were the numbers shrewdly chosen and spiritedly performed.

Mahler's ninth symphony will be an outstanding novelty at next week's concerts. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and "Tannhaeuser" overture are also to be played.

SYMPHONY OPENS 51ST MUSIC YEAR

New Policy in Making Lists Decidedly Conservative

Post Oct 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The keynote of a symphony season that promises to be relatively classical and conservative rather than modernistic and experimental was sounded at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his eighth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A NEW RESTRAINT

There was a hint of this new restraint even in the conductor's attitude toward the applauding orchestra and audience that simultaneously rose in greeting as he came upon the platform. For a moment only he graciously accepted these plaudits, then with a double wave of the hand he made both companies be seated and turned directly to the task before him.

More specifically did the pieces of the afternoon bespeak the new policy in programme-making. On this list was no name more strange than that of Maurice Ravel who in his 57th year finds his music firmly fixed in the repertoire, while before it came three names already hallowed Bach, Brahms and Franck.

Bach in Modern Orchestra

From Bach the chosen pieces were the two chorale-preludes, "Schmuecke Dich, O Liebe Seele" and "Komm, Gott, Schoepfer, Heiliger Geist" as orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg, originally made known to us some four seasons ago. The first of the two is Bach at his raptest. The second is at once a more concise and a more externalized music, and Schoenberg has seen fit to lend it the sonorities of the full modern orchestra. His treatment of the companion piece is, however, more discreet, and only those who have an organist's conscience toward this music will question the fittingness of the programme's opening.

Surely the performance of the "Schmuecke Dich" was duly reverent, and the second prelude made a brave sound.

Brahms' Fourth

Brahms was the symphonist of the day and the conductor's choice fixed upon the ripest and mellowest, the most Brahmsian of them all, the autumnal Fourth, unplayed in Symphony Hall since the Brahms Festival of two springs ago. That previous performance was memorably eloquent; that of yesterday was no less so. Some will have this symphony bardic, vigorous, even a bit strident of voice. Some have read into it crabbedness and pessimism and a dread of the unknown. Dr. Koussevitzky quite evidently finds it warm, human and tender, as though it were a tonal endorsement of Browning's "The last of life for which the first was made" and the listener shares that faith with him.

Franck, a master, did not always write masterpieces. "Les Eolides," played yesterday for the first time in many seasons, is not of the enduring stuff, say, of the symphony, the string quartet and the organ chorales. It is graceful; it is also tenuous and a little cloying. Even the caressing hand which Dr. Koussevitzky laid upon it yesterday could not redeem it from occasional dullness.

Orchestra of Dazzling Color

We are too near to Ravel to say with certainty what of his music is enduring. There have been times when the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," with which yesterday's concert ended, has seemed ill to withstand Dr. Koussevitzky's fondness for it. Yesterday the suite was renewed through a performance that transcended all that conductor and orchestra have hitherto accomplished with it, a performance of astounding virtuosity, dazzling color and superb rhythmic strength.

For Dr. Koussevitzky and his men there is no resting on past achievements, however notable. Yesterday found them soaring to new heights.

18 Boston Concerts
oct 9 - 10

Serge Koussevitzky, From a Bust by Guirdjan; Reproduced From Arthur Lourié's "Biographical Chronicle" of the Conductor.

Koussevitzky and the B. S. O.

By L. A. SLOPER

ON THE day (Oct. 9) that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, entering upon the eighth year of his magistracy, opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Alfred A. Knopf seasonably published Arthur Lourié's "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch: a Biographical Chronicle."

In undertaking this service of love, Mr. Lourié labored under a triple handicap: he is a musician; he is a close friend of the subject of his book, and he is unfamiliar with the American musical situation. Musicians are notoriously unskillful with words; friends find it difficult to view each other objectively, and with an imperfect knowledge of American musical affairs, it is hardly possible to give a fair account of Dr. Koussevitzky since 1924.

Mr. Lourié's book, therefore, must be classed with Mrs. Sollitt's on Willem Mengelberg and Mr. Nicotra's on Arturo Toscanini. It is the product of a friend, a hero-worshiper and a rhapsodist. We must expect to find in it, then, a labored style, some interesting facts concerning the life of the hero, some critical opinions which require modification and a considerable amount of inaccuracy.

Koussevitzky in America

The inaccuracies cluster obviously round the chapters on Koussevitzky in America. Granting the Boston Orchestra "a glorious past," the author tells us that when Koussevitzky arrived he "found an abominable routine and a lack of discipline. The concerts had lost their former prestige, and subscriptions had almost ceased."

This information will be of peculiar interest to Bostonians, and particularly to symphony subscribers. It is quite true that the orchestra had had a glorious past, and that it had suffered a slump through the effects of the war and of the "strike" of 1920; but persons on the ground had been under the impression that between 1920 and 1924 it had regained much of the ground lost. That, indeed, was the general opinion of competent observers in Boston and New York. As for the subscriptions, the number of seats unsubscribed at the Friday and Saturday concerts in the spring of 1924 may have been 150 short of the hall's capacity of 2570.

Again: "Before his arrival the programs had been built up without system, impersonal and casual; they now acquired a freshness and were drawn up logically and with a sense of proportion and harmoniousness."

Yet Mr. Pierre Monteux was a conductor of some international note whose abilities as a program-maker had won approval in high quarters.

Once more: "During his (Koussevitzky's) first two years in America he gave 52 orchestral programs without repeating a single work."

Koussevitzky's first two seasons ran from October, 1924, to May, 1926. He directed Borodin's Polovtsian Dances, March 27 and May 1, 1925, and April 23, 1926; Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Oct. 24, 1924, and Jan. 22, 1926; Strauss's "Don Juan," Feb. 6, 1925, and Feb. 26, 1926; Stravinsky's "Pétrouchka" Suite, Jan. 23, 1925, and April 30, 1926; Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Piano Concerto, Dec. 12, 1924, and April, 16, 1926.

And finally: "He introduced Brahms to Boston, where he had been respected but very little played."

Before Koussevitzky arrived in Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had given 88 performances of the four Brahms symphonies, beginning in 1881; and had frequently played the overtures, concertos and miscellaneous items.

Glory Enough for All

Small matters, do you say? Very simple, then, to get them straight. It is not necessary to depreciate Monteux in order to glorify Koussevitzky. There is glory enough for both. Monteux, like Gericke, built and drilled an orchestra; Koussevitzky, like Nikisch, took over a fine instrument and played upon it. Furthermore, Koussevitzky, like any conductor of quality, has grown with the orchestra. It is no discredit to him to say that he has had a superb orchestra to work with, or that he is a much better conductor today than he was in 1924. If he had not had such an instrument provided him, he could hardly have achieved what he has achieved, especially in view of his technique of conducting, under which, as Lourié notes, "plastic gesticulation" is relied upon, rather than a clear beat. Mr. Lourié remarks, too, upor Koussevitzky's predilection for leaving no doubt that when he says slow, he means slow. Yet the conductor on several occasions has materially altered his tempi in Boston after adverse criticism.

We assume that Mr. Lourié is more familiar with his facts when he writes about European events. He tells an interesting story of Koussevitzky's necessitous childhood, youthful struggles, marriage, career as a double-bass virtuoso, voyages down the Volga with his own orchestra, publishing ventures, services under the Soviets and experiences as conductor in western Europe. He divides the conductor's career into three periods, that in which he introduced western music to Russia, that in which he introduced Russian music to the west and the present "international" period.

While denying ourselves the superlatives which Mr. Lourié, as an artist, may permit himself, we may still share his admiration for Koussevitzky as an original and exciting conductor.

The First Program

The first concert of the season gave reason for renewing this admiration. With an orchestra whose personnel remains identical with that of last season, Dr. Koussevitzky was able to offer a performance which would have been as acceptable in March as it was in October.

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms was the central item. It was then performed—as Mr. Lourié may be interested to learn—for the twenty-sixth time at these concerts. It received the usual highly dramatized Koussevitzkyan reading, with superb climaxes in the first movement and in the Chaconne with variations.

The program opened with those translucent orchestral settings by Schönberg of two Bach Choral Preludes—"Schmücke Dich, O Liebe Seele" and "Komm, Gott, Schöpfer, Heiliger Geist"—which Dr. Koussevitzky really did introduce to Boston in 1927.

In the second half of the program Dr. Koussevitzky made a genuflection toward his adoptive country by publishing César Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Éolides," and the Second Suite of excerpts from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloé."

So far as the Franck item was concerned, the tribute was not perhaps quite so warm as the conductor intended—through no fault of his. He and the orchestra did all they could for this music, whose day, however, seems to be definitely past. The Ravel Suite was a different matter. The performance matched the score for brilliance.

The conductor was warmly welcomed by the Friday audience, and the applause after the Brahms and the Ravel compositions was sufficiently prolonged to justify his calling the men to their feet. An auspicious beginning of the season

---

Symphony and Kreisler Usher in Music Season

Adv Oct 11

By Morris Hastings

THE music season is on. It was ushered in last Friday by the first Boston Symphony concert. Fritz Kreisler, as is his custom, opens the recital season this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Kreisler begins his concert with two Bach compositions, first the E-minor Suite, and then, a Sarabande and Gigue for violin alone.

There are but few violinists who care to attempt in public concert a Bach work for unaccompanied violin. But Kreisler, with his mastery over technique so great that one forgets that what he is doing is difficult, brings to this music a luminous understanding and profound musicianship.

Bach emerges from this great violinist's hands and imagination as a figure of almost romantic charm, an abidingly friendly and compassionate spirit.

In the last two seasons there has been an absence of "gumdrops" from Kreisler's printed programs. Today, in addition to the Bach, he is scheduled to play Mozart's lovely G-major Concerto, Ravel's brilliant "Habanera," an ancient minuet by Porpora and a Rimsky Korsakoff "Fantasy"—all of which are musical treats.

The place of honor on next Friday's and Saturday's Symphony program is given to Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony. This composer, once a conductor of the New York Philharmonic, has been for the most part neglected in this country. An unbridled and rather diffuse romanticism led him to compose music on such a large scale that its performance has been judged unfeasible.

The Ninth Symphony, however, Groves reassures us, is a serene and fine work, one of his most important.

However one may feel about Mahler as a composer, it appears that there were no two ways of considering him as a conductor. Brahms heard Mahler conduct a performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" in Budapest and pronounced him "a devil of a fellow."

Mahler's musical talents displayed themselves early in his life. He was peculiarly sensative, it is said, to the folktunes of his native Bohemia, and he played everything that he heard, particularly brass band marches, when he was only four years old, on his accordion.

As companions to the symphony on this week's program, Dr. Koussevitzky will present Wagner's marvelous "Siegfried Idyll" and the stirring overture play.

Rec Oct 10

Big Ovation for Dr. Koussevitzky

Dr. Koussevitzky was given a tremendously friendly welcome back to the Hub when he stepped out on Symphony Hall stage to conduct the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra's 51st season. No conductor in the history of the orchestra has won popularity so rapidly and kept it so firmly. Under his leadership the orchestra has fully recovered the dazzling heights it reached during the Muck regime. The Russian leader himself has at the same time gained power and asurance.

The hall was crowded, as usual, at this first matinee and there was the warm enthusiasm nearly always to be found at Boston Symphony concerts. Brahms' fourth symphony, Cesar Franck's tone poem, "Les Eolides," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite and the modern arrangement of two of Bach's choral preludes were the numbers shrewdly chosen and spiritedly performed.

Mahler's ninth symphony will be an outstanding novelty at next week's concerts. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and "Tannhaeuser" overture are also to be played.

SYMPHONY OPENS 51ST MUSIC YEAR

New Policy in Making Lists Decidedly Conservative

Post — Oct 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The keynote of a symphony season that promises to be relatively classical and conservative rather than modernistic and experimental was sounded at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began his eighth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A NEW RESTRAINT

There was a hint of this new restraint even in the conductor's attitude toward the applauding orchestra and audience that simultaneously rose in greeting as he came upon the platform. For a moment only he graciously accepted these plaudits, then with a double wave of the hand he made both companies be seated and turned directly to the task before him.

More specifically did the pieces of the afternoon bespeak the new policy in programme-making. On this list was no name more strange than that of Maurice Ravel who in his 57th year finds his music firmly fixed in the repertoire, while before it came three names already hallowed Bach, Brahms and Franck.

Bach in Modern Orchestra

From Bach the chosen pieces were the two chorale-preludes, "Schmuecke Dich, O Liebe Seele" and "Komm, Gott, Schoepfer, Heiliger Geist" as orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg, originally made known to us some four seasons ago. The first of the two is Bach at his raptest. The second is at once a more concise and a more externalized music, and Schoenberg has seen fit to lend it the sonorities of the full modern orchestra. His treatment of the companion piece is, however, more discreet, and only those who have an organist's conscience toward this music will question the fittingness of the programme's opening.

Surely the performance of the "Schmuecke Dich" was duly reverent, and the second prelude made a brave sound.

Brahms' Fourth

Brahms was the symphonist of the day and the conductor's choice fixed upon the ripest and mellowest, the most Brahmsian of them all, the autumnal Fourth, unplayed in Symphony Hall since the Brahms Festival of two springs ago. That previous performance was memorably eloquent; that of yesterday was no less so. Some will have this symphony bardic, vigorous, even a bit strident of voice. Some have read into it crabbedness and pessimism and a dread of the unknown. Dr. Koussevitzky quite evidently finds it warm, human and tender, as though it were a tonal endorsement of Browning's "The last of life for which the first was made" and the listener shares that faith with him.

Franck, a master, did not always write masterpieces. "Les Eolides," played yesterday for the first time in many seasons, is not of the enduring stuff, say, of the symphony, the string quartet and the organ chorales. It is graceful; it is also tenuous and a little cloying. Even the caressing hand which Dr. Koussevitzky laid upon it yesterday could not redeem it from occasional dullness.

Orchestra of Dazzling Color

We are too near to Ravel to say with certainty what of his music is enduring. There have been times when the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," with which yesterday's concert ended, has seemed ill to withstand Dr. Koussevitzky's fondness for it. Yesterday the suite was renewed through a performance that transcended all that conductor and orchestra have hitherto accomplished with it, a performance of astounding virtuosity, dazzling color and superb rhythmic strength.

For Dr. Koussevitzky and his men there is no resting on past achievements, however notable. Yesterday found them soaring to new heights.

The Conductor, The Orchestra And a Program

The Symphony Concerts Begin A Second Half-Century Auspiciously

TRANS — OCT 10

THE DAUGHTERS of light who, interspersed by a few of its sons, have filled Symphony Hall these many years on Friday afternoons in season," take all things for granted. esterday, at the first concert of the fty-first series, they seemed as numerous as ever and no less confirmed in heir ways. At the appointed moment r. Koussevitzky re-entered to begin an ighth year as conductor. Orchestra and udience rose to greet him—the latter vith a unanimity in this conventional "homage" that it does not always display. The exception noted, all things proceeded in what the venerable editor of the program-book would call "an accustomed manner." The welcoming applause was warm but brief. With a deprecating gesture the conductor quickly subdued it; so passed, with an impatient glance at the usual late-comers, to the music of the day. None of it provoked any fervors of applause. Not once was the orchestra called to its feet. At the end a waiting door was more to be desired than a waiting conductor. . . .

All of which record signifies nothing beyond the lines of type that here contain it. The public of Friday afternoon still holds conductor and orchestra in lively interest and warm regard. It has not waxed indifferent to Bach, Brahms or Ravel. But why worry—or rather why "manifest"—over the regular thing in the regular way? Let the more ardent audience of Saturday evening do the job —and better. There are so many other things—personal things—to think about on the first Friday afternoon. . . .

The program also bore witness to the occasion. It contained no novel number, unless Franck's revived tone-poem, "The Daughter of Æolus," unheard at Symphony Hall through nine years, be counted such. An homage to Bach—in transcriptions of two horal Preludes via Schönberg—becomingly began a concert, a series and a second half-century. The presence of Brahms's Symphony in E minor affirmed that he may now stand unquestioned in the place once reserved for Beethoven. The Second Suite from the ballet of "Daphnis and Chloë," bore renewed witness to the virtuosity of composer, conductor and orchestra. Two numbers speaking German; two more speaking French. The Bach of pious ecstasies weaving a masterful counterpoint; the Brahms who could release grave imagining in austere splendor; Ravel working on his largest scale to coruscating outcome; Franck, for most, the light pleasure of the day. The all-father of music; Brahms at his place "in the great line"; a high-ranked modern; the Franck whom audiences now hear gladly. Three dead and, to count in Schönberg, two living composers. Once again there is no more to be said.

In turn conductor and orchestra renewed familiar, rather than disclosed unexpected, qualities. As the one willed, so the other accomplished until this reciprocation seemed not only instantaneous, but intuitional. The sensibility, flexibility, balance and range of the orchestra are undiminished. Its performance of Ravel's virtuoso-suite, to the last exaction and with the utmost freedom, was the proof. There are few secrets of tone that it has not learned and put to practice—yesterday from the dusky Brahms to the shimmering Franck. Composer and conductor set sparks to it; from man to man passes as well the kindling fire—and the raptures of Bach, contemplative or joyous, sing through Schönberg's new-found vesture.

A week hence, when the string choir has mastered the closing movement—for it alone—of Mahler's Ninth Symphony, will be time to sing its praises. Yesterday it outdid itself in the full-voiced, firm-set plucking of the instruments through the first division of Brahms's Symphony —a veritable pizzicato drammatico. How light, bright and soft-voiced were the woodwinds in Franck's zephyrs from the alabaster maids! Yet they also sang clear, full and deep in the slow movement of Brahms. The brass choir has gained discrimination — mellowed voice for Brahms, high voice and piercing for Ravel.

Throughout the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky was many-sided conductor. As virtuoso he led orchestra and audience through the Suite from Ravel's ballet, He missed no jewelling in the orchestral or the harmonic color; was equally alert to the pictorial Ravel who finds a new evocation for the stir of dawn and the wakening of life; the classic Ravel who carves in tonal relief the loves of Pan and Syrinx; the theater-Ravel who whirls through the final dance, rhythm crossing rhythm. And with what impact upon ear and imagination the conductor drove the whole forward! . . . Recall again the sensitive hand and ear, the cool, adjusting mind, with which he kept Frank's wisps of tone, meeting, parting, floating above, winding below, the phrase that is center. . . . He failed not a whit at the triple task of Bach's luminous counterpoint, Bach's meditative or aspiring moods, Schönberg's organ-like voices in the orchestral version of the Choral Preludes.

Last and best the Koussevitzky who feels Brahms no less, and probably more, than he thinks him; so sets the first movement of this Fourth Symphony rising sheer before us, sequence upon sequence, in mass and motion, fervent with beauty, strong with power; draws close the brooding pathos of the grayed slow movement; sends across it, as in the lyrical measures, gleams of light; evokes the robust heartening of the scherzo; attains the full-voiced splendor of the finale —a miracle of mastered technique achieving an equal miracle of embodied and exalted emotion. When these are the ends, there is not to question means or method.

The music of the day, as such, may be left with little further comment. It is the working of human nature that at the first concert of a new year, orchestra, conductor and audience should more invite reviewer and reader. . . . There is always beginning, and usually no ending, of the debate over Bach transcribed from organ to orchestra. We cry in these days for more symphonic Bach. The orchestral suites and concertos are soon exhausted. If we would have more, we must gain it by transcription. The organ-pieces are a closed book to most frequenters of symphony concerts. When they hear them there, they rejoice in the book opened, with little or no thought of the arranging hand between. That hand, moreover, as in this instance of Schönberg's, may be remarkably sensitive, subtle, sympathetic. The orchestral setting of the first Choral Prelude—"Schmücke dich"—follows form; reproduces substance; regains mood; is curiously organ-like in the distribution of the parts. The transcript of the second, "Komm, Gott, Schöpfer," simpler and homelier, is as fortunate in escape from distortion and elaboration.

Franck's tone-poem of the wind-god's virgin daughters gave obvious pleasure to most within sound of it; added one more item to the scanty list of his orchestral pieces. The dissident minority may withdraw into their cave to waggle heads and tongues. There they will be saying to each other that the maturer and more diversified "Psyche" were better worth revival; that in spite of surface graces, "The Daughters of Æolus" is prettyfied and monotonous; that symphonic poems, unless they are rare masterpieces, have become old nineteenth-century hat to the twentieth, whether or not the twenty-first vitalizes the form again. Hush, hush! upon these disturbers of peace in the concert-room. . . .

Within memory the Symphony in E minor passed for least of the four Symphonies of Brahms. Now a more enlightened generation sets it beside or on par with the first. The music in itself and in just performance gives reason. The grave beauty that pervades it, the somber power that begins it, the mounting splendor that ends it, the compassionate, the songful, the resolute measures between—darksome or lightening—what are these but the attributes of a masterpiece? Or where else, in the four symphonies, has Brahms's speech ran so clear, full and unmistakably his own?

H.T.P.

SYMPHONY IN OPENING CONCERT

Koussevitsky Is Welcomed By Enthusiastic Audience

Tran Oct 10

The first concert audience of the new season thronged Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 51st year. There was of course a cordial welcome for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has returned from his summer in Europe with portfolios bulging with new music material for the forthcoming winter. The personnel of the orchestra remains the same to a man, and Boston may have every assurance of another series of brilliant programs.

Yesterday's concert drew its material from Bach, Brahms, Franck and Ravel, a diversified selection. Perhaps the most enthusiastic plaudits were reserved for the forceful and dramatic Fourth Symphony of Brahms, brought to a performance of transcendent loveliness. The unclouded beauty of the entire work, from the sombre severity of the first movement to the genial radiance of the jovial Allegro, were given a superb and sympathetic reading.

Two Choral Preludes of Bach, in the Schonberg arrangement, the one of subdued richness, the second stunning in its vigorous brasses with Luther's Whitsuntide Hymn providing the melody, opened the afternoon's program. After the intermision came the exquisite and delicately spun "Les Eolides," by Cesar Franck, with Ravel's Second Suite from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" to close the program. The opulence and brilliant rhythms of the Ballet, the sweeping chromatic crescendoes, brought the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

Next week's concert holds a new Mahler Symphony for its first performance and Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and Overture to "Tannhauser."

J. D.

MUSIC

Globe Oct 10

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert yesterday afternoon brought Dr Koussevitzky and the players the customary warm welcome from the Friday subscribers. Orchestra and audience stood to greet the conductor at his first appearance. At every break in the program there was cordial applause. The hall was completely filled. Every season ticket for both the Friday and Saturday series has been sold. Symphony concerts are obviously not one of the things people who economize find they can do without.

There are no notable changes in the membership of the orchestra this season. Dr Koussevitzky, having in recent seasons remade it to his taste, wisely remains satisfied with his handiwork. The best orchestral performances are possible only when conductor and players have grown accustomed to working together.

This concert marks the beginning of the second half-century of the Boston Symphony. Yesterday's concert, played by an orchestra very lately assembled after a long vacation, would suffice to show that the Boston Symphony is unsurpassed by any of its rivals either in America or Europe.

There are, indeed, qualified judges outside of Boston who say, as M Prunieres of the Paris "Revue Musicale" said last season, that the Boston Symphony is the best orchestra in the world.

Its position is a proud one, difficult to maintain. Only the untiring zeal of the conductor, the unflagging support of the trustees and guarantors, and the eagerness of the public to buy season tickets have made its present renewed eminence possible. Should any one of these elements in the orchestra's success diminsh, it would surely be outstripped by rival organizations. Its very continuance, indeed, depends on the support of the public.

An annual deficit of many thousands of dollars must be made up by donations.

Yesterday's program, as is usual at the opening of the season, contained no new music. Two organ chorales of Bach, arranged by Schoenberg, Brahms' E minor Symphony, Cesar Franck's tone poem "Les Eolides," and the second suite of excerpts from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" were the chosen numbers. One hopes that newspaper reports that Dr Koussevitzky means to give little new and modernistic music this season are erroneous. He has in the past done this city a great service by his insistence on performing the music of our own day as well as the classics.

The immediate reaction of the audience to new and strange music does not matter. Brahms and Franck, whose music was so warmly received yesterday, in the 1890s used to send horrified subscribers rushing from the old music hall with fingers stuffed hastily in their ears—if tales of the elder generation may be believed. Even a younger listener well remembers when Ravel's music was anathema to all but a few bold spirits. Now it is universally acclaimed. But had the conductors of the Boston Symphony bowed to public taste, we should still be listening to Grieg, Raff, and Rubinstein at these concerts, instead of Brahms, Franck, and Ravel.

It would be unkind to stress the defects in yesterday's performance, in so far as these were due to inadequate rehearsal. The Franck and Ravel, and some of the Brahms went very well. The qualities and defects of Dr Koussevitzky's conducting were shown very clearly if one noted in turn his interpretation of the Bach chorales and of the passacaglia finale of the Brahms. Each needs no interpretive dramatising. His music is eloquent in its nobility and its seeming simplicity. Any touch of the theatrical, and its power vanishes.

The performers should appear devoutly to praise God, not to display their talent. But Brahms' music, left to itself, is dry, overscholarly, lacking in vitality. Dr Koussevitzky vitalised Brahms splendidly, but his Bach was interpretively a failure, conceived in quite the wrong spirit.

Next week's program includes Mahler's Ninth Symphony, and the "Siegfried Idyll" and "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner. P. R.

Boston Symphony Begins New Year in Mid-Season Form

Amer. Oct 10

By MOSES SMITH

The musical season began, nominally as well as in fact, with the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian eminence now in his eighth season as conductor of a great orchestra, was cordially greeted by an audience which—depression or not—apparently took every seat.

Moses Smith

The most significant aspect of the concert was that the performance, in its virtues and in its faults, was typical of mid-season. It was not apparent to these unsharpened ears that the orchestra had appreciably changed from its playing form of last May. It was as if the men had continued to play together all summer under the same leader. As a matter of actuality, the personnel of the orchestra has undergone no change; there is no new face, nor have any of the old ones disappeared. Here again were about 100 men playing substantially as one, and that one in the image of Mr. Koussevitzky. Here were the glow and color which we associate with the Boston orchestra; the sonority and brilliance (occasionally excessive); the capacity for wondrous expressiveness and the tendency of the conductor to overdo this expressiveness.

The program opened with two Choral Preludes of Bach, orchestrated by Arnold Shonberg, and traversed Brahms' Fourth Symphony, the occasionally played "Eolides" of Cesar Franck, and the Second Suite of orchestral fragments drawn from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Needless to say the performance of the Ravel music was brilliant and kaleidoscopic, for it is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's outstanding tours de force. The woodwind section of the orchestra was here a source of pride for any conductor. The symphonic poem of Franck passed off pleasingly and charmingly, but offered the listener little of importance that Franck did not say with much greater effectiveness in the later Symphony, or in the Sonata for violin and piano, or the Piano Quintette in F minor.

We were disappointed in the performance of the Brahms Symphony, for despite the alternately sensitive and stirringly dramatic touches of the interpreter, the work almost fell to pieces from abrupt changes of tempi. This was exasperatingly true in the slow movement. In fact, only the extraordinary genius of the composer saved the continuity of the movements and the unity of the symphony as a whole.

The temper of the audience was, as we have said, cordial. It applauded the performance of the symphony with sufficient insistence to cause the conductor to bring his men to their feet.

MUSIC

Oct 10 Her

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was the first of the orchestra's 51st season. Dr. Koussevitzky was welcomed warmly. He had arranged this program: Bach, two chorales, "Schmuecke Dich, O Liebe Seele" and "Komm Gott Schoepfer" orchestrated by Schoenberg; Brahms, Symphony No. 4, E minor; Cesar Franck, Les Eolides; Ravel, suite No. 2 from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

An excellent concert, auspicious for the season which it began; an interesting, well-balanced program—the music by Franck and Ravel in strong contrast to Schoenberg's experiment in giving "color" to Bach, and the prevailing austerity of the symphony.

Cesar Franck's "Eolides" had not been heard for so long a time at these concerts that to the younger members of the audience it was unfamiliar. It was in Leconte de Lisle's poem of the same name that Franck found inspiration. So the story goes, but the score has no allusion to the poem. Franck had little or no literary taste, as is shown by the texts he accepted for his two operas, "The Beatitudes" and the majority of his songs. Some one must have called h' attention to Leconte de Lisle. It was a curious union: The poet, a magnificent pagan in belief and in expression; the composer, a man of child-like faith, naively spiritual, with a streak of mysticism, one who could not treat in music the story of Psyche without Christianizing it, as worthy fathers and commentators found in the erotic Song of Songs which is Solomon's, the love of Christ for his church. The "Eolides" is early Franck. There are charming effects of color, there is suavity with now and then the amiable zephyrs blowing as they would blow their last. Evidently the poets lines about their singing the hymns of Venus, "divine joys of the senses," did not appeal to "Pere" Franck; "repose and love, grace and harmony" were more to his taste. As in some other works by Franck, there is undue repetition.

Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" has been played here many times. It serves an opportunity for the orchestra to display its astonishing virtuosity. The first suite is not so well known. If there is to be a "Ravel program" later in the season it might be well to put the two suites together and then lay them on the shelf for a season or two. Beautiful music—but there are so many compositions that call for a hearing.

Koussevitzky gave a poetically impressive performance of the symphony, not dwelling too sentimentally on the lyric episodes that grow and bloom on the granitic structures, as the roses on the rocks of Marblehead. The granite was there, the firm foundation for the sombre thought. One seldom hears so eloquent an interpretation of the Finale, so diversified in moods; at the same time the realization of the inevitable continuity that was in the composer's mind. The audience was justly enthusiastic throughout the concert.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Mahler's Symphony No. 9, first time in the United States; Wagner's Siegfried Idyl and the overture to "Tannaehauser."

20

Oct 16-17

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians

The Occasion, The Composer, The Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky Again Finds Room for the Music Of Mahler

Oct. 15 Trans.

FOR the second time Dr. Koussevitzky turns for one of his novelties to a composer dead now a score of years and finds among his works one that has not yet been heard in Boston, or so far as local records give information, in all America—to Gustav Mahler. To "The Song of the Earth" which the conductor has twice performed, he now adds the companion-piece, the Ninth Symphony. For this Ninth Symphony is the symphonic counterpart to the six songs of the earlier work.

Unto this Last

Commentators divide Mahler's symphonic work into four periods. The four earliest symphonies comprise the first period; numbers 5, 6, 7, the second; the eighth stands by itself; "The Song of the Earth" the ninth, and the incomplete sketch of the Tenth form the fourth and last period. Mahler's biographer, Paul Stefan, writes, " 'The Song of the Earth' would have been the Ninth Symphony. But Mahler held back from a 'Ninth,' which seemed to lead the musical world to new expectations and at the same time to be fatal to the composer. Since the great 'Ninths,' no composer had yet completed a Tenth. That is why the 'Chinese Songs' do not bear this title. The next work was, in spite of all, called so, and, curiously enough, Mahler has not finished his Tenth either."

Each of the four groups has emotional source in certain of Mahler's songs. The symphonies of the first group are based on songs that are related in degree to folk-style—the cycles "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" and "Des Knaben Wunderhorn." The next three symphonies correspond again in degree to Mahler's "Kindertotenlieder." The eighth combines the old Latin hymn "Veni creator spiritus" with the final scenes from the Second Part of Gœthe's "Faust." The ninth is fulfillment, in an expanded medium, of sentiments first expressed in the six Chinese poem's of "The Song of the Earth," and these last form, according to Bekker, a final "circle, the most poetical, the most 'inwardly' directed of them all." On this point the writer in Grove's Dictionary also bears witness, when he says, "The change from the blustering of the Eighth Symphony to the fine perceptions of this set of songs ('The Song of the Earth') is noteworthy. The scoring has often an almost Latin delicacy. Mahler's position as a composer will rest more certainly on these songs and on the Ninth Symphony than on all the remainder of his work."

This final "circle" of symphonies is definitely concerned with the idea of farewell. But preoccupation with death and a future life was not new to him as composer. In his second symphony he "stood face to face with Death and the last things of this life," even though he "returned to things human in the third" (Bekker). The "Kindertotenlieder" and their relation to the fifth, sixth and seventh symphonies continues the thread. It is not surprising, then, that this last group should treat such a theme in increasing scale. Stefan finds excellent reason: "Mahler's grief at the death of his eldest daughter (1907); the knowledge of his heart-disease; a new and overpowering revelation of nature; these are the springs from which (1908) 'The Song of the Earth' [and a year later the Ninth Symphony] sprang."

Backgrounds

During his lifetime Mahler was esteemed chiefly for the authority, the sense of conviction, that came from his conducting. He began his conductorship of the badly disorganized Budapest Opera by saying, "I will do everything with enthusiasm." Enthusiasm, intensity, an insistence on the utmost clarity, a magnetic power which gave the feeling that he was more creator than interpreter of the music in hand—these were the earmarks of his conducting. For sheer genius of insight he has often been compared with none other than Wagner himself. Says Decsey: "It was not possible to remain a single hour beside him without witnessing something being hurled out from his innermost nature, without definitely receiving something from him."

As to his worth as a composer there is less unanimity of opinion. Judgments range from those of Paul Rosenfeld, who finds in him "only the intention, rarely the achievement," and counts "the living stuff" as "lost in the great unfilled voids of the canvasses" of his symphonies, to those of Cecil Gray (supported by such Germans as Stefan, Bekker and Weissmann), who calls the symphonies "the last supremely great works of this class given to the world." Possibly the quality of the performance has much to do with the judgment of them. Mr. Gray underscores heavily his premise that the greatness of the symphonies can only be perceived if the performance is sufficiently sympathetic and understanding. They would not be the first works to wait long upon performance for full release.

Ways and Means

In orchestration and in form particularly, Mahler made tremendous forward strides. His orchestra does not indulge in the riot of color characterizing the German school at the end of the last century. Melodic contours matter more to him than orchestral colors. For him the orchestra is a single, sounding unit, a cosmos alive with a host of embryonic or evolutional possibilities; always a far more closely welded unity than a mere sum of various coloristic parts. But in this cosmos the various sonorous elements often assume huge proportions. Voices in massed choral bodies are often an integral part. The various choirs of the orchestra are frequently expanded when need arises. New brass instruments occasionally find a natural place. The percussion section is in many cases hugely enlarged. Strings are sometimes required to make strange tunings in order to secure unusual effects.

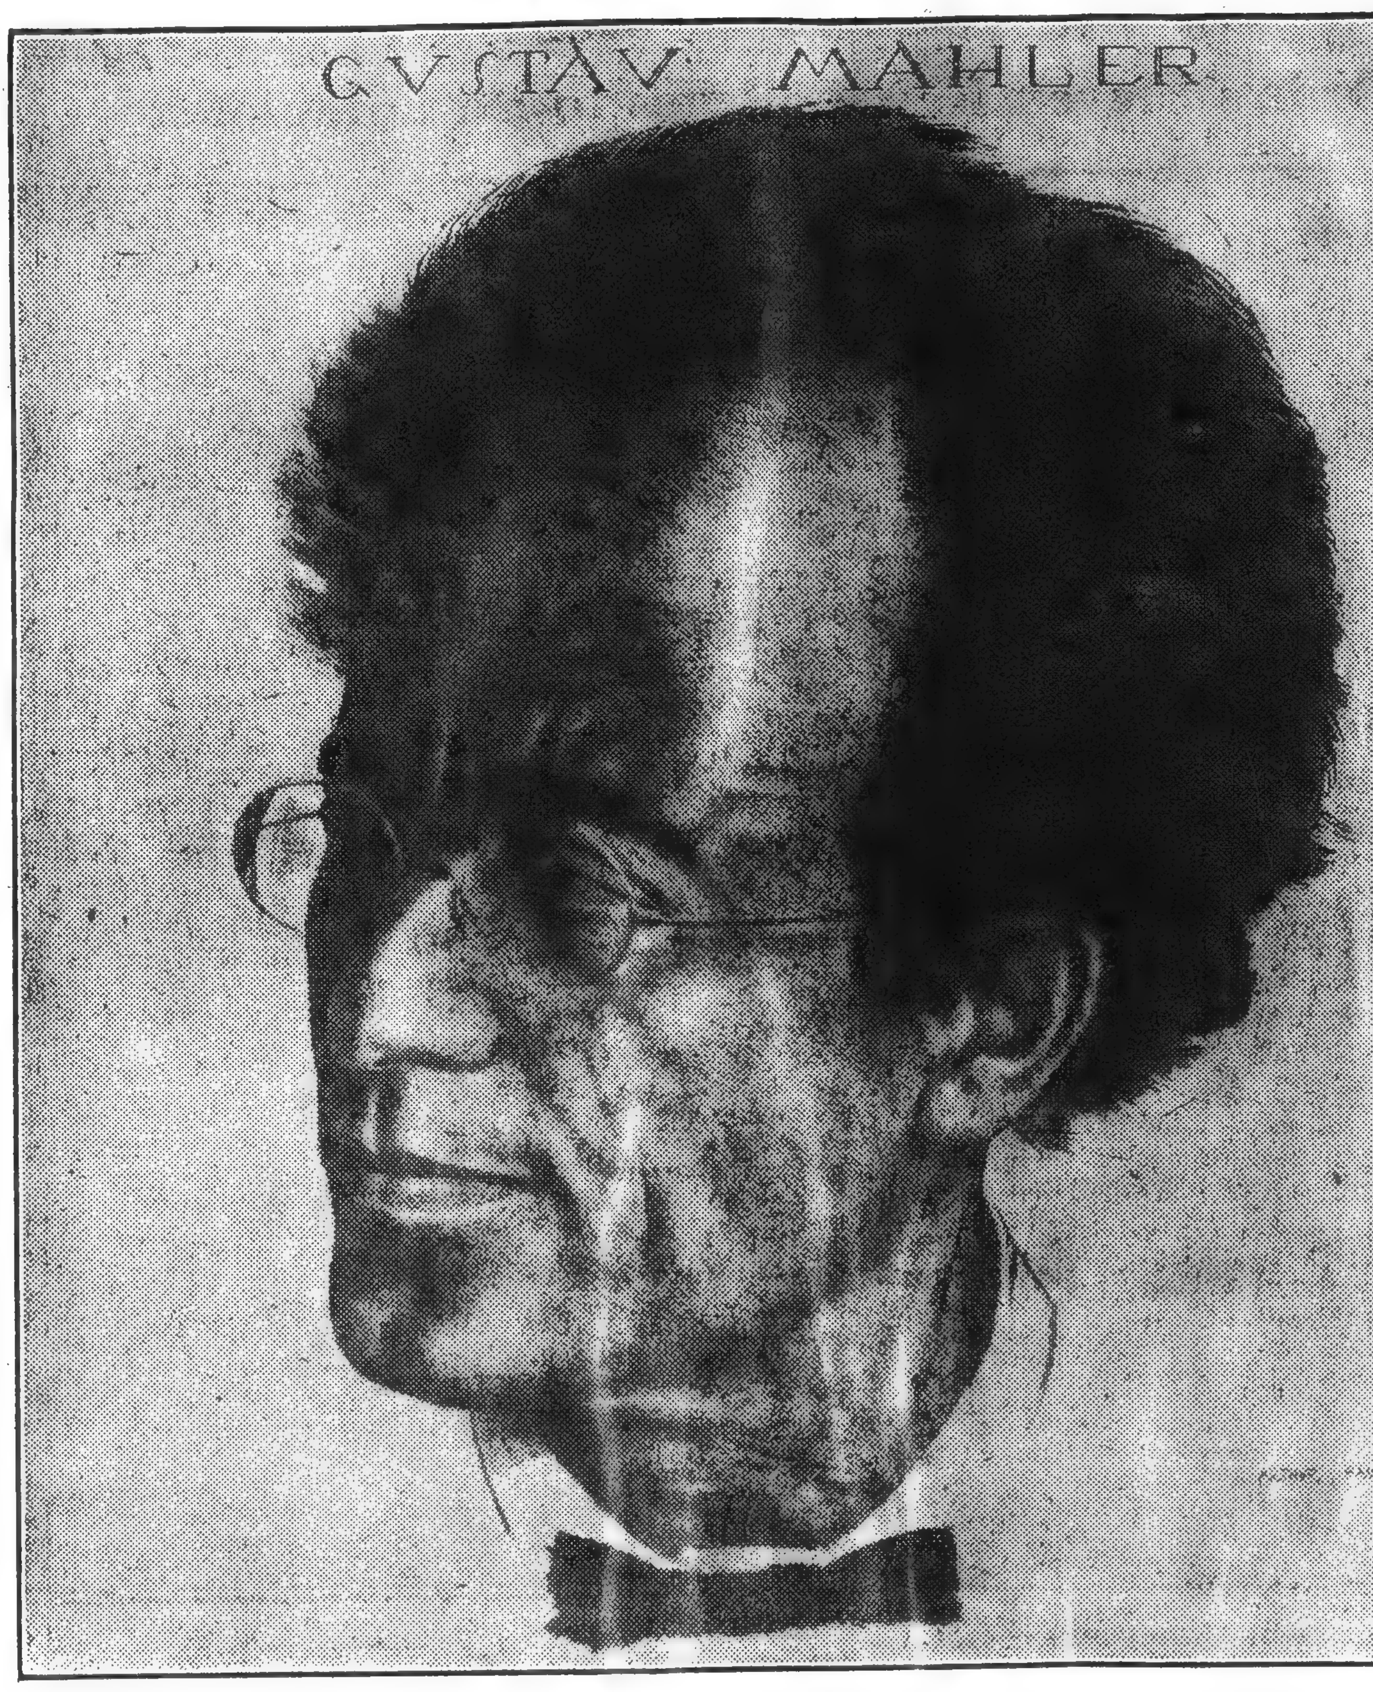
But seldom is an instrument used merely for "filling-in." It must always have something vital to say. If there is nothing vital for it to speak, it remains mute. Mahler, who can write a symphony for a thousand performers, is never afraid of an economy of instruments which in many of his contemporaries would have produced an effect of pathetic thinness. Nor does he shrink from sparse groups in widely separated spacings. He never miscalculates. No matter how great his economies, no matter how distant his spacings, his scores always "sound." For Mahler knows his instruments. The vital things he gives them to say spring out of the penetrated characters of the instruments themselves as much as from the fulness of his own musical heart.

In form his admirers hail him as the ultimate "perfecter," the ultimate solver of all problems connected with the structure of the symphony. His symphonies are all "finale-symphonies." That is to say, in them the final movement is in some way the key to the whole. Thus an effect of anti-climax becomes impossible. This type of symphony may rise, movement by movement, to the finale as climax of the whole. Or, the finale may be a central point toward which all the earlier sections converge from as many directions as there are movements. In this second type there are generally more than the conventional four movements. Or, thirdly, the finale may furnish a key or an answer to a sort of enigma proposed in the earlier movements. The key thought of the symphony in this case is contained in the finale, toward which all leads, as a novel or a play leads through its various courses to final solution or dénouement. It is to this third class that the Ninth and also the Fourth Symphony belong. In the Ninth, especially, the last movement, a heavenly Adagio, is a transfiguration that sheds light on all that has gone before.

These Final Pages

On Jan. 1, 1908, Mahler conducted for the first time at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. He continued through the remainder of the season. In the summer of 1908 he wrote "The Song of the Earth." The following winter he was again at his post at the Metropoltan. In the summer of 1909 the Ninth Symphony appeared. No other two of Mahler's works were composed with so brief an interval. During the seasons of 1909-10 and 1910-11 he was conductor both at the Metropolitan and of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The season of 1910-11 he did not complete, but was forced to leave early for his home on account of bad health. He died on May 18, 1911, at Vienna, aged fifty-one. "The Song of the Earth" and the Ninth Symphony never came to performance during his lifetme. Both had premiéres under Bruno Walter, a former assistant, the first in November, 1911, at Munich, the latter in June, 1912, at Vienna.

"In His Habit as He Lived"



The Composer-Conductor as New York and Vienna Knew Him

It has been said that the music of "The Song of the Earth" and of the Ninth Symphony is music such as an old man might be expected to write—in spite of the fact that Mahler was only at the end of his forties when he composed both. But death was soon to come; and this music is full of the feeling that life is complete. Thus in "The Song of the Earth," he set "The Drinking Song of Earthly Woes," "One Lonesome in Autumn," "Of Youth," "Of Beauty," "One Drunken in Spring," "Farewell." Now in the Ninth Symphony he writes an opening Andante of peace and of passion in which death itself finds place; a Scherzo which looks back at life with irony and as a mockery and fantastic orgy; a third movement which continues the derision of this world in a "Rondo-Burlesque" that mounts to a tremendous climax; that is in many respects a larger counterpart of the "Drinking Song of Earthly Woes" from "The Song of the Earth," but that contains also a melody of transfiguring prophetic vision. This "Rondo-Burlesque" finally exhausts itself in its own fury. (Many a composer has deemed a similar content sufficient for a whole symphony.) A final Adagio ensues trying to pierce the veil, singing into the heart the message that (in Bekker's phrase) "Death is Godly Love."

More Particularly

The orchestra of the Ninth Symphony is modest—for Mahler. Woodwinds in threes, except that there are four flutes; four horns, three trumpets and the usual trombone-tuba quartet; the quintet of strings; for percussion only two kettledrums, triangle, glockenspiel. None of the four movements is in the traditional sonata-form. In all the preceding eight symphonies, whatever his structural experiments, Mahler had never abandoned this form. The first movement of the Ninth presents the duality of themes which lies at the basis of sonata-form. But, the two themes presented, he places them in opposition to each other and works them with improvisatory freedom. The first theme occurs in the sixth measure, D major; calm resignation, a dreamlike peace or hope. The opposing theme is heard about twenty measures later, D minor intense with passion, which comes to its highest point in sharp chords for trumpets.

Mahler soon reminds us of the significance of this symphony, when he introduces reminiscences of the "Death-Dance" scherzo of his Fourth Symphony. The original title of this scherzo was "Freund Hein spielt auf" and we are told that "Freund Hein" is not an "evil, terrifying god, but a friendly leader, fiddling his flock into the hereafter". No reference could be more suggestive of the mood of this first movement, indeed of the whole symphony. After much conflict in which the two opposing themes seem at times to devour each other Mahler introduces a solemn, march-like music over which he writes the direction, "Wie ein schwerer Kondukt." These words take on especial meaning when one recalls that "Kondukt" is the Austrian circumlocution for funeral procession. After more interplay of the two principal themes the movement ends on a new note, more quiet, more peaceful even than that of the principal theme, a note somehow prophetic of the final Adagio.

Introducing the Scherzo, Bekker writes, "As friend and redeeme, as gently lulling comforter, Death came in the first movement. As demon he rules over the two middle movements, Scherzo and Rondo. Not now as in the Fourth Symphony, in the mediævally mummified form of 'Freund Hein' with his Death's-fiddle. This time he exercises the powers of darkness, bids them dance to his tune. The dance-pictures of earlier works return, . . . clothed in a gruesome irony." After such illuminating remark, detailed analysis of the themes is superfluous. Suffice it to say that the principal theme is gawky and awkward, that the secondary themes cover a wide range of effect. The introduction of a motif from the first theme of the first movement in one of the waltzes must not be overlooked.

To ~~the End~~

Well does Mahler name his rondo a "Burlesque." Having found the pleasures of past life a mockery, he turns to more serious things to find them no better. The mood of irony continues, then rises as dance-music gives way to tones of more weighty character. Bekker may resume his description: "The artist mocks himself in a mockery which gives voice to the feelings of all those whose home is not in this world and its errors, who yearn for other shores. A movement of burning scorn . . . which nevertheless has roots in deep tragedy." Near the middle of the movement a chorale is token of the seriousness of the artist amid all these sarcasms. Toward the end, before the final self-consuming play of the initial mocking theme, comes a melody gently expressive, yet more prophetic of the final Adagio than the close of the first movement. X X ~~Once more~~ Bekker ~~may speak~~ writes: "Was this life? Senseless confusion, with painful premonitions of a higher world forced down into the fury of aimless struggle?" Two measures of reminiscent agony introduce the movement. Then that wondrous Adagio which is solemn revelation of worlds to come. One need not write more. One dare not analyze where such a spell is wrought. But those who from two Koussevitzkian performances remember the infinities released in the final moments of "The Song of the Earth" have a foretaste of what will come to pass when these ineffable concluding measures sing their transfiguring song.

A. H. M.

Symphony

Mahler Makes Impression as Never Before

Oct. 17 Trans

In Masterly Performance His Ninth Symphony Seems New Revelation

FIRST, to clear the ground. . . . The performance of Mahler's Ninth Symphony filled sixty minutes, and a few more, at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. Save in the third movement—the "Burlesque Rondo"—Dr. Koussevitzky made no noticeable cuts. Perhaps it would have been fairer to play the music note for note, in justice to a composer who took thought before he set one to paper; with the tacit consent of an audience that, having listened through sixty minutes, would hardly have rebelled at seventy or eighty. Perhaps, again, Mahler's ironies and mockeries are repetitious and ran sufficiently charactered through the version of Friday. On these points informed opinion may reasonably stand divided.

No one, accustomed to the performance of music in concert-halls, might doubt the tense absorption of the audience in this Ninth Symphony, even through a first movement twenty-five minutes long. As its listening was eloquent, so also was its final applause. Both testified to engrossed minds and stirred hearts; while the pause of silence, momentary though it was, between the sounding of the last note and the outpouring of the first plaudits, was as return from the vision by which most had been holden. Like the cities of Central Europe, Boston hears Mahler illuded and possessed.

Throughout the performance, the orchestra, subjected to six rehearsals, did prodigies of skill and sensibility. Mahler writes for a string choir that he believes capable of all things—long holding of high notes in difficult positions; insistent trilling without loss of line or rhythm. He inflects a fragile melody for woodwinds as though they were human voices; gives them no cover except string tone in thin texture. From his brass he asks often a sonorous vigor akin to that of no other composer. The orchestra answered yesterday to these exactions. Mahler does not stop there. As conductor of exhaustless pains and lifelong experience, he knows every instrument individually; throughout this Ninth Symphony puts that individuality to the test. Scoring, he spaces so widely, weaves so thinly, that often when he asks most of an instrument it is naked to every ear.

The Mahlerian orchestra must not only play the notes. It must play them also alert to the mood or the emotion in which the composer set them on the staves. It must not only "sing its heart out." It must also maintain a melodic line, incessantly and often subtly inflected. Furthermore: it must not only achieve a highly sensitive color. It must even vary that color within a single measure—and not let rhythm go hang. By many a sign Mahler would have written, preferentially, for an orchestra of Mahlers. He came as near to it at Symphony Hall as he is likely to come in this imperfect world. And not only the sound but the substance and the spirit of Mahler's music depend upon the playing.

To Dr. Koussevitzky, the leader in this deed, more than one leaf of laurel. He brought to first performance in America a Symphony that, with "The Song of the Earth," its companion-piece, is the distillation and sublimation of the eight that went before. In summer study he absorbed the music; in the rehearsals of autumn into the orchestra infused it. He was insistent upon the technical conquests already set down. He enjoined them upon the players, made play with them himself, for the full expression of Mahler in spirit, truth and power. His sympathy, his intuition, for the composer, and for this Ninth Symphony in particular, stood clear in the performance. Mahler often writes in an ecstasy of vision, and of emotion before it. Dr. Koussevitky responds, likewise out of full heart and quickened mind. In all sincerity, Mahler, so to say, strikes noble attitudes in tones. Dr. Koussevitzky perceives, feels, translates them. Mahler often writes simple-mindedly, simple-heartedly. The conductor knows the vein and can open it. The technical astuteness and felicity of this Ninth Symphony seemed to engross him as executive musician; while the vision, the ecstasies, the red or white fires within, kindled him as interpretive tone-poet. Mahler was dead before his final symphony was played. It was believable yesterday that we were hearing as he imagined and as he wrought.

To pass now to the Ninth Symphony itself in the impressions, almost always to be corrected afterwards, of a single hearing. Unmistakeably and from end to end it is a superb technical achievement. Enough has been said to give the casual reader hint of the precision and flexibility, the imagination and intuition, the subtleties masked in simplicity, of Mahler's writing for orchestra. A hundredfold more, in the actual hearing, they penetrated the casual listener. In the final Symphony of his nine, Mahler attained to a creative zenith — the possessed spirit, and the directing mind.

As remarkable throughout are the skill, resource, fertility and expressive significance of Mahler's polyphony, which is to say the drawing of the musical lines, the weaving of the tonal web. Often the germinating motivs are brief and simple. Soon they suggest intimate self-revelation. Gradually they take on a personality of their own; become Mahler's and none other's. Then his imagination, invention and resource begin to fertilize them. What does he not do with them, more particularly in the first and the second movements! The modernists are lions for counterpoint, expert practitioners withal. Yet the youngest of them sits in admiration and amaze before "old" Mahler's polyphony. He has outdone them all, and a generation ago.

Yet again: in this Ninth Symphony Mahler has shed his faults; conquered his infirmities. Nowhere in it, as it seemed yesterday, is he grandiloquent. The "Burlesque Rondo" is often tumultuous and perversely sonorous; but nowhere does it overpass the mark of a music that recalls the rack of misguided and mis-stressed days; pours scorn hot upon them. . . . There are pages of ineffable tenderness in this last symphony, most of all in the slow movement which is finale. Elsewhere they recur; but retrospect recalls none that lapsed into sentimentality, that shallowed a willed simplicity. Throughout the idea is poised; the emotion measured. The expression partakes of both qualities.

As in "The Song of the Earth," banalities have vanished. The motivs and the fructifying melodies strike a personal note. There is individuality upon every process and handling—"the Mahlerian touch." Whatever from other composers he has assimilated in opera house or concert hall or at study table, now becomes his own. Even the Viennese glamour that hangs momentarily about the dance-measures, as in the second movement, is but the aura of the most insinuating of cities, haunting him, as it haunted Schubert, to the end.

To crown the whole: in the Ninth Symphony Mahler has attained a consummate blending of substance and surface. As his motivs expand into melodies, as they are woven into counterpoint, the idea within, the tonal color without, are inextricably one. The whole symphony, moreover, outside a few relaxed passages inevitable in so long a music, achieves singular and sustained precision. It is not only structurally clear, It is mentally and emotionally articulate—almost "the word" become tones, as Mahler liked to dream. The communicating and expressional means—contour, motion, color—are at one with the thought, the feeling, the possession. In the other Symphonies of Mahler there are veils between, obstacles along the way, the tortured pursuit of an evasive goal. In the Ninth, the mists have lifted; the impediments are removed; the striving is calmed. In the crucible of the composer's mind and spirit—in these his final days—the transmuting of his thought and emotion into musical expression is at last complete. All three become one and indivisible. Creation in the arts then touches fulfillment.

It remains to inquire into the depth and vitality of the thought that sustains the Ninth Symphony; the ardor and the poignancy of the emotion that suffuses it. The presence of Death, the sense of immanent departure from this world, the renunciation of its stresses, tortures, futilities, the aspiration toward another and veiled shore where there shall be peace and illumination, haunt and inform the music. The embodied thought develops large and profound, individual to Mahler, wider-spreading, born of his mind and imagination to enter into ours.

A friendly, at moments almost a homely, Death traverses the first movement; stretches out his hand to Mahler. In resignation the composer grasps it. Prophetic vision of the peace into which it shall lead him swims before his passioned eyes. It possesses him that it may possess us.

But not yet the world forgotten. It sways through the scherzo-like second movement before a Mahler still remembering. Shadows cross it; harsh lights pierce it. There is no peace in it; only disillusion. Distortion and destruction as well, forever and a day. In tumult Mahler lets loose the ironies and scorns of the "Burlesque Rondo." . . . The beatific vision, the aspiration that subdues every other passion, return. By his Nirvana are Mahler's eyes now holden. The burned-out void of his living is filled anew. In the final Adagio he evokes a longing, craves a peace, outstretches toward a beauty ineffable:

> "Let me go home for ever; I shall have heard Death; I shall know that I have lived too long."

By such contents the Ninth Symphony of Mahler stands justified. It pre-empted the concert. Even the "Siegfried Idyl," almost forgotten, it had been so long absent, must wait another occasion.

H. T. P.

---

1 Herald Oct 17

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mahler, Symphony No. 9, first time in the United States.) Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Mahler began to write this symphony in 1906. He died in 1911. The symphony was not performed until June, 1912. The performance was at Vienna; Bruno Walter conductor.

It has been said that Mahler's farewell to the world and his creative work was his "Lied von der Erde," composed in 1908, and performed after his death at Munich in 1911. Yet there is the ninth symphony and there are fragments of a tenth. It has also been said that, a Jew by birth, he did not have the courage to find sources of composition in the history and characteristics of his race—thus he differed from Ernest Bloch—that he was unhappy in his environment, wishing but not willing to express himself musically as a Jew. Essays have been written in the effort to explain the strange contradictions to be found in his symphonies. Perhaps these essays are strained, or only fantastic.

No doubt he had a program for this symphony in his mind, but he kept this program to himself, for he hated "arguments," mottoes, analytical or descriptive notes set before the hearer that he might dilate with the proper emotion. In all his works he shows a love of nature and pleasant life. He once said to a friend who had commented on the mountains surrounding his country house: "I have set all that to music." He was passionately fond of folk life, folk songs and dances. The second movement of this symphony is a rough, lusty, heel-thumping peasant dance. He took many of his themes from folk songs, often without acknowledgment, as he helped himself freely from themes of preceding and contemporaneous composers. (His god among musicians was Beethoven.) Mahler, a man of wide reading, shows at times a lofty spirituality; there was a streak of mysticism in his nature. He was obsessed by the thought and mystery of death. Not that he dreaded it. He might have said with Henley:

"The ways of death are soothing and serene,
And all the words of Death are grave and sweet."

Hence the calm ending of the finale of this symphony, comparable with the last section of "Das Lied von der Erde." Music that is the expression of Nirvana. This finale as a whole is eloquent, yet even here there are contrasts rather than continuity and one wishes that the closing measures, beautiful as they are, were more concise.

As a round and complete work of art, the scherzo, of all the movements, would probably best win the favor of the purist, though it is the least characteristic expression of Mahler's musical nature. He was a composer of magnificent intentions which were seldom fully realized. He often failed by not having a firm grip on his subject. Take the hymn-like opening of the first movement. The attention of the hearer is at once arrested, but only the student is much interested in contrapuntal complexities that follow. Mahler is always appallingly long-winded. It was his belief that a symphony should be long; that as audiences expect a concert to last an hour and a half or even two hours, a symphony of conventionally reasonable length loses in effectiveness when it is associated with other works. His symphonies should each be the sole music for a concert. Mahler is not only long-winded, he is diffuse; and his material, not always worthy of treatment, seems as if it were introduced at random. It should be said to his credit that he was not afraid of tunes even when they were of the simplest, most naive nature, whether they were of his invention or borrowed with Olympian indifference. There is no denying the technical skill displayed in this symphony; alas, often with barren results. Nor is his instrumentation, in some respects peculiar to himself, as is his employment of the wood-wind and the brass, rich in color, of pleasing sensuousness, or sparkling piquancy. Too often his would-be impressive effects are only the result of a powerful, dynamic impact. As the symphony is played, one lost for the time in admiration, suddenly is disappointed. There are wearying, sandy stretches. Then as suddenly comes an oasis; then again turmoil and the writhing of the muse. As was the life of Mahler, so is his music; a personal document. He revered the classics; he was only half-heartedly a modernist. A strange figure in the symphonic field; not one to be slighted, much less wholly admired; not one to be ignored; a man of great moments, but, as Rossini said of Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," of dreadful half-hours. And how often is Mahler trivial when he thought he was important.

The performance was remarkable. The enthusiastic audience recalled Dr. Koussevitzky two or three times. The Siegfried Idyl, delicately performed, another work much too long for the contents, and the overture furnished the needed balance. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Mozart, symphony in C major (K 388); Morris, concerto for piano (first time; Harold Morris of New York, pianist); Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben," tone poem, op. 40.

Globe MUSIC Oct 17

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony, performed for the first time in the United States, was the chief item on the program of yesterday's Symphony concert. It impressed one hearing it for the first time as a masterpiece deserving a permanent place in the repertory, and frequent performance. What is more significant, the audience, few of whom can have heard it before, applauded with a warmth seldom bestowed here on unfamiliar music.

Dr Koussevitzky, thrice recalled, bade the orchestra rise and share in a tribute—well deserved by performance as well as by the music itself. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and "Tannhauser" overture completed the program.

The four movements of this, Mahler's last completed symphony, are, 1, andante comodo; 2, In tempo eines Gemaechlichen Laendlers; 3, Rondo Burleske; 4, adagio. Since the score does not afford any other clew to what was in the composer's mind, the rhapsodic inventions of Teutonic commentators may be disregarded. Yet there is something more than the obvious similarity in the tempi and character of the four movements to recall Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" in Mahler's Ninth.

One hastens to add that Mahler's music is neither hysterical nor banal, and that it is written with a command of polyphony, a sense of musical form and a consummate mastery of instrumentation quite alien to Tchaikovsky. If, however, that too-celebrated Russian had had taste as well as genius, he might have written a worthy companion piece to Mahler's profoundly original and deeply emotional, yet fluent and ingratiating Ninth Symphony.

The neglect of Mahler's music in America has been due to several factors unconnected with its musical value. The New York reviewers for 20 years have vented their grudges against Mahler the conductor, on Mahler the composer. In Boston, Dr Muck introduced us to the grandiose Fifth and Second symphonies rather than to the "Song of the Earth" and Ninth, thus leaving an impression, perhaps without warrant, that Mahler's works were distinguished chiefly for length and volume. And, finally, Mahler was far ahead of his time. His harmonies, his instrumentation, his essentially polyphonic idiom all belong to the past decade, not to his lifetime.

One can only repeat that yesterday's performance, an unusually eloquent and sympathetic one, proved that Mahler is a genius to be classed with Brahms, possibly in some ways above him.

It is really unfair to perform the "Siegfried Idyll" of Wagner with full orchestra in a great hall. It is chamber music, written for an occasion. Heard at the Symphony concerts, it always sounds thin and weak. Heard as it was on Christmas 1870 from a little band of friendly players seated on the stairs outside Cosima Wagner's door, it might yet seem vital.

Dr Koussevitzky may have put the "Tannhauser" overture at the end of this concert because the other numbers were unfamiliar. But he did not play it in perfunctory routine fashion, as many another conductor would under the circumstances have done. On the contrary he exerted to the utmost his daimonic power, his "personality," and whipped up the orchestra to white heat. It may not have been Wagner, but it was manificent, and quite bowled the audience over. One has never heard even from him a more eloquent, a more dramatic, a more personal reading of anything.

Next week's program includes an early Mozart symphony, in C major; a piano concerto by Harold Morris, with that young American as solo pianist in his own work; and Strauss' "Heldenleben."—P. R.

Music

Monitor Oct 17

Boston Symphony

Upon the second program of the Boston Symphony season, given Oct. 16 in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky set the Ninth Symphony of Gustav Mahler. According to the program, this was the first performance of the work in the United States. Of Mahler's symphonic pieces, the Boston orchestra had previously produced the first, second and fifth symphonies and "The Song of the Earth."

If the nineteenth century ended, as some insist, in 1914, this symphony may perhaps be described as the swan song of a period as well as of Mahler's completed symphonic writings. Although there is a twentieth century air about some of its gestures, its heart belongs to the neo-romantic age. It peers into a future of greater instrumental freedom and harmonic and contrapuntal transparency, but its feet are planted on ground that was first trod by Beethoven.

And if we choose to dub this symphony the "Austrian Pathetic," it is not merely because its final movement is an Adagio which closes on an acoustic fadeout. As you listen you hear many voices, from Beethoven's to Wagner's; but most characteristic of them all is Tchaikovsky's. Those of the themes which have the nearest approach to definition and finished form bear a close relation to his style. It is true that there is more restraint, more self-control in the Austrian than in the Russian, yet the atmosphere of the first movement, with its alternations of songful sentiment and horrid cries, and of the last, with its self-conscious sadness, is that of the Byronic era come to a protracted conclusion.

This fact should not blind us to the virtues of the composer. Few creative musicians have his mastery of instruments. Few can speak with such clarity through so large an orchestra, keeping clearly distinguishable a multitude of voices, never blurring the picture with too much color. There is mastery of form, too, and unquestionably a high purpose upheld by artistic integrity.

For one listener, on a first hearing, it was in the Scherzo (Im Tempo eines Gemächlichen Ländlers) that these virtues were most successfully disclosed. Here is a Scherzo in the very mood of Beethoven himself. And how delectable the invention, how adroit the handling of the instruments. Even the thematic material here takes on a salience that in the other movements is lacking. In the Rondo, for example, the material is so banal that even Mahler's orchestration cannot make it interesting. Much has been written of the sardonic quality of the humor in these two movements. This emphasis seems to us exaggerated. There is a rather heavy irony in the Rondo, but the Scherzo seems excellent sport.

To this hearer the most disappointing aspect of the symphony was the much-praised final Adagio. Here again the poverty of the thematic material was a severe handicap. The orchestral writing constitutes a superb piece of compositorial virtuosity, but its ultimate pianissimo left us cold. This effect may have been due in part to the playing in this movement. Dr. Koussevitzky's weakness—in both senses—is slow passages. This one was rather picked to pieces, and there was some raggedness as a result. The other movements were proclaimed with a virtuosity matching the composer's own.

The symphony had a popular success that was exceptional for a newly heard work. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" (unheard at these concerts for 12 years) and the "Tannhäuser" Overture completed the program.

L. A. S.

SYMPHONY IN MAHLER'S GREAT 9TH

First Performance of Long, Exacting Work in America

Post Oct. 17

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The experience of hearing novel music that is also great and moving music, rare indeed in these days, was afforded the audience at yesterday afternoon Symphony Concert when Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to Boston, and incidentally to America, the Ninth Symphony of Gustav Mahler.

IS 19 YEARS OLD

That this symphony, which was published in 1912, should have waited so long for the hearing freely granted to much that has proved trivial and worthless is not altogether surprising, despite the marked enthusiasm with which yesterday's audience received it. This symphony is long. Even with Dr. Koussevitzky's liberal cuts in the third movement it ran yesterday for five minutes over an hour.

And if its idiom seems transparent to listeners accustomed to the music of Stravinsky, Honegger, Hindemith and their fellows, it might easily have baffled the audiences of Dr. Muck's time who received cordially the more obvious Fifth Symphony, while it is inconceivable that Mr. Monteux, who did make known to us the charming First Symphony, would have risked this more complicated and subtlized ninth.

Debt to Dr. Koussevitzky

To Dr. Koussevitzky, then, our full gratitude for having given us, first in "The Song of the Earth" and now in the Ninth Symphony, the two works of Mahler's maturity and prime, in which he sounded a note unheard in music since Beethoven wrote his last sonatas and quartets. Like Beethoven, Mahler in his later years found in composition an escape from the world of reality, become increasingly distasteful to him. Like Beethoven he achieved at times a spiritual calm, a clarity of spiritual vision, beyond the usual human experience; like him could express it in terms of tone.

This mood of spiritual ecstacy, so different from the sensuous mysticism of Franck and of Wagner's "Parsifal," finds voice in the last division of "The Song of the Earth" and in the sublime Adagio that concludes the Ninth Symphony. Measured by this finale the preceding three movements are less notable.

Very Exacting Music

Employing an orchestra unusually large on the woodwind side although otherwise normal, Mahler scores this Symphony with consumate clarity and effectiveness and with none of the bombast that occasionally disfigures its predecessors. Yet it is an exceedingly exacting music, exacting of both conductor and players. Yesterday's performance, though the work is new to us, may unhesitatingly be set down as rarely sympathetic and eloquent, one that added new lustre to Dr. Koussevitzky's reputation.
ky's reputation.

An exquisitely proportioned performance of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and a rousing one of his overture to "Tannhauser" made the rest of the concert.

Mahler's Ninth Symphony Wins Favor Under Koussevitzky

Amer. Oct 17 By MOSES SMITH

The second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts jumps immediately into the list of novelties promised by Serge Koussevitzky for the present season. For a solid hour and a few minutes besides, a Friday afternoon audience listened to the first performance of Mahler's Ninth Symphony in the United States. The symphony would have been even longer but for some cuts that Mr. Koussevitzky made in the score.

Moses Smith

Apparently these cuts were merited—if they ever are—for even as heard yesterday there are pages which induce an unedifying slumber. The first movement, beautiful as is the thematic material and ingeniously developed as it is, constitutes a severe tax on the patience of the listener—at least it did with this writer's patience, on first hearing. There are similar moments in the last movement; we found none in the second or third. The symphony is built on a grand scale, not only in elapsed time, but also in the size of the orchestra, though the latter does not reach the swollen dimensions of the orchestration of some of the other symphonies. And here the orchestration is exceedingly effective, without unnecessary duplication, with each instrument speaking in characteristic voice, and with the instrumental colors beautifully contrasted and beautifully blended. Parts of the first and last movements put Strauss to shame in this respect.

As was to be expected from advance report, we found the third movement, styled "Rondo: Burlesque," the finest of the work. Here is veritable diablerie, and a brilliant unexpected ending that foreshadows the ultra-moderns. The symphony as a whole was beautifully played by the orchestra.

The second half of the oddly-balanced program consisted of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and his overture to "Tannhauser." Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky had his tongue in his cheek when he set the lovely Idyl after the Mahler Symphony, for the last movement of the latter resembled in mood and expression Wagner's little masterpiece. Yet it was good to hear again the tender musing of Wagner's middle-age (some might call it old age). And Mr. Koussevitzky was more fortunate in his interpretation than has usually been the case in his Wagnerian experiments.

Trans. Oct 17

New Mahler Symphony Given

The first musical novelty of the orchestra season, the ninth Mahler Symphony, held the place of honor at the second concert of the Boston orchestra at Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon.

No more severe test could perhaps be put to a comparatively untried musical work than to place it on the program with such staunch and standard fare as Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and the overture to "Tannhauser." For Dr. Koussevitzky so excels at the unbelievable task of taking these all too hackneyed phrases, and lending to them a new vigor and inspiration, a color and a romance that they are brought to new levels of grandeur. The solid melodic substance, the sheer beauty of line and phrase, the smashing crescendos of the "Tannhauser" left yesterday's audience at the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

The Siegfried Idyll, too, composed by Wagner for his wife, Cosima, after the birth of his son, with the development of the folk-song theme, "Schlaf, mein Kind, schlaf ein" was given an exquisite performance.

The Mahler Symphony, first performed in Vienna in 1912, had its first performance in the United States yesterday. Mahler has been the butt of much unfavorable criticism, and yet each ensuing season finds new and admiring champions in his defence. The Ninth Symphony is a colossal work, long and scholarly in orchestration from its sombre introduction and the towering strength of the first movement, to the gayety of the rondo and the majestic adagio Mahler employs an unusually large orchestra, which permits highly effective use of the brass and percussion, enhanced by interesting modulation harmonic development.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation yesterday was a masterly one and at the conclusion of the performance the conductor was recalled and the orchestra rose to acknowledge the acclaim of the audience.

Next week's concerts include the Mozart E Major Symphony, Strauss's "Ein Heldenblen" and present Harold Morris as pianist and composer. J. D.

Oct 23-24

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931

usic and Musicians --- The Sc

The New Composer Of a New Concerto

Introducing Harold Morris To the Public of the Symphony Concerts

YET strictly speaking, Mr. Morris has already introduced himself to a Boston audience. Some years ago, as pianist, he played in Jordan Hall and was well received. Incidentally, in a number or two he may also have appeared as composer. Now, with the prestige of an invitation to the Symphony Concerts, he comes primarily as composer who is also practised pianist—as composer, in particular, of a Concerto to be heard on Friday and Saturday for the first times anywhere. It is middle piece in a program that begins with a Symphony of Mozart and ends with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

Harold Morris was born in 1890 at San Antonio, in Texas, where he received his early education, musical and other. He is a graduate of the University of Texas, holding a Bachelor's degree from that institution. He continued his musical studies at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music and in New York. He received no finishing in Europe and remains strictly an American product. His teachers were Thalberg and Godowsky for the piano; Edgar Stillman Kelley and Rosario Scalero for composition; Walter Henry Rothwell, the conductor. He is at present a member of the piano-faculty of the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

Mr. Morris's first work was a tone poem (1915) after Tagore's "Gitanjali." It was first heard from the Cincinnati Orchestra under Ysaye, in 1917. Stransky and Rothwell also played it. The composer still recounts with a glow of satisfaction how the old Ysaye said to him, "I'll play anything you ever write." Yet, until he undertook the concerto to be played in Symphony Hall, he wrote nothing further for full orchestra. As he explained yesterday: "I have been active as a composer chiefly in the field of chamber-music; for I believe that chamber-music affords the best outlet to the young composer in his effort to gain a hearing."

Mr. Morris has written a string-quartet, a piano-quintet, a sonata for violin and piano, a rhapsody for violin, 'cello and piano, a set of variations for chamber orchestra on a Negro Spiritual, "Dum-a-Lum." The present concerto was completed in 1926. The string quartet has been played variously by the Pro Arte Quartet. The trio, at a League of Composers' concert, by the author, Messrs. Stoessel and Salmond. Reviewers have been kind in their appraisal of these works. A single example will suffice. Writing of the trio, Mr. Gilman said in the Herald Tribune: "This is a superb piece of writing, and we know of no contemporary composer who would not be justified in patting himself on the back if he had written it."

Mr. Morris has ideas of his own concerning composition. As a composer he does not play the pleasant little game of "Follow my leader." Neither is he at all affected by mob-psychology among current composers. In other words, Mr. Morris raises questioning eyebrows at one of the principal tenets of most modernist composers, at their seeming passion for so-called originality at any and all costs. Natural expression of musical thought he sets higher than the ability to invent some new combination of tones, or of tone, rhythm and color, which no one else has devised before. As he talks, he appears more concerned with moods, with unities of mood, with coherence of expression, than with novel technical devices or with the exploration of the untried resources of music.

Said he to the inquirer: "Why should every composer try to invent a new musical language? Not every new poet tries to invent a new language of words. It would seem to be an error, then, for musicians to make such attempts." This does not mean that Mr. Morris's musical idiom reverts to the outworn formulas of the last century. Far from it. It does mean that his language is a far-ranging one, with sources in both past and present. It means further that Mr. Morris writes only in a language which he can use without producing effects of strain; which he can make to sound inevitable. It means, finally, that he uses only such language as is suited to the expression of his musical ideas; that he does not allow idiom to dictate subject-matter.

The composer-pianist began by telling the interviewer that he believed in folk-song as the chief fertilizing element in the art of music; affirmed that America possessed a rich store of folk-song; avowed his devotion to folk-music as a source of inspiration. To the questioner's hasty "What type of folk-music?" he replied: "Since I was born and brought up in the South, to Negro folk-music. That music I know extremely well. I was steeped in it through all the days of my youth. I do not mean to imply in any sense that it is the only American folk-music, but it is an important element in our musical heritage."

Characteristically, then, Mr. Morris took up his Concerto for exposition, beginning with the second movement rather than with the first. This second movement is a set of eight variations upon a little known Spiritual, the so-called "Negro Pilgrim Song." Mr. Morris pointed out how he had tried to find a background for the beautifully expressive melody which would be most in keeping with that melody; which would enhance it; which would seem to grow out of the melody itself. He went on to say that in all the variations he had made no attempt to juggle the melody or to play musical tricks with it; that he had refused to use the melody and the variation-form as a vehicle for the display of technical ingenuity and resource in composition. (Few forms lend themselves better to such display). He concluded with his main thesis—that he had tried to keep the variations in closely related moods, arising naturally out of the melody itself. The sixth variation, a noble Maestoso, mounting to a climax, furnishes the high point of the movement.

Turning to the first movement, Allegro Moderato, the composer reverted once again to the Spiritual. "The Spiritual," he said, "is the result of slavery in contact with civilization. It would not have arisen if the Negroes had not come in contact with civilization. Just as I have used this product of the Negro and his new environment in the second movement, so I base the first upon a music of the Negro in his native state. The first movement—in sonata-form—begins with an African Negro drum-beat as the principal motto of the symphony." The solo-piano announces it at the outset. Simultaneously with this announcement come rhythmic embellishments in the orchestra. By this sign the solo-piano is to be used frequently, in approved modern manner, as percussive instrument. The principal theme comes a little later, for solo-piano, in a full-voiced "Largamente." It is cast in ample mold. As secondary themes, there occur, first, an English-horn solo in the manner of a Spiritual, but original with the composer; later a broad Andante. All themes are conceived in a manner intended to cause the second movement to enter with the best possible effect.

The third and final movement is a Rondo—Allegro giusto. Though Mr. Morris announced no program, one can readily see that, while the first movement deals with the Negro in his aboriginal home, and the second with this Negro after making contact with civilization, the third may well be taken to be this same American Negro at play. It opens at once with the liveliest syncopated rhythms in piano and orchestra. It is obvious that these rhythms have their origin in jazz. But the composer happily avoids the triteness of manufactured, made-for-the moment, "best-seller" jazz. These rhythms and the harmonies that clothe them, the melodic contours that outline them, are of intriguing effect. They, together with frequent reference to the drum-beat motto, of the first movement, form the principal musical matter of the finale. As contrast there is another expressive Adagio which returns later as an Andante maestoso. Near the end the Spiritual of the second movement is introduced in changed rhythm. After which bravura passages bring the rondo to a spirited close.

A. H. M.

South to North

Harold Morris

Composer and Pianist at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday

Concert Chronicle

For Wellesley Hearing

THOUGH the season is still young, the course of the Wellesley Concert Fund proceeded to its second concert last evening at Alumnæ Hall. The program was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On entering one passed long lines of individuals leading to the box office, in the hope that single tickets for this performance might be available. The program as announced included a Handel Concerto and Brahms's Fourth Symphony. But the idea of the Edison memorial intervened, and Wellesley last evening heard Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony even as Symphony Hall will hear it this afternoon. The rest of the program continued according to previous announcement—Franck's Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Is it pertinent to record a memorial performance in terms of critical comment? Be it said parenthetically that to the young idea out at Wellesley joy in the performance of the symphony seemed far to outweigh any memorial considerations which the program sheet may have suggested; for spontaneous applause rose to great heights the moment the conductor released his baton, and the orchestra was soon on its feet in acknowledgment. To Dr. Koussevitzky this symphony is apparently the musical embodiment of all those things in life which we are accustomed to group together under the collective term heroism. And it is equally apparent that Dr. Koussevitzky's hero is the idealization of an exceedingly inclusive group of great and noble virtues. That hero is never a blusterer or a swaggerer or a swashbuckler. His heroism leaves such tell-tale signs of pettiness far, far behind. He has time for the refinements and the sensibilities of life. His heroism proceeds from an inner nobility of soul, is evidenced by the accomplishment of great things of lasting value to mankind. That Beethoven's hero is a composite idealization of the unselfish, altruistic, manly, dynamic forces in life, follows necessarily from the authenticated stories of the dedication of this symphony. It is evident then that the composer's hero and the conductor's hero are as nearly identical as the products of two minds can be. And where would one find a more perfect personification of this ideal than in the life of Thomas Alva Edison?

And what, may one ask, is the distinguishing feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this symphony? From a complex of great qualities it is of course difficult to isolate one single one; but if an answer were attempted, it would probably deal with the conductor's rhythmic handling of this score. From these rhythms proceeds a satisfying completeness—does one "interpret" too much if one suggests a life filled completely full of great achievement? Again one could point a finger in the direction of Edison. And rhythm is the nervous system of music; as Edison's electricity may be likened unto the nervous system of this machine-world of the twentieth century. But one must resist the temptation to spin out further comparisons and analogies. It is sufficient that Beethoven's unknown ideal hero, made real in this present through Koussevitkian intuitions, can suggest such an one as the great man who has just passed from us.

Franck's "Les Eolides" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" have already been subject of comment twice or thrice in these columns within the last fortnight. The quality of performance has not changed in that interval. Further extensive comment is hardly in place. Franck's music with its pretty, graceful tunes, its curiously ingratiating harmonies, is in this early work already the music which we were to hear from him through the rest of his life, be that music "absolute," or "sacred," or "profane"; in late life it took on more substance and depth, but the essential Franck is already present in this symphonic poem. And Ravel's show-piece of suave melody, of glittering ornament, of limpid flute-tone, of engulfing rhythms, of music sophisticate and refined through all these, was heard once more last evening at Wellesley even as it had already been heard in Boston and in Cambridge.

A. H. M.

Revival from Sibelius

As the Symphony Orchestra goes on tour next week through New York and the Middle West, the fourth pair of concerts is a fortnight away. Then, on Nov. 6 and 7, Dr. Koussevitzky will produce Respighi's orchestral version of six of Rakhmaninov's piano-pieces, "Etudes-Tableaux." He will also revive the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius unheard "at these concerts" since 1917. It was a favorite with Dr. Muck who first introduced it to Boston. To many hearers, it is one of the strangest and most concentrated of symphonies. "Here is music as austere as it is economical and ungarnished in expression." . . . Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," a bravura piece for orchestra, if there ever was one. will round out the program.

Repetition Rather Than Introduction

Roundabout Dr. Koussevitzky's Suggestion of a New Way With Living Composers

Trans. Oct 24

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the non-musical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Kousevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding has said something which may be prophetic of an end of the dosing, or at least of a different way of administering the pills, bitter or sugar-coated. On his return from Europe he was quoted as saying that the time of experimentation is over. An era has about reached its close. Conductors should give more heed to repetitions. Certain composers have established themselves and no longer are to be regarded primarily as innovators. It is time to review an epoch that is no longer a new day. Let us pick and choose from among the many works tried out on a docile public and thereby assist the fittest to survive. These are not the Boston conductor's words, but this, for us, is the burden of his message. The time has come when second and third performances would seem now to be of more importance than a premiere.

* * *

At first blush we agree. But we would much prefer that Mr. Koussevitzky should do the picking and the choosing of the works to be repeated. He names a number of composers as having settled into almost the status of classics. To grant some of these even a real importance in a day of change would be a strain on our generosity. But that is a detail and of little consequence as compared to the principle of more repetitions as against fewer first performances. This principle gives rise to these parallel questions:

Is it better to go on playing new works, even if they yield little promise of being any worthier than those already played, because of a forlorn hope of chancing eventually on something that may prove itself beyond a doubt at its first hearing?

Or is it better to disregard new works which obviously are no better than those that already have been played and repeat the latter because of an equally desperate hope that a second or third hearing will bring belated justice to something not fully grasped, understood or appreciated the first time?

These questions, it should be stated, are ours, not Mr. Koussevitzky's. His assumption may be, and presumably is, the very different one, that a certain number of composers and compositions of the post-war era have established themselves, and that the conductor who gives them further performances in some measure will be meeting a public demand. This we doubt. Conductors must create the demand. Unhappily, there may be more difficulty persuading audiences to listen with open mind a second time than a first.

It is one thing to admit a contemporary composer into the conductor's own gallery of "classics." It is quite another to convince the public that it enjoys what it does not enjoy. But who is to say what the public enjoys? Who really knows? What certain proofs are there with respect to the enjoyment of any first-time or second-time novelty not so fortunate or unfortunate as to be a transitory sensation like the Ravel Bolero? Does the applause in the concert hall begin to tell the story? Or a few subsequent letters of appreciation? Or a world-wide barrage of critical derogation?

Not to go farther back than many of our elder concert habitues can remember, we may ask what clear indications there were when the Strauss tone-poems were new that they would become almost indispensable to our symphonic programs during the next four decades. In the face of much sharp criticism, what clear evidence was conveyed to conductors that this was music that would grow in popularity with inevitable repetitions? They provoked no end of discussion. They led to widespread controversy. But discussion and controversy have raged about various works that in a relatively short time were relegated to the ash heap. Severe condemnation at the outset may be a great help, but it by no means insures the future success of a composition or composer, whatever the causes of the hostility thus evoked.

he difficulty, as we see it, with pect to such recent music as the conentious conductor may feel should brought back now for further hears, is not so much that of hostility as weariness and indifference. Has ndemith written anything that a firstss controversy could be built upon lay? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff? sn't Stravinsky a less controversial ure than he was?—his early works initely accepted, his later works either definitely rejected or clouded with an athy the public never felt toward his Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his acre du Printemps"! However, to give ravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let be conceded that further performances "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apol Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano priccio would fit reasonably into any view of the works of the post-war riod. There would still rest on the nductor a problem of conversion no s difficult than confronted him at the st performances of these works. To set the first curiosity, which may be mmed up as an attitude of "What's ravinsky up to now?" there has risen such clamor for or against any of the ter Stravinsky works as could create situation at all analogous to that of e early days of the Strauss works; or, r that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre Printemps."

So far as any desire to hear these orks manifests itself on the surface, are inclined to believe that the conctor who repeats them or their like ll have need to know more of the retions of countless individuals than ose individauls themselves know. This certainty of mind on the part of inmerable persons who are neither prodern nor the contrary may be of itf a strong argument for repetitions.

Continued on Following Page

Koussevitzky

Continued from Preceding Page

But uncertainty does not make for enhusiasm; it does imply the need of conversion.

Some of the reaction that undoubtedly as set in against the experimental nusic of yesterday—a reaction none the less definite though against something never popularly embraced—has taken he form of such wholesale condemnation of composers, compositions, conductors and literary exegetes as to represent an almost fanatical intolerance. One way, perhaps, to maintain or restore a saner outlook is to refuse to limit "contemporary" music to the post-war period. This is, in practice, just what is done with respect to such composers as Stravinsky and Ravel. If the career of either had been cut short fifteen years go, that would not have justified elimnation of their earlier works as music ot properly belonging to our era.

This may have some bearing on our utlook with respect to Debussy and trauss. If Debussy had lived and preerved similarly his mental vigor, he ould have been no more antiquated a gure than Strauss. They were within o years of an age, their creative gifts ossomed in the same decades. Ravel certainly is closer to Debussy an he is to Schönberg, and there is s that is common to Hindemith and spighi than there is to Alban Berg d Strauss. Sibelius, however solitary, a definite tie with the past.

When we become less age-conscious, en we stop trying to draw a line as tween what is modern and what is not, task of settling contemporary comsers in their places is going to be a ich simpler one. If more repetitions of rks of the last two decades will conbute to this end, the dread of an occanal rehearing of something that was ious the first time and may be more the second ought not to stand in the . In the words of an ancient wheeze, it heart never filled a spade flush.

OSCAR THOMPSON

printed from the New York Evening Post]

Oct 23-24

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931

usic and Musicians --- The Sc

The New Composer Of a New Concerto

Introducing Harold Morris To the Public of the Symphony Concerts

YET strictly speaking, Mr. Morris has already introduced himself to a Boston audience. Some years ago, as pianist, he played in Jordan Hall and was well received. Incidentally, in a number or two he may also have appeared as composer. Now, with the prestige of an invitation to the Symphony Concerts, he comes primarily as composer who is also practised pianist—as composer, in particular, of a Concerto to be heard on Friday and Saturday for the first times anywhere. It is middle piece in a program that begins with a Symphony of Mozart and ends with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

Harold Morris was born in 1890 at San Antonio, in Texas, where he received his early education, musical and other. He is a graduate of the University of Texas, holding a Bachelor's degree from that institution. He continued his musical studies at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music and in New York. He received no finishing in Europe and remains strictly an American product. His teachers were Thalberg and Godowsky for the piano; Edgar Stillman Kelley and Rosario Scalero for composition; Walter Henry Rothwell, the conductor. He is at present a member of the piano-faculty of the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

Mr. Morris's first work was a tone poem (1915) after Tagore's "Gitanjali." It was first heard from the Cincinnati Orchestra under Ysaye, in 1917. Stransky and Rothwell also played it. The composer still recounts with a glow of satisfaction how the old Ysaye said to him, "I'll play anything you ever write." Yet, until he undertook the concerto to be played in Symphony Hall, he wrote nothing further for full orchestra. As he explained yesterday: "I have been active as a composer chiefly in the field of chamber-music; for I believe that chamber-music affords the best outlet to the young composer in his effort to gain a hearing."

Mr. Morris has written a string-quartet, a piano-quintet, a sonata for violin and piano, a rhapsody for violin, 'cello and piano, a set of variations for chamber orchestra on a Negro Spiritual, "Dum-a-Lum." The present concerto was completed in 1926. The string quartet has been played variously by the Pro Arte Quartet. The trio, at a League of Composers' concert, by the author, Messrs. Stoessel and Salmond. Reviewers have been kind in their appraisal of these works. A single example will suffice. Writing of the trio, Mr. Gilman said in the Herald Tribune: "This is a superb piece of writing, and we know of no contemporary composer who would not be justified in patting himself on the back if he had written it."

Mr. Morris has ideas of his own concerning composition. As a composer he does not play the pleasant little game of "Follow my leader." Neither is he at all affected by mob-psychology among current composers. In other words, Mr. Morris raises questioning eyebrows at one of the principal tenets of most modernist composers, at their seeming passion for so-called originality at any and all costs. Natural expression of musical thought he sets higher than the ability to invent some new combination of tones, or of tone, rhythm and color, which no one else has devised before. As he talks, he appears more concerned with moods, with unities of mood, with coherence of expression, than with novel technical devices or with the exploration of the untried resources of music.

Said he to the inquirer: "Why should every composer try to invent a new musical language? Not every new poet tries to invent a new language of words. It would seem to be an error, then, for musicians to make such attempts." This does not mean that Mr. Morris's musical idiom reverts to the outworn formulas of the last century. Far from it. It does mean that his language is a far-ranging one, with sources in both past and present. It means further that Mr. Morris writes only in a language which he can use without producing effects of strain; which he can make to sound inevitable. It means, finally, that he uses only such language as is suited to the expression of his musical ideas; that he does not allow idiom to dictate subject-matter.

The composer-pianist began by telling the interviewer that he believed in folk-song as the chief fertilizing element in the art of music; affirmed that America possessed a rich store of folk-song; avowed his devotion to folk-music as a source of inspiration. To the questioner's hasty "What type of folk-music?" he replied: "Since I was born and brought up in the South, to Negro folk-music. That music I know extremely well. I was steeped in it through all the days of my youth. I do not mean to imply in any sense that it is the only American folk-music, but it is an important element in our musical heritage."

Characteristically, then, Mr. Morris took up his Concerto for exposition, beginning with the second movement rather than with the first. This second movement is a set of eight variations upon a little known Spiritual, the so-called "Negro Pilgrim Song." Mr. Morris pointed out how he had tried to find a background for the beautifully expressive melody which would be most in keeping with that melody; which would enhance it; which would seem to grow out of the melody itself. He went on to say that in all the variations he had made no attempt to juggle the melody or to play musical tricks with it; that he had refused to use the melody and the variation-form as a vehicle for the display of technical ingenuity and resource in composition. (Few forms lend themselves better to such display). He concluded with his main thesis—that he had tried to keep the variations in closely related moods, arising naturally out of the melody itself. The sixth variation, a noble Maestoso, mounting to a climax, furnishes the high point of the movement.

Turning to the first movement, Allegro Moderato, the composer reverted once again to the Spiritual. "The Spiritual," he said, "is the result of slavery in contact with civilization. It would not have arisen if the Negroes had not come in contact with civilization. Just as I have used this product of the Negro and his new environment in the second movement, so I base the first upon a music of the Negro in his native state. The first movement—in sonata-form—begins with an African Negro drum-beat as the principal motto of the symphony." The solo-piano announces it at the outset. Simultaneously with this announcement come rhythmic embellishments in the orchestra. By this sign the solo-piano is to be used frequently, in approved modern manner, as percussive instrument. The principal theme comes a little later, for solo-piano, in a full-voiced "Largamente." It is cast in ample mold. As secondary themes, there occur, first, an English-horn solo in the manner of a Spiritual, but original with the composer; later a broad Andante. All themes are conceived in a manner intended to cause the second movement to enter with the best possible effect.

The third and final movement is a Rondo—Allegro giusto. Though Mr. Morris announced no program, one can readily see that, while the first movement deals with the Negro in his aboriginal home, and the second with this Negro after making contact with civilization, the third may well be taken to be this same American Negro at play. It opens at once with the liveliest syncopated rhythms in piano and orchestra. It is obvious that these rhythms have their origin in jazz. But the composer happily avoids the triteness of manufactured, made-for-the moment, "best-seller" jazz. These rhythms and the harmonies that clothe them, the melodic contours that outline them, are of intriguing effect. They, together with frequent reference to the drum-beat motto, of the first movement, form the principal musical matter of the finale. As contrast there is another expressive Adagio which returns later as an Andante maestoso. Near the end the Spiritual of the second movement is introduced in changed rhythm. After which bravura passages bring the rondo to a spirited close.

A. H. M.

South to North

Harold Morris

Composer and Pianist at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday

Concert Chronicle

For Wellesley Hearing

THOUGH the season is still young, the course of the Wellesley Concert Fund proceeded to its second concert last evening at Alumnæ Hall. The program was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On entering one passed long lines of individuals leading to the box office, in the hope that single tickets for this performance might be available. The program as announced included a Handel Concerto and Brahms's Fourth Symphony. But the idea of the Edison memorial intervened, and Wellesley last evening heard Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony even as Symphony Hall will hear it this afternoon. The rest of the program continued according to previous announcement—Franck's Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Is it pertinent to record a memorial performance in terms of critical comment? Be it said parenthetically that to the young idea out at Wellesley joy in the performance of the symphony seemed far to outweigh any memorial considerations which the program sheet may have suggested; for spontaneous applause rose to great heights the moment the conductor released his baton, and the orchestra was soon on its feet in acknowledgment. To Dr. Koussevitzky this symphony is apparently the musical embodiment of all those things in life which we are accustomed to group together under the collective term heroism. And it is equally apparent that Dr. Koussevitzky's hero is the idealization of an exceedingly inclusive group of great and noble virtues. That hero is never a blusterer or a swaggerer or a swashbuckler. His heroism leaves such tell-tale signs of pettiness far, far behind. He has time for the refinements and the sensibilities of life. His heroism proceeds from an inner nobility of soul, is evidenced by the accomplishment of great things of lasting value to mankind. That Beethoven's hero is a composite idealization of the unselfish, altruistic, manly, dynamic forces in life, follows necessarily from the authenticated stories of the dedication of this symphony. It is evident then that the composer's hero and the conductor's hero are as nearly identical as the products of two minds can be. And where would one find a more perfect personification of this ideal than in the life of Thomas Alva Edison?

And what, may one ask, is the distinguishing feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this symphony? From a complex of great qualities it is of course difficult to isolate one single one; but if an answer were attempted, it would probably deal with the conductor's rhythmic handling of this score. From these rhythms proceeds a satisfying completeness—does one "interpret" too much if one suggests a life filled completely ful of great achievement? Again one coul point a finger in the direction of Edison And rhythm is the nervous system o music; as Edison's electricity may b likened unto the nervous system of thi machine-world of the twentieth century But one must resist the temptation t spin out further comparisons and anal ogies. It is sufficient that Beethoven's unknown ideal hero, made real in this present through Koussevitkian intuitions, can suggest such an one as the great man who has just passed from us Franck's "Les Eolides" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" have already been subject of comment twice or thrice in these columns within the last fortnight The quality of performance has no changed in that interval. Further extensive comment is hardly in place Franck's music with its pretty, graceful tunes, its curiously ingratiating harmonies, is in this early work already the music which we were to hear from him through the rest of his life, be that music "absolute," or "sacred," or "profane"; in late life it took on more substance and depth, but the essential Franck is already present in this symphonic poem. And Ravel's show-piece of suave melody, of glittering ornament, of limpid flute-tone, of engulfing rhythms, of music sophisticate and refined through all these, was heard once more last evening at Wellesley even as it had already been heard in Boston and in Cambridge.

A. H. M.

Revival from Sibelius

As the Symphony Orchestra goes on tour next week through New York and the Middle West, the fourth pair of concerts is a fortnight away. Then, on Nov. 6 and 7, Dr. Koussevitzky will produce Respighi's orchestral version of six of Rakhmaninov's piano-pieces, "Etudes-Tableaux." He will also revive the Fourth Symphony of Siberlius unheard "at these concerts" since 1917. It was a favorite with Dr. Muck who first introduced it to Boston. To many hearers, it is one of the strangest and most concentrated of symphonies. "Here is music as austere as it is economical and ungarnished in expression." . . . Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," a bravura piece for orchestra, if there ever was one. will round out the program.

Repetition Rather Than Introduction

Roundabout Dr. Koussevitzky's Suggestion of a New Way With Living Composers

Trans. Oct 24

THESE are not days when any conductor would feel secure in facing his audiences without a budget of novelties. This is true even though an accumulation of talk against contemporary music may seem to indicate that the time is at hand when the so-called modern composer will be the fellow most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the musical public has a feeling that it has been dosed. There are similar signs that the non-musical public has an increasing fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal, therefore, on the part of conductors and special groups to make new music known as fast as it appears may be developing antagonisms quite as much through dread as disappointment. Meanwhile the dosing continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an energy his admirers will commend, has lost no time in piling more first performances upon us. Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky have announced the usual list of "first times." In the lack of any information to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that all-modernist programs of the type sponsored by the League of Composers, Copland-Sessions and Pro-Musica have not vanished from the earth.

But Mr. Kousevitzky, his own ample array of novelties notwithstanding has said something which may be prophetic of an end of the dosing, or at least of a different way of administering the pills, bitter or sugar-coated. On his return from Europe he was quoted as saying that the time of experimentation is over. An era has about reached its close. Conductors should give more heed to repetitions. Certain composers have established themselves and no longer are to be regarded primarily as innovators. It is time to review an epoch that is no longer a new day. Let us pick and choose from among the many works tried out on a docile public and thereby assist the fittest to survive. These are not the Boston conductor's words, but this, for us, is the burden of his message. The time has come when second and third performances would seem now to be of more importance than a premiere.

* * *

At first blush we agree. But we would much prefer that Mr. Koussevitzky should do the picking and the choosing of the works to be repeated. He names a number of composers as having settled into almost the status of classics. To grant some of these even a real importance in a day of change would be a strain on our generosity. But that is a detail and of little consequence as compared to the principle of more repetitions as against fewer first performances. This principle gives rise to these parallel questions:

Is it better to go on playing new works, even if they yield little promise of being any worthier than those already played, because of a forlorn hope of chancing eventually on something that may prove itself beyond a doubt at its first hearing?

Or is it better to disregard new works which obviously are no better than those that already have been played and repeat the latter because of an equally desperate hope that a second or third hearing will bring belated justice to something not fully grasped, understood or appreciated the first time?

These questions, it should be stated, are ours, not Mr. Koussevitzky's. His assumption may be, and presumably is, the very different one, that a certain number of composers and compositions of the post-war era have established themselves, and that the conductor who gives them further performances in some measure will be meeting a public demand. This we doubt. Conductors must create the demand. Unhappily, there may be more difficulty persuading audiences to listen with open mind a second time than a first.

It is one thing to admit a contemporary composer into the conductor's own gallery of "classics." It is quite another to convince the public that it enjoys what it does not enjoy. But who is to say what the public enjoys? Who really knows? What certain proofs are there with respect to the enjoyment of any first-time or second-time novelty not so fortunate or unfortunate as to be a transitory sensation like the Ravel Bolero? Does the applause in the concert hall begin to tell the story? Or a ew subsequent letters of appreciation? r a world-wide barrage of critical erogation?

Not to go farther back than many of ur elder concert habitues can remember, we may ask what clear indications here were when the Strauss tone-poems ere new that they would become almost ndispensable to our symphonic programs during the next four decades. In the face of much sharp criticism, what clear evidence was conveyed to conductors that this was music that would grow in popularity with inevitable repetitions? They provoked no end of discussion. They led to widespread controversy. But discussion and controversy have raged about various works that in a relatively short time were relegated to the ash heap. Severe condemnation at the outset may be a great help, but it by no means insures the future success of a composition or composer, whatever the causes of the hostility thus evoked.

he difficulty, as we see it, with pect to such recent music as the conentious conductor may feel should brought back now for further hears, is not so much that of hostility as weariness and indifference. Has ndemith written anything that a firstss controversy could be built upon lay? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff? sn't Stravinsky a less controversial ure than he was?—his early works finitely accepted, his later works either definitely rejected or clouded with an athy the public never felt toward his Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his acre du Printemps"! However, to give ravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let be conceded that further performances "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apol- Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano priccio would fit reasonably into any view of the works of the post-war riod. There would still rest on the nductor a problem of conversion no s difficult than confronted him at the st performances of these works. To set the first curiosity, which may be mmed up as an attitude of "What's ravinsky up to now?" there has risen such clamor for or against any of the ter Stravinsky works as could create situation at all analogous to that of e early days of the Strauss works; or, r that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre Printemps."

So far as any desire to hear these orks manifests itself on the surface, e are inclined to believe that the conctor who repeats them or their like ll have need to know more of the retions of countless individuals than ose individauls themselves know. This certainty of mind on the part of inmerable persons who are neither proodern nor the contrary may be of itlf a strong argument for repetitions.

Continued on Following Page

Koussevitzky

Continued from Preceding Page

But uncertainty does not make for en- husiasm; it does imply the need of con- ersion.

Some of the reaction that undoubtedly as set in against the experimental nusic of yesterday—a reaction none the less definite though against something never popularly embraced—has taken he form of such wholesale condemnation of composers, compositions, conductors nd literary exegetes as to represent an lmost fanatical intolerance. One way, perhaps, to maintain or restore a saner outlook is to refuse to limit "contemporary" music to the post-war period. This is, in practice, just what is done with respect to such composers as Stravinsky and Ravel. If the career of ither had been cut short fifteen years go, that would not have justified elimnation of their earlier works as music ot properly belonging to our era.

This may have some bearing on our utlook with respect to Debussy and trauss. If Debussy had lived and preerved similarly his mental vigor, he ould have been no more antiquated a gure than Strauss. They were within o years of an age, their creative gifts ossomed in the same decades.

Ravel certainly is closer to Debussy an he is to Schönberg, and there is s that is common to Hindemith and spighi than there is to Alban Berg d Strauss. Sibelius, however solitary, a definite tie with the past.

When we become less age-conscious, en we stop trying to draw a line as ween what is modern and what is not, task of settling contemporary comsers in their places is going to be a ch simpler one. If more repetitions of rks of the last two decades will conbute to this end, the dread of an occanal rehearing of something that was ious the first time and may be more the second ought not to stand in the y. In the words of an ancient wheeze, t heart never filled a spade flush.

OSCAR THOMPSON

printed from the New York Evening Post]

Oct 23-24

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931

usic and Musicians --- The Sc

The New Composer Of a New Concerto

Introducing Harold Morris To the Public of the Symphony Concerts

YET strictly speaking, Mr. Morris has already introduced himself to a Boston audience. Some years ago, as pianist, he played in Jordan Hall and was well received. Incidentally, in a number or two he may also have appeared as composer. Now, with the prestige of an invitation to the Symphony Concerts, he comes primarily as composer who is also practised pianist—as composer, in particular, of a Concerto to be heard on Friday and Saturday for the first times anywhere. It is middle piece in a program that begins with a Symphony of Mozart and ends with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

Harold Morris was born in 1890 at San Antonio, in Texas, where he received his early education, musical and other. He is a graduate of the University of Texas, holding a Bachelor's degree from that institution. He continued his musical studies at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music and in New York. He received no finishing in Europe and remains strictly an American product. His teachers were Thalberg and Godowsky for the piano; Edgar Stillman Kelley and Rosario Scalero for composition; Walter Henry Rothwell, the conductor. He is at present a member of the piano-faculty of the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

Mr. Morris's first work was a tone poem (1915) after Tagore's "Gitanjali." It was first heard from the Cincinnati Orchestra under Ysaye, in 1917. Stransky and Rothwell also played it. The composer still recounts with a glow of satisfaction how the old Ysaye said to him, "I'll play anything you ever write." Yet, until he undertook the concerto to be played in Symphony Hall, he wrote nothing further for full orchestra. As he explained yesterday: "I have been active as a composer chiefly in the field of chamber-music; for I believe that chamber-music affords the best outlet to the young composer in his effort to gain a hearing."

Mr. Morris has written a string-quartet, a piano-quintet, a sonata for violin and piano, a rhapsody for violin, 'cello and piano, a set of variations for chamber orchestra on a Negro Spiritual, "Dum-a-Lum." The present concerto was completed in 1926. The string quartet has been played variously by the Pro Arte Quartet. The trio, at a League of Composers' concert, by the author, Messrs. Stoessel and Salmond. Reviewers have been kind in their appraisal of these works. A single example will suffice. Writing of the trio, Mr. Gilman said in the Herald Tribune: "This is a superb piece of writing, and we know of no contemporary composer who would not be justified in patting himself on the back if he had written it."

Mr. Morris has ideas of his own concerning composition. As a composer he does not play the pleasant little game of "Follow my leader." Neither is he at all affected by mob-psychology among current composers. In other words, Mr. Morris raises questioning eyebrows at one of the principal tenets of most modernist composers, at their seeming passion for so-called originality at any and all costs. Natural expression of musical thought he sets higher than the ability to invent some new combination of tones, or of tone, rhythm and color, which no one else has devised before. As he talks, he appears more concerned with moods, with unities of mood, with coherence of expression, than with novel technical devices or with the exploration of the untried resources of music.

Said he to the inquirer: "Why should every composer try to invent a new musical language? Not every new poet tries to invent a new language of words. It would seem to be an error, then, for musicians to make such attempts." This does not mean that Mr. Morris's musical idiom reverts to the outworn formulas of the last century. Far from it. It does mean that his language is a far-ranging one, with sources in both past and present. It means further that Mr. Morris writes only in a language which he can use without producing effects of strain; which he can make to sound inevitable. It means, finally, that he uses only such language as is suited to the expression of his musical ideas; that he does not allow idiom to dictate subject-matter.

The composer-pianist began by telling the interviewer that he believed in folk-song as the chief fertilizing element in the art of music; affirmed that America possessed a rich store of folk-song; avowed his devotion to folk-music as a source of inspiration. To the questioner's hasty "What type of folk-music?" he replied: "Since I was born and brought up in the South, to Negro folk-music. That music I know extremely well. I was steeped in it through all the days of my youth. I do not mean to imply in any sense that it is the only American folk-music, but it is an important element in our musical heritage."

Characteristically, then, Mr. Morris took up his Concerto for exposition, beginning with the second movement rather than with the first. This second movement is a set of eight variations upon a little known Spiritual, the so-called "Negro Pilgrim Song." Mr. Morris pointed out how he had tried to find a background for the beautifully expressive melody which would be most in keeping with that melody; which would enhance it; which would seem to grow out of the melody itself. He went on to say that in all the variations he had made no attempt to juggle the melody or to play musical tricks with it; that he had refused to use the melody and the variation-form as a vehicle for the display of technical ingenuity and resource in composition. (Few forms lend themselves better to such display). He concluded with his main thesis—that he had tried to keep the variations in closely related moods, arising naturally out of the melody itself. The sixth variation, a noble Maestoso, mounting to a climax, furnishes the high point of the movement.

Turning to the first movement, Allegro Moderato, the composer reverted once again to the Spiritual. "The Spiritual," he said, "is the result of slavery in contact with civilization. It would not have arisen if the Negroes had not come in contact with civilization. Just as I have used this product of the Negro and his new environment in the second movement, so I base the first upon a music of the Negro in his native state. The first movement—in sonata-form—begins with an African Negro drum-beat as the principal motto of the symphony." The solo-piano announces it at the outset. Simultaneously with this announcement come rhythmic embellishments in the orchestra. By this sign the solo-piano is to be used frequently, in approved modern manner, as percussive instrument. The principal theme comes a little later, for solo-piano, in a full-voiced "Largamente." It is cast in ample mold. As secondary themes, there occur, first, an English-horn solo in the manner of a Spiritual, but original with the composer; later a broad Andante. All themes are conceived in a manner intended to cause the second movement to enter with the best possible effect.

The third and final movement is a Rondo—Allegro giusto. Though Mr. Morris announced no program, one can readily see that, while the first movement deals with the Negro in his aboriginal home, and the second with this Negro after making contact with civilization, the third may well be taken to be this same American Negro at play. It opens at once with the liveliest syncopated rhythms in piano and orchestra. It is obvious that these rhythms have their origin in jazz. But the composer happily avoids the triteness of manufactured, made-for-the moment, "best-seller" jazz. These rhythms and the harmonies that clothe them, the melodic contours that outline them, are of intriguing effect. They, together with frequent reference to the drum-beat motto, of the first movement, form the principal musical matter of the finale. As contrast there is another expressive Adagio which returns later as an Andante maestoso. Near the end the Spiritual of the second movement is introduced in changed rhythm. After which bravura passages bring the rondo to a spirited close.

A. H. M.

South to North

Harold Morris

Composer and Pianist at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday

Concert Chronicle

For Wellesley Hearing

THOUGH the season is still young, the course of the Wellesley Concert Fund proceeded to its second concert last evening at Alumnæ Hall. The program was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On entering one passed long lines of individuals leading to the box office, in the hope that single tickets for this performance might be available. The program as announced included a Handel Concerto and Brahms's Fourth Symphony. But the idea of the Edison memorial intervened, and Wellesley last evening heard Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony even as Symphony Hall will hear it this afternoon. The rest of the program continued according to previous announcement—Franck's Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Is it pertinent to record a memorial performance in terms of critical comment? Be it said parenthetically that to the young idea out at Wellesley joy in the performance of the symphony seemed far to outweigh any memorial considerations which the program sheet may have suggested; for spontaneous applause rose to great heights the moment the conductor released his baton, and the orchestra was soon on its feet in acknowledgment. To Dr. Koussevitzky this symphony is apparently the musical embodiment of all those things in life which we are accustomed to group together under the collective term heroism. And it is equally apparent that Dr. Koussevitzky's hero is the idealization of an exceedingly inclusive group of great and noble virtues. That hero is never a blusterer or a swaggerer or a swashbuckler. His heroism leaves such tell-tale signs of pettiness far, far behind. He has time for the refinements and the sensibilities of life. His heroism proceeds from an inner nobility of soul, is evidenced by the accomplishment of great things of lasting value to mankind. That Beethoven's hero is a composite idealization of the unselfish, altruistic, manly, dynamic forces in life, follows necessarily from the authenticated stories of the dedication of this symphony. It is evident then that the composer's hero and the conductor's hero are as nearly identical as the products of two minds can be. And where would one find a more perfect personification of this ideal than in the life of Thomas Alva Edison?

And what, may one ask, is the distinguishing feature of Dr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this symphony? From a complex of great qualities it is of course difficult to isolate one single one; but if an answer were attempted, it would probably deal with the conductor's rhythmic handling of this score. From these rhythms proceeds a satisfying completeness—does one "interpret" too much if one suggests a life filled completely full of great achievement? Again one could point a finger in the direction of Edison. And rhythm is the nervous system of music; as Edison's electricity may be likened unto the nervous system of this machine-world of the twentieth century. But one must resist the temptation to spin out further comparisons and analogies. It is sufficient that Beethoven's unknown ideal hero, made real in this present through Koussevitkian intuitions, can suggest such an one as the great man who has just passed from us.

Franck's "Les Eolides" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" have already been subject of comment twice or thrice in these columns within the last fortnight. The quality of performance has not changed in that interval. Further extensive comment is hardly in place. Franck's music with its pretty, graceful tunes, its curiously ingratiating harmonies, is in this early work already the music which we were to hear from him through the rest of his life, be that music "absolute," or "sacred," or "profane"; in late life it took on more substance and depth, but the essential Franck is already present in this symphonic poem. And Ravel's show-piece of suave melody, of glittering ornament, of limpid flute-tone, of engulfing rhythms, of music sophisticate and refined through all these, was heard once more last evening at Wellesley even as it had already been heard in Boston and in Cambridge.

A. H. M.

Revival from Sibelius

As the Symphony Orchestra goes on tour next week through New York and the Middle West, the fourth pair of concerts is a fortnight away. Then, on Nov. 6 and 7, Dr. Koussevitzky will produce Respighi's orchestral version of six of Rakhmaninov's piano-pieces, "Etudes Tableaux." He will also revive the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius unheard "at these concerts" since 1917. It was a favorite with Dr. Muck who first introduced it to Boston. To many hearers, it is one of the strangest and most concentrated of symphonies. "Here is music as austere as it is economical and ungarnished in expression." . . . Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," a bravura piece for orchestra, if there ever was one, will round out the program.

Repetition Rather Than Introduction

Roundabout Dr. Koussevitzk Suggestion of a New Wa With Living Composers

Trans. Oct 24

THESE are not days when any ductor would feel secure in f his audiences without a bud novelties. This is true though an accumulation of talk a contemporary music may seem to in that the time is at hand when t called modern composer will be the most in need of a friend.

Signs are multiplying that the m public has a feeling that it has dosed. There are similar signs th non-musical public has an inc fear of being dosed. Excessive zeal fore, on the part of conductors a cial groups to make new music kn fast as it appears may be develop tagonisms quite as much through as disappointment. Meanwhile the continues. Mr. Kleiber, with an his admirers will commend, has time in piling more first perfo upon us. Mr. Stokowski and M sevitzky have announced the of "first times." In the lack o formation to the contrary, it taken for granted that all-moder grams of the type sponsored League of Composers, Copland and Pro-Musica have not vanis the earth.

But Mr. Kousevitzky, his array of novelties notwithsta said something which may be of an end of the dosing, or at different way of administering bitter or sugar-coated. On from Europe he was quoted that the time of experimentati An era has about reached its ductors should give more hee tions. Certain composers have themselves and no longer a garded primarily as innova time to review an epoch that a new day. Let us pick and among the many works trie docile public and thereby ass test to survive. These are not conductor's words, but this, fo burden of his message. Th come when second and thi ances would seem now to be portance than a premiere.

At first blush we agree. B much prefer that Mr. should do the picking and of the works to be repeated a number of composers as h into almost the status of grant some of these even tance in a day of chang strain on our generosity. detail and of little conse pared to the principle of as against fewer first pe principle gives rise to questions:

Is it better to go works, even if they yield being any worthier th played, because of a chancing eventually may prove itself first hearing?

Or is it better t which obviously those that already repeat the latter desperate hope th hearing will brin something not fully or appreciated the

These questions, are ours, not Mr. assumption may be the very different number of compose of the post-war er themselves, and that gives them further some measure will be demand. This we d must create the de there may be more di audiences to listen w second time than a firs

It is one thing to porary composer into own gallery of "classi another to convince th enjoys what it does not is to say what the public really knows? What cer there with respect to th any first-time or second-t so fortunate or unfortuna transitory sensation lik Bolero? Does the applaus cert hall begin to tell the few subsequent letters of Or a world-wide barrage derogation?

Not to go farther back th our elder concert habitues ber, we may ask what clear here were when the Strauss vere new that they would be ndispensable to our symp grams during the next four de the face of much sharp critic clear evidence was conveyed tors that this was music t grow in popularity with inevit titions? They provoked no e cussion. They led to widesprea versy. But discussion and co have raged about various work a relatively short time were to the ash heap. Severe cond at the outset may be a great it by no means insures the fu cess of a composition or composer, whatever the causes of the hostility thus evoked.

The difficulty, as we see it, with respect to such recent music as the conscientious conductor may feel should be brought back now for further hearings, is not so much that of hostility as of weariness and indifference. Has Hindemith written anything that a first-class controversy could be built upon today? Or Honegger? Or Prokofieff?

Isn't Stravinsky a less controversial figure than he was?—his early works definitely accepted, his later works either as definitely rejected or clouded with an apathy the public never felt toward his "Petrushka," his "Fire Bird" or his "Sacre du Printemps"! However, to give Stravinsky the benefit of the doubt, let it be conceded that further performances of "The Symphony of the Psalms," "Apollon Musagete" and, perhaps, the piano Capriccio would fit reasonably into any review of the works of the post-war period. There would still rest on the conductor a problem of conversion no less difficult than confronted him at the first performances of these works. To offset the first curiosity, which may be summed up as an attitude of "What's Stravinsky up to now?" there has risen no such clamor for or against any of the later Stravinsky works as could create a situation at all analogous to that of the early days of the Strauss works; or, for that matter, Stravinsky's own "Sacre du Printemps."

So far as any desire to hear these works manifests itself on the surface, we are inclined to believe that the conductor who repeats them or their like will have need to know more of the reactions of countless individuals than those individauls themselves know. This uncertainty of mind on the part of innumerable persons who are neither pro-modern nor the contrary may be of itself a strong argument for repetitions.

Continued on Following Page

Koussevitzky

Continued from Preceding Page

But uncertainty does not make for enthusiasm; it does imply the need of conversion.

Some of the reaction that undoubtedly has set in against the experimental music of yesterday—a reaction none the less definite though against something never popularly embraced—has taken the form of such wholesale condemnation of composers, compositions, conductors and literary exegetes as to represent an almost fanatical intolerance. One way, perhaps, to maintain or restore a saner outlook is to refuse to limit "contemporary" music to the post-war period. This is, in practice, just what is done with respect to such composers as Stravinsky and Ravel. If the career of either had been cut short fifteen years ago, that would not have justified elimination of their earlier works as music not properly belonging to our era.

This may have some bearing on our outlook with respect to Debussy and Strauss. If Debussy had lived and preserved similarly his mental vigor, he would have been no more antiquated a figure than Strauss. They were within two years of an age, their creative gifts blossomed in the same decades.

Ravel certainly is closer to Debussy than he is to Schönberg, and there is less that is common to Hindemith and Respighi than there is to Alban Berg and Strauss. Sibelius, however solitary, is a definite tie with the past.

When we become less age-conscious, when we stop trying to draw a line as between what is modern and what is not, the task of settling contemporary composers in their places is going to be a much simpler one. If more repetitions of works of the last two decades will contribute to this end, the dread of an occasional rehearing of something that was tedious the first time and may be more so the second ought not to stand in the way. In the words of an ancient wheeze, faint heart never filled a spade flush.

OSCAR THOMPSON

[Reprinted from the New York Evening Post]

24

Symphony Oct 24 Concert

New Concerto Enlarges the Symphonic Day

From Harold Morris, American, Fresh Blood Into Old Form, Mozart and Strauss

NOWADAYS piano-concertos are out of fashion. Patient and polite Bostonians do not hiss them at Symphony Hall as mannerless young Parisians used to do at the Colonne Concerts. Form and contents, they explained, were moribund; performance was time wasted. More charitably and less openly, we count these concertos as part of the baggage that illustrious pianists carry about; as decorative appendages to the work of eminent composers. Besides, they are, almost always, classics or semi-classics, giving the learned "programists" opportunity to string together page after page of rambling notes. In these times, we say to ourselves, who writes a piano-concerto, unless it be a young Parisian composer minded to better his fortunes by an American tour; or, say, Monsieur Ravel remembering, on the edge of his sixties, that he has not written such a piece and hastening to repair the oversight? It is easy to imagine composers setting to symphonies, overtures, tone-poems, unlabelled compositions for orchestra, from inner and irresistible urge. In this twentieth century, if and when they put a piano-concerto to music-paper, most do it to mark their place in the world, as the haute bourgeoisie sooner or later buy top-hats.

Into the Symphony Concert yesterday, out of Texas by way of New York, came Mr. Harold Morris, in the forty-first year of his age, to upset all these notions. He was modestly placed at the middle of the program with no more than a slender line to signal him: "Concerto for Piano . . . Morris . . . First Performances." As modestly he preceded Dr. Koussevitzky to the pianoforte, tall, seemly, self-possessed, uncommonly youthful. But it was to be observed that at the end of piece and performance there were tossed locks for him to smooth and a morning coat to set right at the shoulders. He was not too warmly received, since next to no one remembered that he had given a rather notable recital in Boston six years ago. Before he and the orchestra had proceeded through a hundred measures he was in full possession of the audience.

And with reason. For here was no piano-concerto written because the pianist-composer wished to groom and ride his own battle-horse. No more was he adding an opus 36, for example, to the lengthening catalogue of his works. Mr. Morris had something to say musically and individually; knew how to say it in such fashion; chose the form because it suited his purpose, bent it to his ends; said his saying with communicating ardor and impetus. The Concerto is rooted in Negro folk-melody. From his Southern youth Mr. Morris has answered to it; studied, cultivated, absorbed it. His second movement is a set of variations on a Negro spiritual. An African drum-beat is percussive motiv through the first. There are syncopations of unmistakable origin through the final Rondo. There, however, as oftenest elsewhere, Mr. Morris does not transliterate. He transfuses his folk-material into himself; from him it emerges in the shape, substance, color and character he would impose upon it; becomes matter for his imagination, means for his skill.

That skill is considerable and eminently plastic. Mr. Morris does not depart from orthodox form—sonata-like in the first movement, variations in the second, rondo in the third—but he molds it with modern freedoms, lets his matter and expression condition it. Though along the way, he tests his own, or any other player's powers, the bravura measures are neither frequent, overt nor manufactured. They spring naturally from the course, the motion, the mood. In modern fashion, likewise, he writes symphonically for the orchestra, or for piano and orchestra joined, rather than treats the one as solo, the other as accompanying instrument. Throughout, he is more sensitive, inventive and expert with the timbre of the piano—as in the first movement—than with the timbres of the orchestra. None the less he handles the various instrumental groups ably, warmly, with a will of his own. The orchestral turn, the orchestral background, are seldom obvious or expected. Throughout, again, the Concerto is unified not merely by the recurrence or the interlocking of motivs, but as a music upspringing from itself, with a ferment and a rhythmic motion of its own, flowing—not conducted—from mood to mood, proceeding from an ordered beginning to a foreseen end. As ripe and ready composer, Mr. Morris writes, master of himself and of his design, yet possessed for the passing instant by sudden improvisational flashes.

By these qualities alone a composer-pianist does not prevail as Mr. Morris prevailed yesterday. Propulsive energy first served him. The first movement of the Concerto had body and abundance, motion and élan. It swung into the course; mounted along it; upswelled into larger and warmer voice; so gained final amplitude. The pianistic drum-beat gave it a tang of wildness; creative ardor deepened it; rhythmic vigors pulsed through it; at the end came full-rounded whole—as though the tonal stage were full-set for the variations that were to be focus and heart of the music. They rose, as though a brooding mood, and not technical contemplation, had called them into being. One or another struck a plaintive, half-exotic, note. Again a native wildness struggled through, only to subdue itself, restless, regretful. Upon one more a great peace descended. All were emanations of the "Pilgrim Song" from a touched imagination. All were music in which the piano had characterizing part yet was woven into the unfolding symphonic texture.

The Rondo escaped the repetition of the obvious which is familiar bane to such finales. Again the pianistic drum-beat whipped acridly in. The motion of the music was incessant and exhilarating, the more for its ever-changing density. There were returns to the rapt mood of the variations; upleaping rhythms or jetting bravura brushed it away. . . . In 1931 concertos are still written, even born alive. No thin blood runs in Mr. Morris; none of the hesitating, refuge-seeking temperament that too often dulls American music-making. He speaks out. Yesterday his audience could not choose but hear. Some of us made bold to fancy that we were "sitting in" at an event.

Mozart began the concert briefly; Strauss ended it more lengthily. The symphony out of Salzburg was the little and early Symphony in C major, sans minuet, with a slow movement for strings and bassoons only, that Sir T. Beecham introduced into these concerts. Dr. Koussevitzky and a lightened string choir played it with flawless tone, transparent texture, phrasing that was both chiselled and pliant. Yet short as the Symphony is, felicitously as it was made to sound, it ran thin before any movement was ended. No doubt in these latter days we take the symphonic label over-seriously. From a symphony, we expect instinctively something large-scaled, pitched high, generally and particularly significant. We do not naturally hear it as light, agreeable entertainment. Yet Mozart and his time so wrote, listened, applauded — probably chatted while the music was proceeding, if the concert-room happened also to be salon. Unmistakably this Symphony in C major is such a piece. Yet the bright vigor of the first movement wanes before full close comes; the moodless second movement runs dry; only the lively rhythmed finale prattles and smiles and races, returning and repeating to the end.

As often as Dr. Koussevitzky plays "Ein Heldenleben"—and he, his orchestra and his Bostonian public rise to the tone-poem—he does Strauss loyal service. For he preserves, projects, intensifies a music — and not a program. "A Hero-Life" was thirty-two years old last March. The time is well past for debating the minutiæ, except in "programists'" footnotes. Let the Hero's adversaries cheep and snarl; let the battle rage. (In point of fact, after an atonal and a polytonal day, it rages rather tamely.) All these, like the rococo ornament of violin-figures around the Hero's helpmeet, are but details along the way. There remains a tonal narrative hardly surpassed in symphonic music for sustained and diversified progress, at every turn graphic, swift, impinging upon every listening faculty. There remains also a masterly music of characterization vivid, various, dynamic, astringent. Thereby, as in "Don Juan," "Don Quixote" and "Till," Strauss widened the scope and deepened the potency of musical expression; reflected the temper of his time; set his mark upon it.

There remain, finally, such sequences as the proclamation of the Hero's pride and will, the interweaving of the love music, the ascent of the Hero's motiv above the battle, the meditation upon his works of peace, the grave exaltation of his end. There and elsewhere, page after page teems with thought and feeling, fire, power, wisdom, beauty, illumination; runs copious and beats high with intellectual and emotional energy. Dr. Koussevitzky is all understanding when he plays "Ein Heldenleben" as a music self-contained and self-expressed.

H. T. P.

Programs to Hand

Trans Oct 24

At last, in deference to many requests from the public of the Cambridge concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky will venture one of Strauss's longer and larger tone-poems in Sanders Theater. Hitherto the stage has been counted too small for the requisite number of players. The program for the concert on Thursday of next week stands:

Overture to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus" Beethoven
Concerto, No. 3, in C minor for Piano and Orchestra .... Beethoven
(Pianist: Eleanor Packard)
Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben" ...... Strauss

[illegible] be heard at Sym-

Incidents and Prospects

Two notable "assisting artists" are engaged for the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts on Monday evenings: Miss d' Aranyi, the violinist, as yet unheard in Boston with orchestra; Mr. Robert Goldsand, the young Viennese pianist, praised on all sides in New York a year or two ago.

A setting for unaccompanied chorus of

---

31 Herald

MUSIC

Oct 24

MORRIS'S CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the third concert of its 51st season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Symphony in C Major (without minuet, K. No. 338). Morris, Concerto for Piano (first performance). Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."

Mr. Harold Morris, born at San Antonio, Tex., in 1890, knowing well the Negroes, their songs and their rhythms, as a composer was naturally led to utilize this knowledge. Not, however, as an abject folk-lorist of the North who believes that all music by Americans should be based on Negro tunes and rhythms, for Mr. Morris has found orchestral inspiration in poems by Tagore, and written much chamber music of an "absolute" nature. In this concerto he uses a Negro spiritual, "Pilgrim Song" as a theme for variations which are of a decidedly modern character; he uses in the other movements the "African Negro drumbeat," which has fascinated travellers on that continent from Winwood Reade to Andre Gide; but this rhythmic beat might have been employed by other composers without thought of Africa and its natives. The beautiful "Pilgrim Song" is without doubt a Negro spiritual, but as Mr. Morris says, it shows the effect—he probably means the effect musically—"of civilization on the slaves of the southern states." It is highly improbable that the tune as it now appears was brought to this country by African slaves; many so-called spirituals were shaped by plantation Negroes who heard their mistresses singing European ballads, or American sentimental ditties. To call this concerto a "Negro Concerto" would be to wrong Mr. Morris, for the best portions of the work are of his own invention; nor is there outside of the spiritual hardly a page that has a specific Negro character.

The set of variations —though variations, no matter how the laborer in this field is named, are as a rule to be avoided—this set of variations is to us the most interesting, the most musical portion of the work. They are more than ingenious; they display more than technical skill; they show imagination, poetic thought and expression. And in this movement the instrumentation is more conspicuous for variety, color, fancy than in the other movements, in which it is at times thick, often depending for a desired effect on merely vigorous impact.

The first movement might be shortened to advantage. There are too many elaborate preparations for too many climaxes, so that the hearer is often led to anticipate what should be the crowning climax, the "apotheosis." Few of the themes and their derivatives have a sufficiently salient character. No one expects in these days a decidedly sensuous element in orchestral music. That element, we are assured, is old-fashioned, shop-worn. Patterns, rhythms and cross-rhythms, in them lies beauty. And so the simple pathos of the Pilgrim Song came as a relief. There are some stirring passages in the first movement as in the Finale, which has the more continuous pace and is more compact, but there are other passages, yes, pages that are little more than sound and fury.

Dr. Koussevitzky had given great attention to the preparation for performance. He showed practically his interest in the concerto, for everything was done by him and the orchestra to present the music in its strength, while the contrasting measures, the harmonic inventions and the more delicate details were played with full appreciation. Mr. Morris played the piano part often with gusto, but for a considerable number of measures in the first movement, the piano part was not sufficiently prominent, although in them the piano was not merely an orchestral instrument. Nor was this lack of proportion due to the over-bearing orchestra, for Dr. Koussevitzky preserved proportion when it was possible.

The concerto—especially the variation section—was well received by the audience—and the orchestra joined in the applause at the end; well-merited, for while exceptions may be noted, the concerto deserves thoughtful attention and gives promise for Mr. Morris in the future.

The symphony was beautifully played. Dr. Koussevitzky is always happy in his interpretation of Mozart's music. It is never stale to him; he could not endure a perfunctory performance.

Strauss's "Heldenleben"—that composer's self-glorification—brought the close. It is fortunate that the most eloquent, the least sensational, theatrical pages are those of the conclusion. A German analyst has given to this ending a title: "The hero's escape from the world." One does not easily see Strauss wishing or willing to escape from the world even to the accompaniment of solemn strains. Some of the sections are now outworn. There is much that is bombastic. One is not interested today in the snarling and sneering of the hero's antagonists, who because they did not like Strauss's music had of course, an "earthly, sluggish nature." But the opening portrayal of the hero, the amorous episode—in which Mr. Burgin played delightfully the violin solo with the requisite capriciousness, and the conclusion are still worth hearing, when they are performed as they were yesterday.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Nov. 6-7 comprises Respighi's arrangement of five piano pieces by Rachmaninoff (first performances). Sibelius, Symphony No. 4, A minor. Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

American Composer Soloist in New Concerto at Symphony

Amer

By MOSES SMITH

Oct 24

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has double cause for pride and joy in presenting the Piano Concerto of Harold Morris, American composer from Texas, now living in New York City.

Not only is the work being given a world premiere, which is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's specialties, but it is by an American—and the Russian conductor has a notable, perhaps unique, record among conductors in this country in his persistent sponsorship of rising talent. Mr. Morris plays the solo part in his own work. By all the evidence of yesterday's program, the work was carefully rehearsed. And so we may assume that the sounds we heard are those Mr. Morris intended.

At first hearing it seemed to us that the first movement contained the most interesting material, but that it was too long for this subject matter or for the listener's attention. The second and third movements were less weighty in substance, though equally serious

---

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky chose a curiously varied program for yesterday's Symphony concert. Its three numbers were a Mozart symphony, in C major, the one conducted here a few years ago by Sir Thomas Beecham, No. 338 in Koechel's thematic catalogue of the composer's works; a new piano concerto by Harold Morris, with Mr Morris as pianist; and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." Those who like to find some sort of unity underlying a program must have been baffled to find any imaginative congruity in these three works.

Harold Morris is an American, born at San Antonio, Tex, in 1890, now living in New York. He has studied piano and composition in this country, under musicians of the conservative elder school. In a program note Mr Morris states that although he does not believe in leaning entirely on folk music, or that it should "in any way hamper our modern musical expression," nevertheless folk music "should be the basis, as it was with composers of the past." He subscribes to the dictum of the late H. E. Krehbiel that the only place in America where true folk song could possibly be found is on the old-time Southern plantation, among the Negroes.

Morris' Concerto

Accordingly, the thematic material of Mr Morris' concerto is derived from "Spirituals," especially from the "Pilgrim's Song," which is its principal melody. He has scored it for a moderate modern orchestra, except that there is an array of percussion instruments.

The important point about a new piece of music is not the theories of its composer, but its effect on an audience. One's first impression of this concerto, possibly an unfair one, was that it is dull, lacking in emotional vitality, and rather clumsily written. Neither in style nor in substance does it show distinct individuality or power. It is certainly no worse than some of the European novelties of recent seasons at Symphony Hall. One prefers the music of Mr Morris to that of Lourie or Janin, for instance. But it is no better. The performance was politely applauded, without any evidence that the audience was emotionally stirred.

Mozart's symphony has an originality, a daring in style, a depth of feeling that would belie those who write patronizingly of his work as merely graceful and fluent. It deserved a more incisive, a more brilliant, a more accurate performance than it received. Dr Koussevitzky cannot be expected to show equal imaginative understanding of the work of all composers, and Mozart is notoriously his worst "blind spot." But he could and should see that the orchestra plays the right note at the exact right moment. Perhaps the attacks would be more invariably unanimous if the conductor's beat always gave a clear signal for beginning.

Strauss' "Heldenleben"

Strauss' "Heldenleben" is to be ranked with his "Alpine Symphony" among his failures rather than with "Till" and "Don Juan" among his triumphs, a judgment of which repeated hearings make one the surer. This music sounds magnificently, but has almost nothing new or vital to say. It was painstakingly and eloquently performed.

Although no attention was called to it, many in the audience must have been struck at the opening of the concert yesterday by the mute eloquence of the vacant chair at the second desk among the first violins. Boris Kreinen, whose place it was, died this week as the result of injuries received in an accident. An excellent musician, he will be missed by his colleagues. The admirable choir of first violins has lost one of its best voices.

P. R.

Herald Oct 22

31

MUSIC

MORRIS'S CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

Harold Morris's piano concerto will have its first performance tomorrow afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will play the piano part.

He was born at San Antonio, Tex., in 1890. His teachers have been Edgar Stillman Kelley, Godowsky, Rothwell, Scalero and Thalberg. The concerto was begun about three years ago. The slow movement is a set of variations on the spiritual "Pilgrim's Song."

"I'm a poor wayfarin' stranger
While journeyin' thro' this land of woe,
Yet there's no sickness, toil and danger,
In that bright world to which I go."

This song, Mr. Morris says, shows the effect of civilization on the slaves of the southern states, and is in strong contrast to the rugged rhythmic character of the African Negro drum beat with which the first movement opens and is used throughout the movement and momentarily in the last as a binding link between the movements. "The other material is, I hope, the natural and logical result of growing up with, and studying folk music as we have it in the South. But I do not mean this to imply that I believe in leaning entirely on folk music or that I should in any way limit or hamper our modern musical expression, but rather that it should be the basis as it was with composers of the past."

The score calls for the orthodox orchestra with these percussion instruments: kettle drums, snare drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, wooden block, glockenspiel, xylophone.

The list of Mr. Morris's compositions includes "Poem" for orchestra after Tagore's "Gitanjali," symphony for large orchestra, violin and piano sonata, piano trio, piano quintet, string quartet. Variations for chamber orchestra on the spiritual, "I was way down yonder, dum-a-lum," three piano sonatas, songs. Music by him has been performed by the N. Y. Philharmonic Society, Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, Los Angeles Symphony orchestra, Rochester Symphony orchestra, Pro Arte Quartet, N. Y. String Quartet, Hans Lange Quartet, Felix Salmond, 'cellist; Albert Stossel, violinist and conductor.

The other compositions to be played under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction this week are Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 338)—without a minuet — and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben." These two works were on Sir Thomas Beecham's program when he led the orchestra as a guest conductor.

Morris as Soloist With Symphony

Trav Oct 24

Harold Morris, the first soloist of concert season, appeared afternoon at Symphony hall dual role of composer and pia the Boston Symphony orchest

The youthful Mr. Morris ha lished himself with some degr cess as one of the vanguard o can composers whose works air of nationalism to our mus the Piano Concerto, which wa its first performance yesterday, h his inspiration from a Negro fol of the southern plantations. a melodic strain, somewhat elab embroidered with orchestral and nical embellishments. It is in th ond movement, variations on Negro "Pilgrim Song," that Mr. found his best medium, and to a what lesser extent in the fascina and exciting rondo which followed it.

The opening allegro and an seem, from the listener's viewpoin in a maze of harsh dissonances.
only fleeting and occasional glin of beauty in brief melodic passage appraisal of Mr. Morris's promisin ent must rest on future perform of this strange and somewhat di ing concerto. He displayed a vigor sympathetic musicianship at the p

The symphony was Mozart's crown ing creation, in C major, familiarly known as the Jupiter symphony. The scholarly masterpiece was played with the usual Koussevitzky perfection of detail—a glorious performance. So, too, was the closing Strauss tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," picturesque and heroic measures of one of Dr. Koussevitzky's perennial favorites.

Post

AY, OCTOBER 24, 19

YOUTH AND MASTERS BY SYMPHONY

Morris' Piano Concerto, Mozart and Strauss Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The first piece of strictly contemporaneous music in three pairs of Symphony Concerts came yesterday in the Pianoforte Concerto of Harold Morris, played for the first time and with the composer as soloist.

SPIRITUAL BASIS FOR THEME

Mr. Morris was born in Texas 41 years ago; he has appeared as pianist in Jordan Hall but his name was unknown to the Symphony Concerts until yesterday. Like other composers of Southern extraction, John Powell for example, he has turned in this concerto and in other works to the music of the Negro for thematic material and suggestions. The Spiritual known as the Pilgrim Song bulks large in his Concerto. In the slow movement it forms the basis of the theme and variations, and the final statement of it here by the English horn, with piano and four violins accompanying, is one of the most felicitous touches in a work that seems on the whole episodic rather than well sustained.

Mr. Morris' is a concerto of moments. There are pages of fine rhythmic energy and large orchestral sonorities that sweep all before them. There are passages of pleasing richness. Possibly the nostalgic lyricism of the Spiritual colors the concerto over-much; certain it is that yesterday it seemed long and diffuse, neither sufficiently direct nor sufficiently cohesive, and without marked originality. The orchestral part is effectively made; the piano is treated idiomatically. Dr. Koussevitzky led a sympathetic performance, and Mr. Morris played his solo part brilliantly. He was cordially applauded.

Dr. Koussevitzky cannot be accused of malice towards a young composer whose work he is said to admire, but it was hardly kind of him to place this Concerto between Mozart's Symphony in C major, number 34, and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." The Mozart of this Symphony of 1780 and the Strauss who wrote "A Hero's Life" at the fullness of his powers wrote each of them with superb assurance and certainty of touch, and in neither case could their music be mistaken for that of any other.

Indeed, the Mozart of this delightful little Symphony in C seems more truly himself than the composer of the E-flat major and "Jupiter" Symphonies who looked forward to the Beethoven that he might not become. For it Dr. Koussevitzky found yesterday the ideal voice. His orchestra played as a Mozart orchestra, calling to mind that Mozart orchestra par excellence, the Vienna Philharmonic.

The performance of Strauss' tone-poem is describable only in superlatives. It is a promising beginning to a Symphony season to have heard in the first three concerts in such masterly and glamorous performance three such mighty works as Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Mahler's Ninth and now "Ein Heldenleben."

CARDS AVAILABLE TODAY FOR SYMPHONY MEMORIAL

Admission cards will be distributed today at Symphony Hall, free of charge, for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give in memory of Thomas A. Edison in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at o'clock.

The cards of admission, although unreserved, correspond in number to the seats in Symphony Hall. They will be presented on request at the box office, beginning at 9 this morning until all have been taken.

The concert will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, famous for the funeral march which constitutes its slow movement. The concert will last for one hour, and will be broadcast to the entire Nation through station WEEI, which bears Edison name, and a national network.

Globe Oct 2

Memorial Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison on Thursday at 4 p. m., in Symphony Hall. Tickets, for which there will be no charge, may be obtained at Symphony Hall on Wednesday.

Monitor Oct 19

Harold Morris's Piano Concerto

~~Monitor Oct 24~~

Harold Morris's Piano Concerto was played for the first time anywhere at the third Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 23. The composer was at the piano. Thus Dr. Koussevitsky again manifested his hospitality to works by American composers; for Mr. Morris is a native of Texas and received his musical education entirely in the United States.

Although this concerto is only Mr. Morris's second composition for full orchestra, he has won a considerable reputation as a composer of chamber music. This latest work, which might be called the "Negro" Concerto, carries out the composer's theory that native song should be the basis of American music. For motto of the whole, he has used an African Negro drumbeat; a Negro spiritual, "Pilgrim's Song," is the theme of the slow movement, and the final Rondo freely employs rhythms and tonal effects which are associated with Negro music.

On a first hearing the concerto left a good impression. Structurally it is sound, consisting of a first movement in sonata form, an Andante made up of a theme with eight variations, and a concluding Rondo. The composer has said that he intends to represent the Negro in the first movement in his primitive condition, in the second as affected by civilization. To the listener the second movement seems to reflect chiefly the religious element of civilization, while the Finale appears to express some of its less restful aspects.

An encouraging feature of the work is its freedom from effects designed to shock the listener to attention. The less agreeable devices of the modernist are used sparingly, and evidently only for specific purposes. The composer proves that he is not fearful of melody by writing a pleasant tune for the second theme of his first movement. There is no attempt to overwhelm us by volume of sound; indeed, the author's experience with the composition of chamber music is reflected in his scoring, which is remarkably transparent, and often he is satisfied to use but a few instruments—as violin, English horn, piano—for considerable passages. The solo instrument is used for the most part in embellishment and is given few measures to itself. As a whole the work, if not strikingly original, is workmanlike and musicianly.

The concert opened with a meticulous performance of Mozart's Symphony in C major No. 34 (K. 338) and closed with a relation of Strauss's "Heldenleben," which could not by its eloquence conceal the tediousness of the tale. L. A. S.

SYMPHONY TO HONOR MEMORY OF EDISON

Concert Thursday to Go Over Radio to Nation

~~Globe Oct 20~~

Two memorial services here and others throughout the world were planned yesterday as science joined Governments in mourning the death of Thomas A. Edison.

The Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston announced that during the hour of the funeral service tomorrow a 15-minute memorial program, with organ music and singing by a chorus of men employes, will be broadcast from the company's station, WEEI. Substations and departments of the company will receive the program by radio. Pres Charles L. Edgar of the company, Mrs Edgar and their son, Leavitt L. Edgar, will attend the funeral services at West Orange, N J.

Symphony Plans Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will depart from tradition to present a memorial concert in honor of Edison in Symphony Hall Thursday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock. Dr Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Tickets will be given free to applicants at Symphony Hall Wednesday.

It will be the first Symphony memorial concert ever given in honor of a man outside the world of music. The only earlier memorial concert honored Wilhelm Gericke, a former conductor, about 10 years ago. This concert will be broadcast locally by Station WEEI and will be carried to the Nation over networks of the National Broadcasting Company.

Beethoven's "Eroica" and an address by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, are listed on the program.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives paused for a moment in its business yesterday to honor the inventor's memory in silence. Rev Abbot Peterson of Brookline, House chaplain, mentioned the inventor's death in his opening prayer.

SYMPHONY TO MEMORY OF EDISON

~~Post Oct 23~~

Plays the "Eroica" With Public as Its Guests

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid yesterday their tribute to the late Thomas A. Edison. In times past the orchestra has more than once honored the memory of the departed, most frequently, of course, when they have been of the world of music. The conventional procedure has been to play at the beginning of one of the regular concerts appropriate solemn music, as, for example, the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

PUBLIC GUEST OF ORCHESTRA

Yesterday it was different. Not merely the Funeral March was played, but the entire Symphony. It was not a regular concert of the orchestra. No other music stood upon the programme. And the public, or as much of it as Symphony Hall would hold, was guest of the orchestra.

At 8:30 Wednesday morning the cards of admission were issued to any who chose to ask for them, and at the end of two hours no more were to be had. Yesterday's performance of Beethoven's Symphony, which was nationally broadcast, was scheduled for 4 o'clock. Ten minutes before the hour only a few balcony seats were available. By the time the second movement was reached only a scattered two or three remained unoccupied. To look over this audience was to observe many faces not commonly seen of a Friday or a Tuesday afternoon or of a Saturday or a Monday evening. No doubt yesterday many were hearing a great orchestra for the first time. Yet a more attentive, a more devotedly absorbed company is seldom seen in Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky had requested that there be no applause and, happily, this request was respected. After a brief interval, during which the announcer from the broadcasting station, WEEI, explained the nature and purpose of the concert, the conductor came upon the stage. The lights were lowered and, in obedience to a further request, orchestra and audience stood for a time in tribute to the dead. When the last chord had sounded, Dr. Koussevitzky kept the orchestra for a moment or two at attention. Then, as he laid down his baton, band and audience filed quietly from the hall.

Of the performance itself it is necessary only to say that noble music was nobly played.

~~Post Oct. 20~~

SYMPHONY TO PAY TRIBUTE TO EDISON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will pay their tribute to the memory of Thomas A. Edison at a public memorial concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The public will be admitted free of charge. Cards to the capacity of the auditorium will be presented at Symphony Hall, Wednesday morning, to those who apply.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 will be played. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, will make a brief introductory address. The performance will be broadcast to the nation through Station WEEI. It will last an hour.

~~Trans. Oct 19~~

Boston Symphony To Play in Memory

Koussevitzky to Lead Eroica Symphony for Edison on Thursday Afternoon

A memorial concert to Thomas A. Edison, will be given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon at four o'clock. Beethoven's Eroica Symphony will be the only piece on the program. Tickets for seats will be distributed gratis as long as they last, to those who apply at Symphony Hall on Wednesday.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PAYS EDISON HONOR

Eroica Played for Nation Over Two Radio Chains

~~Globe Oct 23~~

Tribute to Thomas A. Edison was paid yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock over the red and blue networks of the National Broadcasting Company in a program through WEEI, owned and operated by a company named after the inventor. The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall played Beethoven's Eroica, a composition which Edison always enjoyed.

Arthur F. Edes, WEEI program director, announced the program.

"When word of the great inventor's death reached Dr Serge Koussevitsky, the leader of the orchestra," said Mr Edes, "he suggested to the trustees that something be done to mark the passing of humanity's greatest benefactor in recent years, and with the permission of the trustees and the orchestra it was arranged to present Beethoven's Eroica Symphony in Symphony Hall, and to invite those music lovers who wished to pay tribute to him. Admission was free.

"It was then suggested that a greater audience be invited by means of radio and Station WEEI of Boston, the only station named after the inventor in the world, made arrangements for the broadcast with the National Broadcasting Company, and gave the tribute to the entire Nation.

"Dr Koussevitsky, an admirer of greatness, decided that Beethoven's Eroica Symphony was a fitting composition. It has been called 'The Funeral of a Hero.' In composing it, Beethoven had in mind the great Napoleon, who was the hero of the day and for whom the composer had great admiration."

At the conclusion of the announcement the 50-minute symphony was played.

Edison, Beethoven, and Koussevitzky

~~Trans. Oct. 23~~

THE death of Edison touched Dr. Koussevitzky's imagination. As it seemed to him, it was occasion for the Symphony Orchestra to enter the common life traversed by a common emotion. To the powers that be he suggested Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony as a memorial music to be twice played—first at Wellesley College last Wednesday in a concert in regular course; second in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under exceptional conditions. No other number was to precede or follow it. The public was to be admitted without money and without price. A moment of ritual silence, with lowered lights, should be all the ceremony. The powers agreed; the tickets to the last seat were distributed widely; a broadcasting station, WEEI, undertook to sound the Symphony over the land, even through fifty minutes.

None of these ventures by the Symphony Orchestra from its own into a larger, stranger world has been better arranged and accomplished. As they entered the hall, all comers received cards indicating the moment of ceremony, deprecating applause, suggesting departure, if necessary, between movements. They were printed and ruled in the same simple, unobtrusive black as were the cards of admittance. As four o'clock drew near, the audience nearly filled the concert-room. There were a few empty seats toward the back of the floor; more in the upper balcony. Evidently not all who asked had come; or, having taken a second ticket, found a waiting recipient.

Distinctly it was not the usual subscription audience at Symphony Hall. It was younger, more diversified, more akin to the listeners at the supplementary concerts of Monday evenings or Tuesday afternoons. It had come in its daily dress, to withdraw for an hour from the day's work or the day's pastime. It had come also to listen intently and for an occasion. Nowhere were those who make a habit of free entertainment to be readily discovered. It was an audience to gratify Dr. Koussevitzky's expectations, though probably it hardly noticed the vacant chair behind Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz, where the late Boris Kreinin had sat among the first violins as lately as last Saturday.

At the signal of the lights and at a gesture from the conductor this audience observed the moment of ceremony with quiet, unanimous, sincere propriety. It then listened, were the routine of reviewing in order, to as sonorous, as plastic, as variously eloquent performance of "The Eroica" as conductor and orchestra have ever accomplished. An exalted music flowed in vitalized motion through all its courses toward the appointed end. It sounded the pæan of one who had fought and wrought, rejoiced and attained. It testified to his virtue in the old Latin sense, and to our regret and remembering. An unmarred occasion, parting the daily round, stood fulfilled. H. T. P.

Ourselves and Others

Here in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra are playing today and tomorrow:

Symphony in C major, No. 34..........Mozar
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra.......Morri
(Pianist: the Composer)
Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben"........Straus

In the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Wellesley tomorrow evening Dr. Koussevitzky will substitute Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony—in memory of Edison—for Brahms's in E minor and for Handel's Concerto Grosso. The memorial performance of the "Eroica" at Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon will be broadcast—nationally.

Trans Oct. 20

---

week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give a concert Thursday at 4 p. m. in Symphony Hall in memory of Thomas A. Edison. Tickets may be obtained, without charge, tomorrow. ~~Monitor Oct 20~~

The Hollis Street Theater Asso-

MEMORIAL CONCERT

~~Herald Oct 20~~

Boston Symphony Tribute to Edison To Be Broadcast

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a memorial concert for Thomas A. Edison at Symphony hall from 4 to 5 Thursday afternoon.

Dr. Koussevitzky will give his services and the public will be admitted without charge. Beethoven's Eroica symphon will be played as a tribute to the great inventor.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot will make a brief introductory address. He is president of the board of trustees of the orchestra.

WEEI, the only broadcasting station with which the name of Edison is associated, will put the program on the air locally, and it will also go on the National Broadcasting Company's red and blue networks throughout the country. Arthur F. Edes will be at the microphone.

SYMPHONY IN EDISON HONOR

Free Admission Cards for Concert Tomorrow

~~Post Oct 21~~

Admission cards will be distributed today at Symphony Hall, free of charge, for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The cards of admission, although unreserved, correspond in number to the seats in Symphony Hall. They will be presented on request at the box office, beginning at 9 this morning, until all have been taken.

The concert will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, famous for the funeral march, which constitutes its slow movement. The concert will last for one hour, and will be broadcast to the entire nation through Station WEEI.

The distribution of admission cards, without money and without price, for the performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in memory of Edison, began at 8.30 this morning at Symphony Hall. At 10.30, the 2600 disposable places were exhausted. Station WEEI will broadcast from Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra, beginning at four o'clock tomorrow afternoon, and continuing through fifty minutes.

Trans Oct 21

~~Trans Oct 22~~

THOMAS A. EDISON'S last wish in music will be realized in a nationwide radio requiem for the great inventor today when his favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over WBZ and WEEI. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky has magnanimously donated his services, with the members of the orchestra, so that the public, who will be admitted free of charge, can hear Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. Judge Cabot, president of the board of trustees at Symphony Hall, will be heard in a brief introductory address. The program will run from 4 to 5 P. M.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

EDISON CONCERT TICKETS ALL OUT

Admission cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Edison Memorial Concert at 4 p. m. tomorrow were all distributed this morning by 10 o'clock. Although it will not be possible for any more to obtain access to the concert, the performance will be accessible over the air, since it will be broadcast over WEEI and a nation-wide chain. Mr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The orchestra of Boston is the only one in the country to honor the memory of Edison in this way.

~~Monitor Oct. 21~~

Post

AY, OCTOBER 24, 19

YOUTH AND MASTERS BY SYMPHONY

Morris' Piano Concerto, Mozart and Strauss Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The first piece of strictly contemporaneous music in three pairs of Symphony Concerts came yesterday in the Pianoforte Concerto of Harold Morris, played for the first time and with the composer as soloist.

SPIRITUAL BASIS FOR THEME

Mr. Morris was born in Texas 41 years ago; he has appeared as pianist in Jordan Hall but his name was unknown to the Symphony Concerts until yesterday. Like other composers of Southern extraction, John Powell for example, he has turned in this concerto and in other works to the music of the Negro for thematic material and suggestions. The Spiritual known as the Pilgrim Song bulks large in his Concerto. In the slow movement it forms the basis of the theme and variations, and the final statement of it here by the English horn, with piano and four violins accompanying, is one of the most felicitous touches in a work that seems on the whole episodic rather than well sustained.

Mr. Morris' is a concerto of moments. There are pages of fine rhythmic energy and large orchestral sonorities that sweep all before them. There are passages of pleasing richness. Possibly the nostalgic lyricism of the Spiritual colors the concerto over-much; certain it is that yesterday it seemed long and diffuse, neither sufficiently direct nor sufficiently cohesive, and without marked originality. The orchestral part is effectively made; the piano is treated idiomatically. Dr. Koussevitzky led a sympathetic performance, and Mr. Morris played his solo part brilliantly. He was cordially applauded.

Dr. Koussevitzky cannot be accused of malice towards a young composer whose work he is said to admire, but it was hardly kind of him to place this Concerto between Mozart's Symphony in C major, number 34, and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben." The Mozart of this Symphony of 1780 and the Strauss who wrote "A Hero's Life" at the fullness of his powers wrote each of them with superb assurance and certainty of touch, and in neither case could their music be mistaken for that of any other.

Indeed, the Mozart of this delightful little Symphony in C seems more truly himself than the composer of the E-flat major and "Jupiter" Symphonies who looked forward to the Beethoven that he might not become. For it Dr. Koussevitzky found yesterday the ideal voice. His orchestra played as a Mozart orchestra, calling to mind that Mozart orchestra par excellence, the Vienna Philharmonic.

The performance of Strauss' tone-poem is describable only in superlatives. It is a promising beginning to a Symphony season to have heard in the first three concerts in such masterly and glamorous performance three such mighty works as Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Mahler's Ninth and now "Ein Heldenleben."

[illegible] AVAILABLE TODAY FOR SYMPHONY MEMORIAL

Admission cards will be distributed today at Symphony Hall, free of charge, for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give in memory of Thomas A. Edison in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The cards of admission, although unreserved, correspond in number to the seats in Symphony Hall. They will be presented on request at the box office, beginning at 9 this morning, until all have been taken.

The concert will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, famous for the funeral march which constitutes its slow movement. The concert will last for one hour, and will be broadcast to the entire Nation through station WEEI, which bears Edison's name, and a national network.

Globe Oct 21

Memorial Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison on Thursday at 4 p. m., in Symphony Hall. Tickets, for which there will be no charge, may be obtained at Symphony Hall on Wednesday.

Monitor Oct 19

Harold Morris's Piano Concerto

Monitor Oct 24

Harold Morris's Piano Concerto was played for the first time anywhere at the third Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 23. The composer was at the piano. Thus Dr. Koussevitzky again manifested his hospitality to works by American composers; for Mr. Morris is a native of Texas and received his musical education entirely in the United States.

Although this concerto is only Mr. Morris's second composition for full orchestra, he has won a considerable reputation as a composer of chamber music. This latest work, which might be called the "Negro" Concerto, carries out the composer's theory that native song should be the basis of American music. For motto of the whole, he has used an African Negro drumbeat; a Negro spiritual, "Pilgrim's Song," is the theme of the slow movement, and the final Rondo freely employs rhythms and tonal effects which are associated with Negro music.

On a first hearing the concerto left a good impression. Structurally it is sound, consisting of a first movement in sonata form, an Andante made up of a theme with eight variations, and a concluding Rondo. The composer has said that he intends to represent the Negro in the first movement in his primitive condition, in the second as affected by civilization. To the listener the second movement seems to reflect chiefly the religious element of civilization, while the Finale appears to express some of its less restful aspects.

An encouraging feature of the work is its freedom from effects designed to shock the listener to attention. The less agreeable devices of the modernist are used sparingly, and evidently only for specific purposes. The composer proves that he is not fearful of melody by writing a pleasant tune for the second theme of his first movement. There is no attempt to overwhelm us by volume of sound; indeed, the author's experience with the composition of chamber music is reflected in his scoring, which is remarkably transparent, and often he is satisfied to use but a few instruments—as violin, English horn, piano—for considerable passages. The solo instrument is used for the most part in embellishment and is given few measures to itself. As a whole the work, if not strikingly original, is workmanlike and musicianly.

The concert opened with a meticulous performance of Mozart's Symphony in C major No. 34 (K. 338) and closed with a relation of Strauss's "Heldenleben," which could not by its eloquence conceal the tediousness of the tale. L. A. S.

SYMPHONY TO HONOR MEMORY OF EDISON

Concert Thursday to Go Over Radio to Nation

Globe Oct 20

Two memorial services here and others throughout the world were planned yesterday as science joined Governments in mourning the death of Thomas A. Edison.

The Edison Electric Illuminating Company of Boston announced that during the hour of the funeral service tomorrow a 15-minute memorial program, with organ music and singing [illegible] chorus of men employes, will [illegible] roadcast from the company's sta [illegible] WEEI. Substations and depart[illegible] of the company will receive the [illegible] m by radio. Pres Charles L. [illegible] of the company, Mrs Edgar and [illegible] son, Leavitt L. Edgar, will at[illegible] he funeral services at West Or[illegible] N J.

[illegible] hony Plans Concert

[illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra will [illegible] from tradition to present a [illegible] al concert in honor of Edison [illegible] hony Hall Thursday afternoon [illegible] to 5 o'clock. Dr Serge Kous[illegible] will conduct. Tickets will be [illegible] ee to applicants at Symphony [illegible] dnesday.

[illegible] be the first Symphony memo[illegible] cert ever given in honor of a [illegible] side the world of music. The [illegible] lier memorial concert honored [illegible] Gericke, a former conductor, [illegible] years ago. This concert will [illegible] cast locally by Station WEEI [illegible] be carried to the Nation over [illegible] of the National Broadcasting [illegible]

[illegible] ven's "Eroica" and an address [illegible] Frederick P. Cabot, presi[illegible] the board of trustees, are listed on the program.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives paused for a moment in its business yesterday to honor the inventor's memory in silence. Rev Abbot Peterson of Brookline, House chaplain, mentioned the inventor's death in his opening prayer.

SYMPHONY TO MEMORY OF EDISON

Post Oct 23

Plays the "Eroica" With Public as Its Guests

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid yesterday their tribute to the late Thomas A. Edison. In times past the orchestra has more than once honored the memory of the departed, most frequently, of course, when they have been of the world of music. The conventional procedure has been to play at the beginning of one of the regular concerts appropriate solemn music, as, for example, the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

PUBLIC GUEST OF ORCHESTRA

Yesterday it was different. Not merely the Funeral March was played, but the entire Symphony. It was not a regular concert of the orchestra. No other music stood upon the programme. And the public, or as much of it as Symphony Hall would hold, was guest of the orchestra.

At 8:30 Wednesday morning the cards of admission were issued to any who chose to ask for them, and at the end of two hours no more were to be had. Yesterday's performance of Beethoven's Symphony, which was nationally broadcast, was scheduled for 4 o'clock. Ten minutes before the hour only a few balcony seats were available. By the time the second movement was reached only a scattered two or three remained unoccupied. To look over this audience was to observe many faces not commonly seen of a Friday or a Tuesday afternoon or of a Saturday or a Monday evening. No doubt yesterday many were hearing a great orchestra for the first time. Yet a more attentive, a more devotedly absorbed company is seldom seen in Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky had requested that there be no applause and, happily, this request was respected. After a brief interval, during which the announcer from the broadcasting station, WEEI, explained the nature and purpose of the concert, the conductor came upon the stage. The lights were lowered and, in obedience to a further request, orchestra and audience stood for a time in tribute to the dead. When the last chord had sounded, Dr. Koussevitzky kept the orchestra for a moment or two at attention. Then, as he laid down his baton, band and audience filed quietly from the hall.

Of the performance itself it is necessary only to say that noble music was nobly played.

Post Oct. 20

SYMPHONY TO PAY TRIBUTE TO EDISON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will pay their tribute to the memory of Thomas A. Edison at a public memorial concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The public will be admitted free of charge. Cards to the capacity of the auditorium will be presented at Symphony Hall, Wednesday morning, to those who apply.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 will be played. Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, will make a brief introductory address. The performance will be broadcast to the nation through Station WEEI. It will last an hour.

Trans. Oct 19

Boston Symphony To Play in Memory

Koussevitzky to Lead Eroica Symphony for Edison on Thursday Afternoon

A memorial concert to Thomas A. Edison, will be given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon at four o'clock. Beethoven's Eroica Symphony will be the only piece on the program. Tickets for seats will be distributed gratis as long as they last, to those who apply at Symphony Hall on Wednesday.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PAYS EDISON HONOR

Eroica Played for Nation Over Two Radio Chains

Globe Oct 23

Tribute to Thomas A. Edison was paid yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock over the red and blue networks of the National Broadcasting Company in a program through WEEI, owned and operated by a company named after the inventor. The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall played Beethoven's Eroica, a composition which Edison always enjoyed.

Arthur F. Edes, WEEI program director, announced the program.

"When word of the great inventor's death reached Dr Serge Koussevitsky, the leader of the orchestra," said Mr Edes, "he suggested to the trustees that something be done to mark the passing of humanity's greatest benefactor in recent years, and with the permission of the trustees and the orchestra it was arranged to present Beethoven's Eroica Symphony in Symphony Hall, and to invite those music lovers who wished to pay tribute to him. Admission was free.

"It was then suggested that a greater audience be invited by means of radio and Station WEEI of Boston, the only station named after the inventor in the world, made arrangements for the broadcast with the National Broadcasting Company, and gave the tribute to the entire Nation.

"Dr Koussevitzky, an admirer of greatness, decided that Beethoven's Eroica Symphony was a fitting composition. It has been called 'The Funeral of a Hero.' In composing it, Beethoven had in mind the great Napoleon, who was the hero of the day and for whom the composer had great admiration."

At the conclusion of the announcement the 50-minute symphony was played.

Edison, Beethoven, and Koussevitzky

Trans. Oct. 23

THE death of Edison touched Dr. Koussevitzky's imagination. As it seemed to him, it was occasion for the Symphony Orchestra to enter, the common life traversed by a common emotion. To the powers that be he suggested Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony as a memorial music to be twice played—first at Wellesley College last Wednesday in a concert in regular course; second in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under exceptional conditions. No other number was to precede or follow it. The public was to be admitted without money and without price. A moment of ritual silence, with lowered lights, should be all the ceremony. The powers agreed; the tickets to the last seat were distributed widely; a broadcasting station, WEEI, undertook to sound the Symphony over the land, even through fifty minutes.

None of these ventures by the Symphony Orchestra from its own into a larger, stranger world has been better arranged and accomplished. As they entered the hall, all comers received cards indicating the moment of ceremony, deprecating applause, suggesting departure, if necessary, between movements. They were printed and ruled in the same simple, unobtrusive black as were the cards of admittance. As four o'clock drew near, the audience nearly filled the concert-room. There were a few empty seats toward the back of the floor; more in the upper balcony. Evidently not all who asked had come; or, having taken a second ticket, found a waiting recipient.

Distinctly it was not the usual subscription audience at Symphony Hall. It was younger, more diversified, more akin to the listeners at the supplementary concerts of Monday evenings or Tuesday afternoons. It had come in its daily dress, to withdraw for an hour from the day's work or the day's pastime. It had come also to listen intently and for an occasion. Nowhere were those who make a habit of free entertainment to be readily discovered. It was an audience to gratify Dr. Koussevitzky's expectations, though probably it hardly noticed the vacant chair behind Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz, where the late Boris Kreinin had sat among the first violins as lately as last Saturday.

At the signal of the lights and at a gesture from the conductor this audience observed the moment of ceremony with quiet, unanimous, sincere propriety. It then listened, were the routine of reviewing in order, to as sonorous, as plastic, as variously eloquent performance of "The Eroica" as conductor and orchestra have ever accomplished. An exalted music flowed in vitalized motion through all its courses toward the appointed end. It sounded the pæan of one who had fought and wrought, rejoiced and attained. It testified to his virtue in the old Latin sense, and to our regret and remembering. An unmarred occasion, parting the daily round, stood fulfilled. H. T. P.

Ourselves and Others

Here in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra are playing to day and tomorrow:

Symphony in C major, No. 34 .... Mozar
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra .... Morri
(Pianist: the Composer)
Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben" .... Straus

In the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Wellesley tomorrow evening Dr. Koussevitzky will substitute Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony—in memory of Edison—for Brahms's in E minor and for Handel's Concerto Grosso. The memorial performance of the "Eroica" at Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon will be broadcast—nationally.

Trans Oct. 20

week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give a concert Thursday at 4 p. m. in Symphony Hall in memory of Thomas A. Edison. Tickets may be obtained, without charge, tomorrow.

Monitor Oct 20

The Hollis Street Theater Asso-

MEMORIAL CONCERT

Herald Oct 20

Boston Symphony Tribute to Edison To Be Broadcast

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a memorial concert for Thomas A. Edison at Symphony hall from 4 to 5 Thursday afternoon.

Dr. Koussevitzky will give his services and the public will be admitted without charge. Beethoven's Eroica symphon will be played as a tribute to the great inventor.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot will make a brief introductory address. He is president of the board of trustees of the orchestra.

WEEI, the only broadcasting station with which the name of Edison is associated, will put the program on the air locally, and it will also go on the National Broadcasting Company's red and blue networks throughout the country. Arthur F. Edes will be at the microphone.

SYMPHONY IN EDISON HONOR

Free Admission Cards for Concert Tomorrow

Post Oct 21

Admission cards will be distributed today at Symphony Hall, free of charge, for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The cards of admission, although unreserved, correspond in number to the seats in Symphony Hall. They will be presented on request at the box office, beginning at 9 this morning, until all have been taken.

The concert will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, famous for the funeral march, which constitutes its slow movement. The concert will last for one hour, and will be broadcast to the entire nation through Station WEEI.

The distribution of admission cards, without money and without price, for the performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in memory of Edison, began at 8.30 this morning at Symphony Hall. At 10.30, the 2600 disposable places were exhausted. Station WEEI will broadcast from Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra, beginning at four o'clock tomorrow afternoon, and continuing through fifty minutes.

Tran Oct 21

Tran Oct 22

THOMAS A. EDISON'S last wish in music will be realized in a nationwide radio requiem for the great inventor today when his favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be heard over WBZ and WEEI. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky has magnanimously donated his services, with the members of the orchestra, so that the public, who will be admitted free of charge, can hear Beethoven's Eroica Symphony. Judge Cabot, president of the board of trustees at Symphony Hall, will be heard in a brief introductory address. The program will run from 4 to 5 P. M.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

EDISON CONCERT TICKETS ALL OUT

Admission cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Edison Memorial Concert at 4 p. m. tomorrow were all distributed this morning by 10 o'clock. Although it will not be possible for any more to obtain access to the concert, the performance will be accessible over the air, since it will be broadcast over WEEI and a nation-wide chain. Mr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The orchestra of Boston is the only one in the country to honor the memory of Edison in this way.

Oct. 21

Boston Daily Globe

FRIDAY, OCT 23, 1931

The Globe Man's Daily Story

A well-known woman painter of New York attended an exhibition of pictures. On her return home she was telling her brother, who goes in for sports and knows surprisingly little about art, what an enjoyable afternoon she had experienced.

"I met the nicest young man," she said. "He was a big, handsome blond, and he talked so intelligently about some of the pictures that I asked him if he was a painter himself, but he said he was not."

"What did the guy do?" asked her brother.

"I haven't the slightest idea," said the woman, "but I remember his name. It was Tunney."

WHY "EROICA"?

HAD you passed Symphony Hall Wednesday morning at 8:30 you would have seen a long queue of people waiting for tickets. People often wait there, but seldom so far ahead of the appointed hour, even though on this occasion the tickets were being given away free, for it was the occasion itself that was unusual. At 4 yesterday afternoon the orchestra was to play Beethoven's "Symphony Eroica" in memory of Thomas Edison. Being asked a few months ago what one piece of music he would choose to hear if told that he had but 24 hours to live, the inventor had replied that it would be this Heroic Symphony of Beethoven.

Why "heroic," wherefore "grand"? For the manuscript of its title-page bears, or bore, both terms. Its grandeur and its heroism were of a piece with the life of the man of science which has just ended, as they were instinct and compact of the tone poet who ended his on a March day of 1827 in dismal lodgings of the House of the Black Spaniard at Vienna. Scientist and musician, both wrought in electricity, both wielded a fiery fluid which all men obey and no man understands; both were magicians, wonder-workers; both were creators, explorers of the unseen world. The inventor's instinct did not deceive him. He knew his brother across the gulf of a century.

He knew his brother better than Beethoven at first knew his, for the composer had dedicated his work "to Buonaparte." Then hearing that Napoleon had crowned himself Emperor, he obliterated the dedication in a rage. Yet the dedication was never anything more than a symbol, for the Symphony is a hymn to heroes and hero-worship. The music speaks the universal language of great souls who stride across the ages.

Yes, but where found the musician such accents? In his own heart. Looking into that, he wrote what there he saw, and in so doing he spoke, like Shakespeare, for all mankind; for the greatness which he found in his bosom exists, in germ at least, in every heart, and when this music speaks, it is the beating of our own pulses that we hear.

Yet how came a cloistered musician to know these profound secrets of humanity? By what right did he speak of heroism? "Cloistered?" At the age when a child is just emerging into boyhood, this lad was required to be a man. The burden of a family rested on his shoulders. Boy he never was. A worthless father saw to that, blind instrument in the hands of destiny. Earning and learning at the same time, the youth painfully developed his powers. Then, just as they were maturing, he discovered that he was doomed to deafness. For all that he then knew his plight was precisely that of a master-painter condemned to blindness. In the Will which he wrote in this crisis, he addresses his two brothers.

Bring up your children to be virtuous. That alone can make them happy; money will not. I speak from experience. It is that which sustained me in misery. Virtue and Art alone saved me from taking my own life." And in a letter to his old friend, Dr Wegeler: "If I had not read somewhere that a man ought not to take his own life so long as he can still do a kind action, I should long ago have ended my existence, and doubtless by my own hand."

Then it is "de profundis"—out of these depths—that this soul creates a masterpiece. "Hell itself," as Laertes might have said, "he turns to splendor and to majesty." At Heiligenstadt, Autumn of 1802, in a big house belonging to a peasant outside the town, situated on an eminence from which the Danube and the plain can be seen, with the blue line of the Carpathians on the horizon, he is wrapped in the silence of the fields, for Dr Schmidt has counseled him to spare his hearing, and he would conceal his infirmity from men. He is alone with his demons—slighted love, hope, grief, despair. And in this October of the year and of his desolation, a late-blooming rose in an abandoned garden blossoms . . . the "Eroica"!

No one had ever dared write like that before; no one has ever been quite able to write like that since, not even Beethoven. Years later, when eight of his nine symphonies were composed, the poet Kuffner asked him which was his favorite.

"The 'Eroica,'" said Beethoven.

"So? I should have thought the C-Minor."

"No! No! the 'Eroica.'"

And small wonder, for it was the child who had cost him the most bitter pain, the sacred vessel into which he had poured the wine of his youth.

When written, his publishers rejected it; his critics read him a severe lecture, telling him to return to his earlier style; an auditor at its first performance offered another admission fee if the music would stop. It was long before the work was published and longer before it was understood.

The path of the innovator is thorny and the inventor has experienced it. Over the range lies virgin soil. All men know it lies there; few men dare claim it. Yet the peace and comfort of the established settlements depend upon the hardihood of its frontiersmen. In them is life ennobled. They sweat that we may feast.

Uncle Dudley.

SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON'S MEMORY

Great Audience Hears Orchestra Play Eroica—Hall Lights Dimmed

Herald Oct 23

A splendid tribute to the memory of Thomas Alva Edison was paid by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, when Beethoven's third symphony, the Eroica, was played at Symphony hall. The symphony was broadcast over the entire country through station WEEI and the Red and Blue network.

A capacity audience arose and stood in silence for one minute, while the lights in the hall were dimmed in memory of the great inventor. Then the symphony followed in all its solemn majesty. Applause was omitted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, in choosing the Eroica as a fitting musical memorial to a great man, was unaware that this symphony was Edison's favorite. "Had I but 24 hours to live," the inventor was quoted shortly before his death, "and could hear great music, I would choose the Eroica."

Beethoven wrote the music in 1803; it was first played in 1804. Called originally "Bonaparte," the composer, who was a radical at heart, changed the title when Napoleon became Emperor.

Tickets for "Edison Symphony" All Gone

Tickets for the free Boston Symphony Orchestra Edison Memorial concert tomorrow in Symphony Hall were all distributed today by 10 a. m. The concert will be broadcast through station WEEI.

BALANCES AND RECEIPTS

Washington, Oct. 21—Today's Treasury balance, $362,559,299. U. S. Customs receipts, $21,145,230.

Amer Oct 21

EDISON MEMORIAL CONCERT THURSDAY

Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Serge Kousssevitsky, will give a special Edison memorial concert. The program will conssist of Beethoven's Eroica symphony No. 3. Tickets will be distributed without charge and may be obtained any time Wednesday by applying at the hall.

Traveler Oct 19

ADMISSION FREE TO SYMPHONY HALL

Herald Oct 21

Admission cards will be distributed today at Symphony hall, free of charge, for the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YORK, PA.
GAZETTE DAILY
2 2 1931

TO HONOR EDISON TODAY ON RADIO

His Favorite Symphony To Be Broadcast By WEAF-WJZ At 4 P. M.

PREMIER LAVAL ON AIR

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor today.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 p. m. today.

A short time before his death Edison informed a magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL
OCT 21 1931

RADIO REQUIEM TOMORROW FOR THOMAS EDISON

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 o'clock.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Sergi Koussevitsky conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial. Arthur F. Edes will be the announcer.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composed struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM-TIMES
OCT 20 1931

and Harvey Firestone, Jr., gave a brief eulogy.

Future Features.

Edison tribute. Boston symphony orchestra is to give it Thursday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock, over the combined WEAF-WJZ networks.

Thrice daily. A new "short" feature to present Alice Joy as so-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
24 1931

Boston Orchestra Monday

Plays Under Direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—Don Cossack Chorus Sings Thursday.

MONDAY evening brings the famous Boston Symphony orchestra which will be heard in Elmwood Music hall, and which will give the first concert of the Buffalo Musical Foundation's Symphony series.

The Don Cossack Russian Male chorus will make its first appearance here Thursday evening, in Buffalo Consistory auditorium, coming in the Philharmonic Concert series.

Recitals by local musicians will be included in the week's musical activities.

* * *

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor, has chosen the following program for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Elmwood Music hall next Monday night, Oct. 26:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12
Largo-Allegro-Larghetto e Piano-Largo-Allegro
Handel
Prelude to Lohengrin
Wagner
Daphnis et Chloe, Ballet; Suite No. 2
Lever du jour-Pantomime-Danse Generale
Ravel
Intermission.
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
2. Andantino in modo di canzona
3. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato; Allegro
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco
Tschaikowsky

Handel enthusiasts particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic beauty.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of the tone painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." In sheer loveliness and grace, certain woodwind passages in Dawn and Pantomime of this suite, have, perhaps, been excelled by no other composer.

The principal offering of the program is Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. Its first and last movements are characterized by the imposing theme Fate, as stated by the brass choir. In the finale, the delightful folk melody, "In the Woods Stood a Birch Tree," is introduced. The melodious slow movement has also a suggestion of a folk song.

The other concerts in the Musical Foundation's group will be given by the Cleveland orchestra, under Sokoloff; the Detroit, with Gabrilowitsch, and the Chicago, with Frederick Stock.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
OCT 22

Boston Orchstra Memorial Concert In Honor Of Edison

Thomas A Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor this afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock over WEAF and WJZ.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
OCT 21 1931

Favorite Work of Great Inventor Will be Presented on Radio Tomorrow Afternoon.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 o'clock.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

The first movemen of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN
OCT 21 1931

RADIO SILENCE EDISON RITE TONIGHT

By J. CLARENCE MYERS

IN REVERENT SILENCE, radio stations from coast to coast will pay tribute to the departed Edison tonight.

The National Broadcasting Company will "sign off" at 6:58 o'clock and not return to the air until 7:01 p. m., except for a single announcement at 7 p. m. when the entire radio audience will be requested to turn out all lights for one minute in memory of the man who made them possible.

Another tribute to the great inventor will be given on the NBC chain tomorrow afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony."

The hour is 1 to 2 o'clock. Both KGO and KPO will release it.

Beethoven's compositions were Edison's favorites. The composer began "Eroica Symphony" in 1803 with the intention of dedicating it to Napoleon Bonaparte, but later destroyed the original dedication and inscribed on the title page of work: "To the memory of a great man."

When notified of Edison's death,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
OCT 22 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC set-up, starting at 4 o'clock.

Boston Daily Globe

FRIDAY, OCT 23, 1931

The Globe Man's Daily Story

A well-known woman painter of New York attended an exhibition of pictures. On her return home she was telling her brother, who goes in for sports and knows surprisingly little about art, what an enjoyable afternoon she had experienced.

"I met the nicest young man," she said. "He was a big, handsome blond, and he talked so intelligently about some of the pictures that I asked him if he was a painter himself, but he said he was not."

"What did the guy do?" asked her brother.

"I haven't the slightest idea," said the woman, "but I remember his name. It was Tunney."

WHY "EROICA"?

HAD you passed Symphony Hall Wednesday morning at 8:30 you would have seen a long queue of people waiting for tickets. People often wait there, but seldom so far ahead of the appointed hour, even though on this occasion the tickets were being given away free, for it was the occasion itself that was unusual. At 4 yesterday afternoon the orchestra was to play Beethoven's "Symphony Eroica" in memory of Thomas Edison. Being asked a few months ago what one piece of music he would choose to hear if told that he had but 24 hours to live, the inventor had replied that it would be this Heroic Symphony of Beethoven.

Why "heroic," wherefore "grand"? For the manuscript of its title-page bears, or bore, both terms. Its grandeur and its heroism were of a piece with the life of the man of science which has just ended, as they were instinct and compact of the tone poet who ended his on a March day of 1827 in dismal lodgings of the House of the Black Spaniard at Vienna. Scientist and musician, both wrought in electricity, both wielded a fiery fluid which all men obey and no man understands; both were magicians, wonder-workers; both were creators, explorers of the unseen world. The inventor's instinct did not deceive him. He knew his brother across the gulf of a century.

He knew his brother better than Beethoven at first knew his, for the composer had dedicated his work "to Buonaparte." Then hearing that Napoleon had crowned himself Emperor, he obliterated the dedication in a rage. Yet the dedication was never anything more than a symbol, for the Symphony is a hymn to heroes and hero-worship. The music speaks the universal language of great souls who stride across the ages.

Yes, but where found the musician such accents? In his own heart. Looking into that, he wrote what there he saw, and in so doing he spoke, like Shakespeare, for all mankind; for the greatness which he found in his bosom exists, in germ at least, in every heart, and when this music speaks, it is the beating of our own pulses that we hear.

Yet how came a cloistered musician to know these profound secrets of humanity? By what right did he speak of heroism? "Cloistered?" At the age when a child is just emerging into boyhood, this lad was required to be a man. The burden of a family rested on his shoulders. Boy he never was. A worthless father saw to that, blind instrument in the hands of destiny. Earning and learning at the same time, the youth painfully developed his powers. Then, just as they were maturing, he discovered that he was doomed to deafness. For all that he then knew his plight was precisely that of a master-painter condemned to blindness. In the Will which he wrote in this crisis, he addresses his two brothers.

Bring up your children to be virtuous. That alone can make them happy; money will not. I speak from experience. It is that which sustained me in misery. Virtue and Art alone saved me from taking my own life." And in a letter to his old friend, Dr Wegeler: "If I had not read somewhere that a man ought not to take his own life so long as he can still do a kind action, I should long ago have ended my existence, and doubtless by my own hand."

Then it is "de profundis"—out of these depths—that this soul creates a masterpiece. "Hell itself," as Laertes might have said, "he turns to splendor and to majesty." At Heiligenstadt. Autumn of 1802, in a big house belonging to a peasant outside the town, situated on an eminence from which the Danube and the plain can be seen, with the blue line of the Carpathians on the horizon, he is wrapped in the silence of the fields, for Dr Schmidt has counseled him to spare his hearing, and he would conceal his infirmity from men. He is alone with his demons—slighted love, hope, grief, despair. And in this October of the year and of his desolation, a late-blooming rose in an abandoned garden blossoms . . . the "Eroica"!

No one had ever dared write like that before; no one has ever been quite able to write like that since, not even Beethoven. Years later, when eight of his nine symphonies were composed, the poet Kuffner asked him which was his favorite.

"The 'Eroica,'" said Beethoven.

"So? I should have thought the C-Minor."

"No! No! the 'Eroica.'"

And small wonder, for it was the child who had cost him the most bitter pain, the sacred vessel into which he had poured the wine of his youth.

When written, his publishers rejected it; his critics read him a severe lecture, telling him to return to his earlier style; an auditor at its first performance offered another admission fee if the music would stop. It was long before the work was published and longer before it was understood.

The path of the innovator is thorny and the inventor has experienced it. Over the range lies virgin soil. All men know it lies there; few men dare claim it. Yet the peace and comfort of the established settlements depend upon the hardihood of its frontiersmen. In them is life ennobled. They sweat that we may feast.

Uncle Dudley.

SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON'S MEMORY

Great Audience Hears Orchestra Play Eroica—Hall Lights Dimmed

Herald Oct 23

A splendid tribute to the memory of Thomas Alva Edison was paid by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock, when Beethoven's third symphony, the Eroica, was played at Symphony hall. The symphony was broadcast over the entire country through station WEEI and the Red and Blue network.

A capacity audience arose and stood in silence for one minute, while the lights in the hall were dimmed in memory of the great inventor. Then the symphony followed in all its solemn majesty. Applause was omitted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, in choosing the Eroica as a fitting musical memorial to a great man, was unaware that this symphony was Edison's favorite. "Had I but 24 hours to live," the inventor was quoted shortly before his death, "and could hear great music, I would choose the Eroica."

Beethoven wrote the music in 1803; it was first played in 1804. Called originally "Bonaparte," the composer, who was a radical at heart, changed the title when Napoleon became Emperor.

Tickets for "Edison Symphony" All Gone

Tickets for the free Boston Symphony Orchestra Edison Memorial concert tomorrow in Symphony Hall were all distributed today by 10 a. m. The concert will be broadcast through station WEEI.

BALANCES AND RECEIPTS

Washington, Oct. 21—Today's Treasury balance, $362,559,299. U. S. Customs receipts, $21,145,230.

Amer Oct 21

EDISON MEMORIAL CONCERT THURSDAY

Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Serge Kousssevitsky, will give a special Edison memorial concert. The program will conssist of Beethoven's Eroica symphony No. 3. Tickets will be distributed without charge and may be obtained any time Wednesday by applying at the hall.

Traveler Oct 19

ADMISSION FREE TO SYMPHONY HALL

Admission cards will be distributed today at Symphony hall, free of charge, for the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YORK, PA.
GAZETTE DAILY
OCT 22 1931

TO HONOR EDISON TODAY ON RADIO

His Favorite Symphony To Be Broadcast By WEAF-WJZ At 4 P. M.

PREMIER LAVAL ON AIR

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor today.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 p. m. today.

A short time before his death Edison informed a magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL
OCT 21 1931

RADIO REQUIEM TOMORROW FOR THOMAS EDISON

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 o'clock.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Sergi Koussevitsky conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial. Arthur F. Edes will be the announcer.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composed struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM-TIMES
OCT 20 1931

... and Harvey Firestone, Jr., gave a brief eulogy,

Future Features.

Edison tribute. Boston symphony orchestra is to give it Thursday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock, over the combined WEAF-WJZ networks.

Thrice daily. A new "short" feature ... Alice Joy as so-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
... 1931

BELLOC'S A DRAMA

MONDAY evening brings the famous Boston Symphony orchestra which will be heard in Elmwood Music hall, and which will give the first concert of the Buffalo Musical Foundation's Symphony series.

The Don Cossack Russian Male chorus will make its first appearance here Thursday evening, in Buffalo Consistory auditorium, coming in the Philharmonic Concert series.

Recitals by local musicians will be included in the week's musical activities.

* * *

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor, has chosen the following program for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Elmwood Music hall next Monday night, Oct. 26:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12
Largo-Allegro-Larghetto e Piano-Largo-Allegro
Handel
Prelude to Lohengrin
Wagner
Daphnis et Chloe, Ballet; Suite No. 2
Lever du jour-Pantomime-Danse Generale
Ravel
Intermission.
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36
1. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima (In movimento di valse)
2. Andantino in modo di canzona
3. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato; Allegro
4. Finale; Allegro con fuoco
Tschaikowsky

Handel enthusiasts particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic beauty.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of the tone painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." In sheer loveliness and grace, certain woodwind passages in Dawn and Pantomime of this suite, have, perhaps, been excelled by no other composer.

The principal offering of the program is Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. Its first and last movements are characterized by the imposing theme Fate, as stated by the brass choir. In the finale, the delightful folk melody, "In the Woods Stood a Birch Tree," is introduced. The melodious slow movement has also a suggestion of a folk song.

The other concerts in the Musical Foundation's group will be given by the Cleveland orchestra, under Sokoloff; the Detroit, with Gabrilowitsch, and the Chicago, with Frederick Stock.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
OCT 22 1931

Boston Orchestra Memorial Concert In Honor Of Edison

Thomas A Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor this afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock over WEAF and WJZ.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
OCT 21 1931

Boston Symphony Will Broadcast Edison Memorial

Favorite Work of Great Inventor Will be Presented on Radio Tomorrow Afternoon.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 o'clock.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

The first movemen of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN
OCT 21 1931

RADIO SILENCE EDISON RITE TONIGHT

By J. CLARENCE MYERS

IN REVERENT SILENCE, radio stations from coast to coast will pay tribute to the departed Edison tonight.

The National Broadcasting Company will "sign off" at 6:58 o'clock and not return to the air until 7:01 p. m., except for a single announcement at 7 p. m. when the entire radio audience will be requested to turn out all lights for one minute in memory of the man who made them possible.

Another tribute to the great inventor will be given on the NBC chain tomorrow afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony."

The hour is 1 to 2 o'clock. Both KGO and KPO will release it.

Beethoven's compositions were Edison's favorites. The composer began "Eroica Symphony" in 1803 with the intention of dedicating it to Napoleon Bonaparte, but later destroyed the original dedication and inscribed on the title page of work: "To the memory of a great man."

When notified of Edison's death,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
OCT 22 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC set-up, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL

OCT 2 1 193

RADIO REQUIEM TOMORROW FOR THOMAS EDISON

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 o'clock.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Sergi Koussevitsky conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial. Arthur F. Edes will be the announcer.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composed struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

OCT 2 2 1931

MEMORIAL CONCERT TO HONOR EDISON

Inventor's Favorite Symphony to Be Broadcast Over NBC

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide requiem for the great inventor today. His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 p. m., E. S. T.

A short time before his death Edison informed a music magazine editor: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

OCT 2 2 1931

Around the Radio Clock

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor.
Time is eastern standard throughout.

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN

OCT 2 1 1931

ON THE AIR
by The Listener

"Eroica" As Edison Requiem—THOMAS A. EDISON is quoted as having said: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" Tomorrow the heroic symphony, dedicated "to the life of a great man," comprises a requiem to be broadcast over both N.B.C. networks by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven had in mind Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator, but when the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer deleted Bonaparte's name.

The first movement depicts the struggle of an heroic life; its second part, death and funeral march.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 2 2 1931

EDISON MEMORIAL SERVICE AT 4--WBZ

Inventor's Favorite Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica," Will Be Played and Judge Cabot Will Speak

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor this afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 p. m

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony hall in Boston, under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot will deliver the eulogy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press.

OCT 2 2 1931

EDISON'S FAVORITE MUSIC TO BE GIVEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard in 'Eroica' of Beethoven

New York, Oct. 21 — (AP) — Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

OCT 2 2 1931

MEMORIAL CONCERT TO HONOR EDISON

Inventor's Favorite Symphony to Be Broadcast Over NBC

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide requiem for the great inventor today. His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 p. m., E. S. T.

A short time before his death Edison informed a music magazine editor: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AKRON, OHIO
TIMES-PRESS

OCT 2

Honor

THOMAS EDISON, the gentle, kindly benefactor of mankind—whose labors brought light where previously there had been but darkness — whose death has left the whole world in sorrow—will be honored tonight thruout the nation by a minute of darkness, if suggestion of President Hoover is carried out.

On both NBC nets at 9:58 tonight, regular programs will stand aside for a three-minute tribute to the dead—at 10 announcers will ask listeners to extinguish lights for one minute, . . . will give the signal when that period is over. Columbia net probably will also carry out the same program.

Edison is also to be honored by an hour's broadcast starting at 4 Thursday afternoon over NBC, thru WTAM . . . Judge Frederick P. Cabot of Boston will pay tribute . . . the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's "Eroica" . . . several other programs have been and will be given in tribute to the dead inventor . . .

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
POST

OCT 2 2 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY EDISON'S FAVORITE MUSIC

Broadcast of Beethoven's "Eroica" Will Start on WEAF and WJZ at 4 O'Clock.

RADIO TO PICTURE LAVAL'S ARRIVAL

Goes on WEAF Some Time Between 9 and 10:30 — Congressman Britten To Speak — Many Evening Features.

(Time is Eastern Standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. — (AP) — Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday. The programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF and WJZ setup, starting at 4 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

OCT 2 2 1931

UNUSUAL HOUR GIVES EDISON'S CHOSEN MUSIC

By Evans E. Plummer,
Radio Editor Herald and Examiner.

Two networks of the National Broadcasting Company will pause today in their efforts to make America more sponsor-conscious, and at 3 this afternoon will broadcast an unique Edison memorial concert by the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall.

The unusualness of the concert lies in the fact that the music, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, was named by the deceased inventor in answer to a questionnaire submitted to him some years ago asking if he had but twenty-four hours to live, what selection would he prefer to hear.

Another sidelight of the composition, which will be played under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, is that it was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon whose struggles, death and funeral are musically depicted. But when Napoleon made himself dictator, it so enraged the composer that he struck Napoleon's name from it.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM SEATTLE, WASH.
POST-INTELLIGENCER

2 2 193

MEMORIAL TO EDISON ON AIR AT 1 O'CLOCK

Concert Will Feature Eroica Symphony; Big Grid Rally Is Scheduled Tomorrow Evening

An Edison memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast over both NBC networks between 1 and 2 this afternoon. Serge Koussevitsky, the director, has selected Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" for the musical tribute, which may be heard over KOMO or KJR.

At 11 tomorrow night KOMO's channel will be cleared for the biggest grid rally of the season. Glenn S. "Pop" Warner, wizard of Western football, will be there with representatives of Washington's Huskies and some of the finest musical talent in the Northwest, to stage a half-hour pre-game party.

Royal Brougham of the Post-Intelligencer will be master of ceremonies, and "Tiny" Burnett the musical maestro.

WESTERN HOUR

Playing numbers requested by fans on the occasion of NBC's 200th Western Symphony Hour, the entire San Francisco Symphony Orchestra will broadcast at 8:15 tonight over the KGO network, which includes KOMO, Seattle.

This will be NBC's 210th Symphony Hour, and the second of the 1931-32 series by the San Francisco orchestra.

When the 200th symphony went out on the evening air last August, auditors heard part of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and some of Tschaikowsky's best known works.

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY

Tonight's program includes the first movement of the "Unfinished Symphony," the "Scherzo" from "Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn, and Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker Suite." Issay Dobrowen will direct.

"How to Please Mrs. Shopper" will be revealed in a CBS broadcast at 8 this morning by Alice L. Edwards, executive secretary of the American Home Economics Association. She will speak under auspices of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

OCT 22 193

WOAI

In the language understood by everyone — music — the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this afternoon memorialize Thomas Alva Edison. This musical tribute will be carried over the entire NBC networks and will be heard in San Antonio territory through Station WOAI.

The spread of injurious insects during the current year will be discussed during the National Farm and Home Hour over WOAI at 11:30 o'clock this morning. Mrs. Rowena Schmidt Carpenter will conduct her Household Calendar period and a musical program will be supplied by Harry Kogen's Homesteaders playing the Pilgrims' Chorus from "Tannhauser." Jimmie Both will offer von Vecsey's "Valse Triste" as a saxophone solo.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TROY, NEW YORK
RECORD

TRIBUTE WILL BE PAID TO EDISON ON RADIO TOMORROW

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM IN HONOR OF DEAD GENIUS TO BE BROADCAST.

(TIME IS EASTERN STANDARD.)

New York, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

A new daily series with Alice Joy as soloist opens on WEAF-NBC October 26. It will be put on three times nightly except Sunday, at 7:30 for the East,, 11:30 for the Middlewest and 12:45 for the Far West.

THIS CLIPPING FROM IRONTON, O.
TRIBUNE

RADIO DAY by DAY

by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 — (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AMARILLO, TEX.
DAILY GLOBE

OCT 2 0 1931

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time is Central Standard throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

OCT 23 1931

28

MUSIC

Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica, to the Memory of a Great Man," as Played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Over a National Network, Is a Profoundly Impressive Memorial to Thomas A. Edison.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, master of masters in the realm of music, lifted his voice yesterday across a silence of 104 years to pay tribute to Thomas A. Edison, supreme master of masters in the realm of creative science. It was, in truth, the works of two geniuses, each rendering obeisance to the other; it was Beethoven's song, and Edison had a hand in the singing; for it was Beethoven's Third Symphony, the great "Eroica, to the Memory of a Great Man," played and broadcast over a national network including WDAF, The Star's radio station, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a profoundly impressive memorial to the great American who died last Sunday.

Perhaps Beethoven, like many another man of genius, felt a premonition. For it is remembered that when he first composed the Heroic Symphony, he dedicated it to Napoleon Bonaparte, who he, and most other young men, believed in 1804 was a great liberator and foe of tyranny. But on May 18 of that year, word came to Vienna, where Beethoven lived, that Napoleon had revealed at last his true colors and had caused himself to be made emperor. In a burst of rage, Beethoven seized the manuscript score of his great symphony, tore off the title page, scratched off the dedication, and with a few vicious thrusts of his pen, changed the dedication to his friend and patron, Prince Lobkowitz. But the title, which before had borne the name of the Corsican despot, he left free for just such uses as that to which it was put yesterday, and he wrote "Sinfonia eroica per festeggaire il sovvenire d' un gran uomo"—"Heroic symphony to celebrate the memory of a great man."

The memorial concert grew from modest proportions in Boston to a nation-wide event in a very few days. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston orchestra, planned a concert for yesterday afternoon at which only the Eroica should be played—that and nothing more, because, in reply to a questionnaire some months ago, Mr. Edison had said that if he had but twenty-four hours to live, and he were given his choice of music for a last hearing, he would choose Beethoven's Eroica. The concert was announced, and the National Broadcasting Company obtained permission to broadcast it. The audience in Symphony hall, Boston, stood as the conductor mounted the podium; it seated itself again, and the music began. That was all.

There is no need to describe the familiar music, nor the superb manner in which it was played. It would have pleased Edison, and delighted Beethoven—two great men who had a great deal more in common than their deafness.

C. H. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 22 1931

Radio Dial-Log

By JO RANSON

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Broadcast Edison's Favorite Music Today in Memorial Program—Richard Gordon in Two Roles Tonight—Other News

THE editor of a magazine devoted to the interests of music wrote to Thomas Edison several months ago, asking him what music he would chose to hear if he had but 24 hours to live.

His answer was: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'."

And so the Menlo Park wizard's last wish will be realized today when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play this number during a memorial concert to be broadcast from 4:00 to 5:00 o'clock over WEAF and WJZ.

The program dedicated to Edison will come directly from the Symphony Hall in Boston and the public gathered in the auditorium will join in the memorial proceedings. Arthur F. Edes will announce.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

OCT 2

RADIO PAYS TRIBUTE TO EDISON AND MATHER

Dorotha Beckloff to Sing Walter Logan's "Somewhere" During Pop Concert; Laboto on WGAR

By NORMAN SIEGEL
The Press Radio Editor

TO Thomas Edison, by whose gift of light this is written . . . and to Samuel Mather, who "cast" a kingdom of steel into a pattern of human helpfulness . . . radio pauses to pay tribute.

* * *

THE achievements of Mr. Edison will be extolled over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Co. between 4 and 5 Thursday afternoon . . . by Judge Frederick P. Cabot and th Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . Last night Harvey Firestone Jr., son of one of Mr. Edison's closest friends, praised the inventor on a program featuring music dear to Mr. Edison . . . including James Melton's rendition of the beautiful "Ave Maria."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
RECORD

2 1931

RADIO REQUIEM FOR TOM EDISON

Dead Inventor's Favorite Symphony "Eroica" To Be Heard Tomorrow.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 p. m.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 24 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series next Friday evening at Syria Mosque, has just completed a half century of concerts. During these years the orchestra has been under William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Dr. Karl Muck and Pierre Monteaux. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has added a new breadth of vision. He will lead the orchestra next Friday evening in the following program:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12............Handel
Two Nocturies ....Debussy
Nuages. Fetes.
La Valse, Choregraphic Poem......Ravel
Ein Heldenleben, Tone Poem Op. 40 ....Strauss

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

TRIBUTE TO EDISON WILL BE PAID BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

By Associated Press.

New York, Oct. 20.—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-N.B.C. from 3 to 4 p.m.

* * *

A new daily series with Alice Joy as soloist opens on WEAF-N.B.C. October 26. It will be put on three times nightly except Sunday, at 6:30 for the East, 10:30 for the Middle West and 11:45 for the Far West. Howard Claney is now introducing the B. A. Rolfe orchestra numbers on WEAF-N.B.C. in place of Edward Throgerson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TROY, N. Y.
EVE. RECORD

1931

PLAN TRIBUTE TO THOS. A. EDISON ON RADIO THURSDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Special Memorial Broadcast; Other Interesting Features.

(TIME IS EASTERN STANDARD.)

New York, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

A new daily series with Alice Joy as soloist opens on WEAF-NBC October 26. It will be put on three times nightly except Sunday, at 7:30 for the East,, 11:30 for the Middlewest and 12:45 for the Far West.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

OCT 20 1931

Nation-Wide Requiem For Thomas A. Edison Thursday Afternoon

A nation-wide requiem for Thomas A Edison with the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Edison's favorite symphony, "The Eroica", by Beethoven, will be heard Thursday from 4 to 5 p m, over combined networks of the NBC

A short time before his death Edison informed a musical magazine, "If I had but 24 hours to live and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'

The heroic symphony, originally dedicated by Beethoven, "to the life of a great man," Napoleon, whose name the composer later struck from the symphony, will be broadcast from Symphony Hall, Boston The public will be admitted to the memorial in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the orchestra. Judge Frederick P Cabot will speak

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

OCT 2

ORCHESTRA TO PLAY EDISON'S FAVORITE IN SPECIAL PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony will come to the air again, after an absence of many months, to honor the memory of Thomas Edison. The orchestra, one of the most noted symphonic organizations in the country, has been heard on several occasions over the air. Its last microphone appearance was on July 4, this year.

Tomorrow afternoon, from 4 to 5 o'clock, both NBC networks will be joined for a special broadcast. The orchestra will play Edison's favorite composition, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

A short time before his death, Edison, in answering a questionnaire, said:

> "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's Eroica."

The symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the directfon oi Sergei Koussevitzky.

In addition to the music there will be a talk by Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

The entire program will be heard in the New York area over WEAF and WJZ.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 21 1931

RADIO REQUIEM IN EDISON MEMORY

Nation-Wide Hook-Up to Carry Inventor's Favorite Symphony

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor on Thursday afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company, including WTAG, at 4 o'clock.

A short time before his death, Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony hall in Boston, under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven ,,to the life of a great man,'' will be broadcast direct from Symphony hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

RADIO WILL HONOR EDISON

Tribute to Great Inventor Over WEAF and WJZ Thursday

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

OCT 21 1931

Edison Tribute on WIBA Thursday

Boston Symphony in Special Performance at 3 p. m.

A special memorial program in tribute to Thomas A. Edison, will be broadcast over WIBA and an NBC network Thursday afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony orchestra directed by Koussevitsky will feature the broadcast with a special performance of "Eroica," by Beethoven. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will make the only remarks to be heard during the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
REPUB. JOURNAL

OCT 20 193

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time is Eastern Standard throughout).

New York, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT ? 1931

Boston Symphony Pays Tribute to Edison's Memory

BOSTON, Oct. 23—Dr. Koussevitzk and the Boston Symphony Orchestr paid yesterday their tribute to th late Thomas A. Edison. In time past the orchestra has more tha once honored the memory of the de parted, most frequently, of course when they have been of the world o music. The conventional procedur has been to play at the beginning o one of the regular concerts appropriate solemn music, as, for example, the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Yesterday it was different. Not merely the funeral march was played, but the entire symphony. It was not a regular concert of the orchestra. No other music stood upon the programme. And the public, or as much of it as Symphony Hall would hold, was guest of the orchestra.

At 8:30 Wednesday morning the cards of admission were issued to any who chose to ask for them, and at the end of two hours no more were to be had. Yesterday's performance of Beethoven's symphony, which was nationally broadcast, was scheduled for 4 o'clock. Ten minutes before the hour only a few balcony seats were available. By the time the second movement was reached only a scattered two or three remained unoccupied. To look over this audience was to observe many faces not commonly seen of a Friday or a Tuesday afternoon or of a Saturday or a Monday evening. No doubt yesterday many were hearing a great orchestra for the first time. Yet a more attentive, a more devotedly absorbed company is seldom seen in Symphony Hall

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JAMESTOWN. N. Y.
MORNING POST

OCT 22 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY EDISON'S FAVORITE MUSIC

Broadcast of Beethoven's "Eroica" Will Start on WEAF and WJZ at 4 O'Clock.

RADIO TO PICTURE LAVAL'S ARRIVAL

Goes on WEAF Some Time Between 9 and 10:30 — Congressman Britten To Speak — Many Evening Features.

(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday. The programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF and WJZ setup, starting at 4 P. M.

Arrangements have been completed to broadcast tomorrow the arrival in New York of Premier Pierre Laval of France. The description will be put on by WEAF some time between 9 and 10:30 A. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR

OCT 22 1931

LISTENING-IN

(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 21 1931

Radio Gossip

Edison Requiem Concert in Boston to Be Broadcast Tomorrow

BY ROCKY

Shortly before his death Thomas Alva Edison told a music critic:

"If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.' "

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide requiem for the great inventor over WJZ and WEAF networks from 4 to 5 p. m.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arthur F. Eades.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. Beethoven originally dedicated the number to Napoleon, but scratched Bonaparte's name from it when the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor.

WHAT'S ON THE AIR

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES STAR

Radio Gossip

Edison Requiem Concert in Boston to Be Broadcast Tomorrow

BY ROCKY

Shortly before his death Thomas Alva Edison told a music critic:

"If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.' "

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide requiem for the great inventor over WJZ and WEAF networks from 4 to 5 p. m.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arthur F. Eades.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. Beethoven originally dedicated the number to Napoleon, but scratched Bonaparte's name from it when the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HOUGHTON, MICH.
MINING GAZETTE

OCT 23 1931

Today's Radio Features

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)

(Time is Eastern Standard.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

OC

Radio Day By Day

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
Time is Eastern Standard throughout.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 24 1931

In tribute to the memory of Thomas Alva Edison, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 pieces under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky played Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony over combined networks Thursday afternoon.

Upon learning of the death of the great genius and inventor, Koussevitzky proposed to the trustees of the Boston Symphony a concert in tribute to Edison. The plan was accepted by the board and Koussevitzky chose the Third Symphony by Beethoven, due to the fact that shortly before he died Edison said that if he had 24 hours to live and could hear great music he would choose the "Eroica."

The complete work of three movements were played in the 50-minute concert. Before the work was performed the entire audience in Boston Symphony hall and members of the orchestra stood while the lights were dimmed for one minute. Arthur F. Edes, known as "EFA," announced the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 22 1931

EDISON TRIBUTE ON AIR WAVES

"Eroica," Favorite Of Inventor, to Be Played.

"Eroica," the symphony by Beethoven claimed as a favorite by the late Thomas A. Edison, will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon as a memorial to the great inventor. It will be heard here over KDKA from 4 to 5 o'clock, and the station's shortwave facilities, W8XK, will send it abroad for rebroadcasting.

Walter Hampton and Fay Bainter

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER

OCT 22 1931

FAVORITE MUSIC OF EDISON GOES ON RADIO TODAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Broadcast Beethoven's 'Eroica' This Afternoon

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time Is Eastern Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHILLICOTHE, O.
SCIOTO GAZETTE

OCT 20 1931

RADIO DAY BY DAY

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Th e program gram will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

OCT 22 19

RADIO TO HONOR EDISON'S MEMORY

Honoring the memory of the late Thomas A. Edison, a special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony" by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast over combined NBC coast-to-coast networks today between 1 and 2 p. m.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, will speak at the opening of the program, which will originate in Boston.

Beethoven, whose compositions were Edison's favorites, began the "Eroica Symphony" in 1803 with the intention of dedicating it to Napoleon Bonaparte. He later destroyed the original dedication and inscribed on the title page of the work "To the memory of a great man." The second of the four movements is a "Marcia Funebre."

This memorial concert will be released by KFSD.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 22 1931

To Broadcast Edison Aria

Boston Symphony to Honor Late Wizard Today.

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert this afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS

OCT 2 ? 1931

WHAT IS DOING ON AIR WAVES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Broadcast Tribute to Edison Thursday.

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor)

New York, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

OCT 22 19

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Time Is Eastern Standard Throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

(7) OCT 22 1931 29

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
EVE. RECORDER

OCT 20 1931

AIR TRIBUTE TO THOMAS EDISON

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Broadcast Tribute Over NBC Hookup.

(By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.)
(Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 20 1931

SPECIAL PROGRAM TO HONOR EDISON

TRIBUTE BY ORCHESTRA TO GO OVER AIR

NEW DAILY SERIES STARTED

Alice Joy Is Soloist in Program Opening Oct. 26—Eddie Cantor Gets a Raise.

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE

OCT 22 19

EDISON'S FAVORITE ON RADIO TODAY

Inventor's Choice of Symphony Will Be Played by Boston Orchestra.

New York, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC set-up, starting at 3 o'clock

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 2 3 1931

Boston Symphony Pays Tribute to Edison's Memory

BOSTON, Oct. 23—Dr. Koussevitzk and the Boston Symphony Orchestr paid yesterday their tribute to th late Thomas A. Edison. In time past the orchestra has more tha once honored the memory of the de parted, most frequently, of course when they have been of the world o music. The conventional procedur has been to play at the beginning o one of the regular concerts appropriate solemn music, as, for example, the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Yesterday it was different. Not merely the funeral march was played, but the entire symphony. It was not a regular concert of the orchestra. No other music stood upon the programme. And the public, or as much of it as Symphony Hall would hold, was guest of the orchestra.

At 8:30 Wednesday morning the cards of admission were issued to any who chose to ask for them, and at the end of two hours no more were to be had. Yesterday's performance of Beethoven's symphony, which was nationally broadcast, was scheduled for 4 o'clock. Ten minutes before the hour only a few balcony seats were available. By the time the second movement was reached only a scattered two or three remained unoccupied. To look over this audience was to observe many faces not commonly seen of a Friday or a Tuesday afternoon or of a Saturday or a Monday evening. No doubt yesterday many were hearing a great orchestra for the first time. Yet a more attentive, a more devotedly absorbed company is seldom seen in Symphony Hall

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JAMESTOWN. N. Y.
MORNING POST

Automotive
Auto Refinishing. Repairin
FOR BETTER automobile re
ing and machine work see
Work guaranteed. Claud C. S
bury, 16 12th St. Phone 72-52

BOST TO PLAY EDIS
FAVORITE MUSIC

Broadcast of Beethoven's "Eroica" Will Start on WEAF and WJZ at 4 O'Clock.

RADIO TO PICTURE LAVAL'S ARRIVAL

Goes on WEAF Some Time Between 9 and 10:30 — Congressman Britten To Speak — Many Evening Features.

(Time is Eastern Standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. — (AP) — Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday. The programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF and WJZ setup, starting at 4 P. M.

Arrangements have been com-

THIS CLIPPING FROM ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR

OCT 2 2 1931

LISTENING-IN

(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 2 1 1931

Radio Gossip

Edison Requiem Concert in Boston to Be Broadcast Tomorrow

BY ROCKY

Shortly before his death Thomas Alva Edison told a music critic:

"If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.' "

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide requiem for the great inventor over WJZ and WEAF networks from 4 to 5 p. m.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arthur F. Eades.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. Beethoven originally dedicated the number to Napoleon, but scratched Bonaparte's name from it when the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor.

WHAT'S ON THE AIR

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES STAR

1931

Radio Gossip

Edison Requiem Concert in Boston to Be Broadcast Tomorrow

BY ROCKY

Shortly before his death Thomas Alva Edison told a music critic:

"If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.' "

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide requiem for the great inventor over WJZ and WEAF networks from 4 to 5 p. m.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arthur F. Eades.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. Beethoven originally dedicated the number to Napoleon, but scratched Bonaparte's name from it when the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HOUGHTON, MICH.
MINING GAZETTE

OCT 2 2 [illegible]

Today's Radio Features

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)

(Time is Eastern Standard.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

OC

Radio Day By Day

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
Time is Eastern Standard throughout.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 2 4 1931

In tribute to the memory of Thomas Alva Edison, the Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 pieces under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky played Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony over combined networks Thursday afternoon.

Upon learning of the death of the great genius and inventor, Koussevitzky proposed to the trustees of the Boston Symphony a concert in tribute to Edison. The plan was accepted by the board and Koussevitzky chose the Third Symphony by Beethoven, due to the fact that shortly before he died Edison said that if he had 24 hours to live and could hear great music he would choose the "Eroica."

The complete work of three movements were played in the 50-minute concert. Before the work was performed the entire audience in Boston Symphony hall and members of the orchestra stood while the lights were dimmed for one minute. Arthur F. Edes, known as "EFA," announced the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 22 1931

EDISON TRIBUTE ON AIR WAVES

"Eroica," Favorite Of Inventor, to Be Played.

"Eroica," the symphony by Beethoven claimed as a favorite by the late Thomas A. Edison, will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon as a memorial to the great inventor. It will be heard here over KDKA from 4 to 5 o'clock, and the station's shortwave facilities, W8XK, will send it abroad for rebroadcasting.

Walter Hampton and Fay Bainter

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER

OCT 2 2 1931

FAVORITE MUSIC OF EDISON GOES ON RADIO TODAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Broadcast Beethoven's 'Eroica' This Afternoon

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time Is Eastern Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CHILLICOTHE, O.
SCIOTO GAZETTE

OCT 2 0 1931

RADIO DAY BY DAY

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Th e program gram will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

OCT 22 1931

RADIO TO HONOR EDISON'S MEMORY

Honoring the memory of the late Thomas A. Edison, a special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony" by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will be broadcast over combined NBC coast-to-coast networks today between 1 and 2 p. m.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, will speak at the opening of the program, which will originate in Boston.

Beethoven, whose compositions were Edison's favorites, began the "Eroica Symphony" in 1803 with the intention of dedicating it to Napoleon Bonaparte. He later destroyed the original dedication and inscribed on the title page of the work "To the memory of a great man." The second of the four movements is a "Marcia Funebre."

This memorial concert will be released by KFSD.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 22 1931

To Broadcast Edison Aria

Boston Symphony to Honor Late Wizard Today.

homas A. Edison's favorite aphony is to be played in a spec- radio concert this afternoon.

he program, originating from ton, will be presented by the on Symphony orchestra and t of the playing of "Eroica" ethoven. The network will be ombined WEAF-WJZ-NBC arting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS

OCT 2 0 1931

WHAT IS DOING ON AIR WAVES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Broadcast Tribute to Edison Thursday.

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor)

New York, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

OCT 22 193

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Time Is Eastern Standard Throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

29

(1) OCT 2 2 1931

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THI
AMSTERDAM, N. Y
EVE. RECORDER

OCT 2 0 1931

AIR TRIBUTE TO THOMAS EDISON

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Broadcast Tribute Over NBC Hookup.

(By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.)
(Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WATERTOWN, N. Y
TIMES

OCT 2 0 1931

SPECIAL PROGRAM TO HONOR EDISON

TRIBUTE BY ORCHESTRA TO GO OVER AIR

NEW DAILY SERIES STARTED

Alice Joy Is Soloist in Program Opening Oct. 26—Eddie Cantor Gets a Raise.

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over AF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE

OCT 22 19

EDISON'S FAVORITE ON RADIO TODA

Inventor's Choice of Symphony Will Be Played by Boston Orchestra.

New York, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Thomas A Edison's favorite symphony is to b played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Bosto Symphony orchestra and consists of th playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. Th network will be the combined WEAF WJZ-NBC set-up, starting at 3 o'cloc

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

OCT 18 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

OCT 18 1931

Boston Symphony, October 26th

According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, which ~~opens~~ the Buffalo Musical Foundation series here Monday, October 26th, there will be a greater musical season in America this winter than ever before. "Americans," he said on his arrival from Europe recently, "are a great musical race. They must have music to match their moods. Are they sad about their unemployment? Very well, then I will play them happy music, music that will make them think of other things, that will lift them away from business, music by our modern Americans, by Gershwin, by Copland. Ah, there are two young Americans who will go far. They feel the spirit of our day. They are experimental; they do not do always the expected, but the novel, and it is beautiful."

Koussevitzky, when he returned to Boston for the opening of the symphon orchestra's jubilee year, was given a tremendous ovation. Greeted by orchestra and audience who stood to welcome him, he was so inspired that the opening concert in Boston was hailed by critics as a new achievement in orchestral music. Every season ticket for both series to be given by the orchestra in Boston has been sold.

In Buffalo, interest in the orchestra increases. Subscribers to the series of four concerts, of which the Boston on Monday, October 26th is the first, have already taken more seats than for any previous series. The advance sale, for the series only, opens at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, Monday, October 19th.

Serge Koussevitzky became the conductor in 1924. The present season, therefore is the eighth of the Russian leader. This conductor has, by his fine command, his breadth of vision, his inspiring personality, lifted the orchestra to fresh wonders of virtuosity and beauty.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM STEUBENVILLE, O.
HERALD STAR

OCT 20 1931

RADIO TRIBUTE FOR EDISON ON AIR THURSDAY

Boston Symphony Or~~chestra Will~~ Dedicate Program to Inventor

PROGRAMS TODAY

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

OCT 22 1931

Boston Orchstra Memorial Concert In Honor Of Edison

Thomas A Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor this afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock over WEAF and WJZ.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

[illegible]

Organization of Symphony Began in 1881

A retrospect of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50 years tells a clear story of its past and present eminence in the world of music. In 1881, the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston an orchestra of European standards—a phenomenon then unknown in America. The idea had come to him as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world.

He engaged the finest musicians in Europe, and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. To the conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

The full chronology of the conductors follows:

George Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Wilhelm Gericke, 1898-1906; Karl Muck, 1906-1908; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henri Raubaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924 and Serge Koussevitzky, 1924.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

OCT 21 1931

TRIBUTE is to be paid Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow ~~afternoon~~ at 4 o'clock over an N. B. C. network... A new daily series, with Alice Joy as soloist, opens on N. B. C. ~~October~~ 26... Howard Clancy is now introducing the B. A. Rolfe Orchestra numbers on N. B. C. in place of Edward Thorgerson... The radio frequency pentode tube, introduced for the first time more than a year ago, but not generally accepted by the radio industry, is to make its appearance again in improved form.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MEMPHIS, TENN.
Commercial Appeal

OCT 22 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HONOR EDISON

Famous Musical Organization to Present Special Performance During Service.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Koussevitsky, will be heard through ~~WMC, The~~ Commercial Appeal and The Memphis Evening Appeal radio station, at 3 p.m., today, in a special performance of "Eroica," by Beethoven, as a memorial to Thomas A. Edison. Judge Frederick Cabot will speak at the opening program. The National Broadcasting Company and its associated stations take this way of paying tribute to the man, who more than any other, has made it easier, and more pleasant for man to live. The electric industries, including the great field of radio, owe a tremendous debt to the "Wizard of Menlo Park." WMC, an NBC associate, welcomes the opportunity to be able to join in these memorial services to a great man who at one time was a citizen of Memphis.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

[illegible] 1931

EDISON MEMORIAL SERVICE AT 4--WBZ

Inventor's Favorite Symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica," Will Be Played and Judge Cabot Will Speak

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor this afternoon.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 p. m

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony hall in Boston, under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor. The public ~~will be admitted~~ to participate in the memorial.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second part portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself emperor, the outraged composer struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot will deliver the eulogy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
PITTSFIELD, MAS
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 20 1931

RADIO WILL HONOR EDISON

Tribute to Great Inventor Over WEAF and WJZ Thursday

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 20 1931

SPECIAL PROGRAM TO HONOR EDISON

TRIBUTE BY ORCHESTRA TO GO OVER AIR

NEW DAILY SERIES STARTED

Alice Joy Is Soloist in Program Opening Oct. 26—Eddie Cantor Gets a Raise.

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FORT SMITH, ARK.
SOUTHWEST AMERICAN

OCT 22 1931

Thursday's Radio

223.S—KFPW—1340
The Voice of Fort Smith
Hours on air—7 a.m., to 2 p. m.—4 p.m., to 7:15 p. m.

Special Features
7:15-7:30 a. m.—Devotional service.
12:00—Press, police and weather bulletin, road information.
4:00p.m.—United States government farm bulletins.
6:15 p. m.—Press, police and weather bulletins.

(Time Is Central Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21.-(AP)-Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

9

OCT 20 1931

RADIO

DAY by DAY

by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

New York, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAZLETON, PA.
STANDARD-SENTINEL

OCT 23 1931

Orchestra Honors Edison

BOSTON, Oct. 22. (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall.

The performance was broadcast over a nation-wide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethovern's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

20 1931

Radio Broadcast To Honor Edison

Special Program by Boston Symphony Orchestra Scheduled Over NBC Thursday

TRIBUTE is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILKES BARRE, PA.
RECORD

OCT 22 1931

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21 (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of Eroica, ~~by Beethoven~~. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS

THOMAS A. EDISON'S last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor this evening.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 P. M. Locally it will be heard over WFBR and WBAL.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine:

"If I had but 24 hours to live and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

OCT 2 1931

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Time Is Eastern Standard Throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT SMITH, ARK.
TIMES-RECORD

(Time is Central Standard Throughout)
New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 22 1931

BROADCAST'S BEST BETS

(Eastern Standard Time)
Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert today. The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 23 1931

RADIO NOTES

Dr. Howard Harold Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, composer of two symphonic poems and numerous piano works, will direct the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra during a special broadcast to Germany on Friday, October 23 over an NBC-WJZ network from 3.30 to 4.00 p.m.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor on Thursday, October 22.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4.00 to 5.00 p.m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

3

OCT 20 1931

RADIO FEATURES

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 23 1931

Boston Symphony Pays Tribute to Edison's Memory

BOSTON, Oct. 23—Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid yesterday their tribute to the late Thomas A. Edison. In times past the orchestra has more than once honored the memory of the departed, most frequently, of course, when they have been of the world of music. The conventional procedure has been to play at the beginning of one of the regular concerts appropriate solemn music, as, for example, the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Yesterday it was different. Not merely the funeral march was played, but the entire symphony. It was not a regular concert of the orchestra. No other music stood upon the programme. And the public, or as much of it as Symphony Hall would hold, was guest of the orchestra.

At 8:30 Wednesday morning the cards of admission were issued to any who chose to ask for them, and at the end of two hours no more were to be had. Yesterday's performance of Beethoven's symphony, which was nationally broadcast, was scheduled for 4 o'clock. Ten minutes before the hour only a few balcony seats were available. By the time the second movement was reached only a scattered two or three remained unoccupied. To look over this audience was to observe many faces not commonly seen of a Friday or a Tuesday afternoon or of a Saturday or a Monday evening. No doubt yesterday many were hearing a great orchestra for the first time. Yet a more attentive, a more devotedly absorbed company is seldom seen in Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER

Today's Radio

Play Edison Symphony Broadcast Laval Arrival
Secretary Doak to Speak
Farm and Home Program

(Eastern Standard Time)
New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and ~~consists of the~~ playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CANTON, O.
REPOSITORY

11

OCT 20 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO THOMAS EDISON

Orchestra Will Broadcast Special Program Thursday Afternoon.

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
AKRON, O.
TIMES-PRESS

OCT 22 1931

* * *

Favorite

WHEN the Boston Symphony orchestra plays Beethoven's 'Eroica" this afternoon on the special Edison program of NBC thru WTAM, they will be presenting the symphony he loved best. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." The first movement in the work depicts the struggle and nobility of a heroic life, its second portrays death and the funeral march.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE

OCT 22 1931

Around the Radio Clock

Time is Eastern Standard throughout.

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIAMI, OKLA.
NEWS RECORD

(Time Is Central Standard)
NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER-DISPATCH

OCT 20 1931

Tapping the Air With The Radio Editor

And Associated Press

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 22 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison in Symphony Hall, Boston, this afternoon. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will be played as a tribute. The performance will be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

1931

IN answer to a question put by a music magazine, Thomas Alva Edison recently replied that if he had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, he would choose Beethoven's "Eroica." . . . The heroic symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony during a program in honor of Mr. Edison over WTAM and WGAR at 4 tomorrow afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UNIONTOWN, PA.
NEWS STANDARD

OCT 22 1931

"Erocia," the symphony by Beethoven, claimed as a favorite by the late Thomas A. Edison, will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra late this afternoon as a memorial to the great inventor. It is being heard over Station KDKA between 4 and 5

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

OCT 20 1931

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YOUNGSTOWN, O.
TELEGRAM

OCT 21 1931

* * *

AN Edison memorial program is scheduled for both the Red and Blue networks Thursday from 4 to 5. The Boston Symphony, directed by Koussevitsky, will present a special performance of Eroica symphony. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will deliver the euology. WTAM is scheduled to carry the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BURLINGTON, VT.
News

OCT 20 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

OCT 21 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor to-morrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of NBC from 4:00 to 5:00 o'clock in the afternoon.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL

OCT 20 1931

Another radio tribute will be paid Edison Thursday when the Boston Symphony orchestra offers a special broadcast over NBC-WJZ network. Time for the program is 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
RECORD

OCT 21 1931

RADIO REQUIEM FOR TOM EDISON

Dead Inventor's Favorite Symphony "Eroica" To Be Heard Tomorrow.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 p. m.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

20 193

Radio Broadcast To Honor Edison

Special Program by Boston Symphony Orchestra Scheduled Over NBC Thursday

TRIBUTE [illegible] be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over [illegible]-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILKES BARRE, PA.
RECORD

OCT 22 1931

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21 (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of Eroica, ~~by Beethoven~~. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BALTIMORE, MD
NEWS

THOMAS A. EDISON'S last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor this evening.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be ~~heard over~~ combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 P. M. Locally it will be heard over WFBR and WBAL.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine:

"If I had but 24 hours to live and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

OCT 2 31

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from ~~Boston~~, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

complet-

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT SMITH, ARK.
TIMES-RECORD

(Time is Central Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 22 1931

BROADCAST'S BEST BETS

(Eastern Standard Time)

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert today. The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

complet-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 23 1931

RADIO NOTES

Dr. Howard Harold Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music, composer of two symphonic poems and numerous piano works, will direct the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra during a special broadcast to Germany on Friday, October 23 over an NBC-WJZ network from 3.30 to 4.00 p.m.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor on Thursday, October 22.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4.00 to 5.00 p.m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

③

OCT 20 1931

RADIO FEATURES

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 23 1931

Boston Symphony Pays Tribute to Edison's Memory

BOSTON, Oct. 23—Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid yesterday their tribute to the late Thomas A. Edison. In times past the orchestra has more than once honored the memory of the departed, most frequently, of course, when they have been of the world of music. The conventional procedure has been to play at the beginning of one of the regular concerts appropriate solemn music, as, for example, the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Yesterday it was different. Not merely the funeral march was played, but the entire symphony. It was not a regular concert of the orchestra. No other music stood upon the programme. And the public, or as much of it as Symphony Hall would hold, was guest of the orchestra.

At 8:30 Wednesday morning the cards of admission were issued to any who chose to ask for them, and at the end of two hours no more were to be had. Yesterday's performance of Beethoven's symphony, which was nationally broadcast, was scheduled for 4 o'clock. Ten minutes before the hour only a few balcony seats were available. By the time the second movement was reached only a scattered two or three remained unoccupied. To look over this audience was to observe many faces not commonly seen of a Friday or a Tuesday afternoon or of a Saturday or a Monday evening. No doubt yesterday many were hearing a great orchestra for the first time. Yet a more attentive, a more devotedly absorbed company is seldom seen in Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER

Today's Radio

Play Edison Symphony Broadcast Laval Arrival Secretary Doak to Speak Farm and Home Program

(Eastern Standard Time)

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and ~~consists of the~~ playing of 'Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

Arrangements have been com-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CANTON, O.
REPOSITORY

⑪

OCT 20 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO THOMAS EDISON

Orchestra Will Broadcast Special Program Thursday Afternoon.

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
AKRON, O.
TIMES-PRESS

OCT 22 1931

* * *

Favorite

WHEN the Boston Symphony orchestra plays ~~Beethoven's~~ 'Eroica" this afternoon on the special Edison program of NBC thru WTAM, they will be presenting the symphony he loved best. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." The first movement in the work depicts the struggle and nobility of a heroic life, its second portrays death and the funeral march.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE

OCT 22 1931

Around the Radio Clock

Eastern Standard throughout.

York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIAMI, OKLA.
NEWS RECORD

(Time Is Central Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER-DISPATCH

OCT 20 1931

Tapping the Air With The Radio Editor

And Associated Press

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

22 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give a ~~special~~ concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison in Symphony Hall, Boston, this afternoon. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will be played as a tribute. The performance will be broadcast over a nation-wide hookup.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, O.
PRESS

1931

IN answer to a question put by a music magazine, Thomas Alva Edison recently replied that if he had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, he would choose Beethoven's "Eroica." . . . The heroic symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony during a program in honor of Mr. Edison over WTAM and WGAR at 4 tomorrow afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UNIONTOWN, PA.
NEWS STANDARD

OCT 22 1931

"Erocia," the symphony by Beethoven, claimed as a favorite by the late Thomas A. Edison, will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra late ~~this afternoon as a~~ memorial to the great inventor. It is being heard over Station KDKA between 4 and 5

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

OCT 20 1931

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YOUNGSTOWN, O.
TELEGRAM

OCT 21 1931

* * *

AN Edison memorial program is scheduled for both the Red and Blue networks Thursday from 4 to 5. The Boston Symphony, directed by Koussevitsky, will present a special performance of Eroica symphony. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will deliver the euology. WTAM is scheduled to carry the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BURLINGTON, VT.
News

OCT 20 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

OCT 21 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor to-morrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of NBC from 4:00 to 5:00 o'clock in the afternoon.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL

OCT 20 1931

Another radio tribute will be paid Edison Thursday when the Boston Symphony orchestra offers a special broadcast over NBC-WJZ network. Time for the program is 4 to 5 p. m.

We have been requested to call

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
RECORD

OCT 21 1931

RADIO REQUIEM FOR TOM EDISON

Dead Inventor's Favorite Symphony "Eroica" To Be Heard Tomorrow.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the ~~Boston~~ Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting company from 4 to 5 p. m.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

37

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 2 0 1931

EDISON MEMORIAL ON WTAG PROGRAM

Inventor's Musical Preference Will Feature Thursday Afternoon Program

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor, Thursday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, when "Eroica," Beethoven's heroic symphony, will be broadcast over WTAG and a dual NBC network.

The memorial concert will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Responding to a questionnaire sent several distinguished Americans by Etude, musical magazine, the great inventor, a short time before his death, wrote "if I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'."

The one-hour requiem will be broadcast from Symphony hall, Boston, directed by Serge Koussevitsky. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

Judge Frederick P. Cabot will speak at the opening of the program.

The first movement of the symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life. The second part translates the death and funeral march.

The composer originally dedicated his work to Napoleon, whom he regarded as the liberator of Europe. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself emperor, the outraged Beethoven struck Bonaparte's name from the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

OCT 2 3 1931

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES EDISON PROGRAM

Boston, Oct. 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall.

The performance was broadcast over a nation-wide network.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OWENSBORO, KY.
MESSENGER

OCT 2 2 1931

Around The Radio Clock

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Sports Editor
(Time is Central Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21. (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3:00 o'clock.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM TAUNTON, MASS.
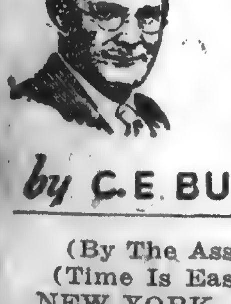
GAZETTE

OCT 2 1931

RADIO DAY by DAY



by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

(By The Associated Press.)
(Time Is Eastern Standard.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AKRON, OHIO
TIMES-PRESS

OCT 22 1931

Favorite

WHEN the Boston Symphony orchestra plays Beethoven's 'Eroica" this afternoon on the special Edison program of NBC thru WTAM, they will be presenting the symphony he loved best. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." The first movement in the work depicts the struggle and nobility of a heroic life, its second portrays death and the funeral march.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

2 0 1931

By C. E. Butterfield
Associated Press Radio Editor
Time Is Eastern Stand. Throughtout

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SAN ANGELO, TEX
STANDARD

OCT 2 0 1931

Edison'Tribute To Be Paid In Radio Broadcast

(San Angelo time throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
HERALD

OCT 2 2 1931

(Associated Press Radio Editor)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

OCT 20 1931

Radio Day By Day

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
Time is Eastern Standard throughout.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BEDFORD, MAS
STANDARD

OCT 23 1931

Symphony Honors Edison.

Boston, Oct. 23 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Thursday honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony hall. The tickets, distributed free at Symphony hall earlier in the day, were all taken in an hour and a half.

Cancer takes a toll of more than 100,000 lives in the United States each year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL

OCT 2 0 1931

RADIO DAY by DAY

by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEAUMONT, TEX.
ENTERPRISE

Today's Radio Programs

(Eastern Standard Time)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

RADIO FEATURES

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MOBILE, ALA.
ITEM

OCT 2 2 193

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time Is Eastern Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

Arrangements have been com-

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

OCT 21 1931

Here and There On the Air

BY RAYMOND WATSON.

The climax of all Thomas A. Edison memorial programs will take place tomorrow afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock over a large NBC network. This radio monument will be raised on the day following interment, with the musical portion of the broadcast by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Koussevitsky. WIBO, WCFL and WLS-WENR are local outlets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE

OCT 2 2 1931

Around the Radio Clock

Time is Eastern Standard throughout.

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DENVER, COLO.
Rocky Mountain News

OCT

BROADCAST TO HONOR MEMORY OF EDISON

Program Will Be Heard Over Station KOA This Afternoon

A memorial broadcast in honor of Thomas A. Edison will be sent over the NBC networks, including KOA, from 2 to 3 p. m. today.

The program will be broadcast by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under ~~direction of~~ Conductor Kousszitsky. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will speak.

In memory of the inventor, two "silent" periods were observed over the chain yesterday. One at 1 p. m. was of two minutes' duration and the second, at 7:58 p. m., lasted three minutes.

Listeners were asked to take part in the tribute during the last minute by turning off the electric lights, which were made possible thru the inventor's genius.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TROY, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 2

New York, Oct. 20 (AP)—A radio tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

Arrangement Completed for Radio Description of Premier Laval's Arrival.

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Erocia," by Beethoven. The network will be combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

Arrangements have been completed to broadcast the arrival of Premier Pierre Laval, of France, when he arrives in New York tomorrow morning en route to Washington for conferences with President Hoover. The description will be put on by WEAF-NBC some time between 9 and 10:30

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER

OCT 2 2 1931

Radio Program Features Today

(Central Standard Time Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOLLYWOOD, CALIF.
CITIZEN

OCT 21 1931

* * *

In honor of the memory of Thomas A. Edison, the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky is giving a special performance of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" tomorrow. The program will be released by both KFI and KECA at 1 o'clock. The Symphony, composed in 1803, was dedicated "To the Memory of a Great Man." The second and movements is a "Marcia

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

Radio Day by Day

New York, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

Tonight:

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS OBSERVER

OCT 2 2 1931

Time is Eastern Standard Throughout.

New York, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroice" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

Arrangements have been completed to broadcast the arrival of Premier Pierre Laval of France, in New York tomorrow morning en route to Washington for conferences with President Hoover. The description will be put on by WEAF-NBC some time between 9 and 10.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FINDLAY, O.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 2

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
ASSOCIATED PRESS RADIO EDITOR

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert this afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4:00 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PINE BLUFF, ARK.
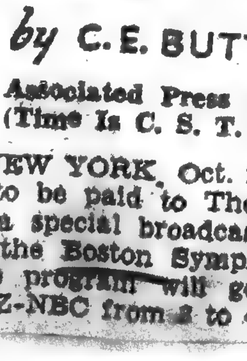
COMMERCIAL

RADIO DAY by DAY



by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time Is C. S. T. Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

33

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
MORNING POST

OCT 22 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY EDISON'S FAVORITE MUSIC

Broadcast of Beethoven's "Eroica" Will Start on WEAF and WJZ at 4 O'Clock.

RADIO TO PICTURE LAVAL'S ARRIVAL

Goes on WEAF Some Time Between 9 and 10:30 — Congressman Britten To Speak — Many Evening Features.

(Time is Eastern Standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—(P)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday. The programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF and WJZ setup, starting at 4 P. M.

Arrangements have been completed to broadcast tomorrow the arrival in New York of Premier Pierre Laval of France. The description will be put on by WEAF some time between 9 and 10:30 A. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OSHKOSH, WIS.
DAILY NORTHWESTERN

OCT 20 1931

ON AIRWAYS TONIGHT

(By C. E. Butterfield, Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time is eastern standard)

New York—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchetra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-N. B. C.. from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD

OCT 2 1931

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon. The program, originating from Boston will be presented by the Boston symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

RADIO DAY by DAY

by C. E BUTTERFIELD

(Associated Press Radio Editor.)

New York, Oct. 20.—(P)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

OCT 23 1931

Orchestra Honors Edison.

BOSTON, Oct. 22—(P)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

dison Loved tworks Today

Boston Orchestra To Play Beethoven's 'Eroica;' Premier Laval's Arrival in New York Will Also Be Broadcast

Associated Press

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to [illegible] played in a special radio conc[illegible] this afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

Arrangements have been completed to broadcast the arrival of Premier Pierre Laval of France when he arrives in New York this morning enroute to Washington for conferences with President Hoover.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
NEWS

PICK OF AIR TONITE AND TOMORROW

Time given is Central Standard

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press.

OCT 23 1931

BOSTON CONCERT GIVEN IN MEMORY OF EDISON

Boston, Oct. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussvitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall.

The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by station WEEI the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

OCT 22 193

By TED R. LIUZZA

A PROGRAM memorializing Thomas A. Edison and other outstanding network releases will occupy the radio spotlight this afternoon and tonight. New Orleans talent will be heard in two of the chain offerings.

The memory of Thomas Alva Edison will be honored in a special broadcast by the Boston Symphony orchestra at 3, NBC to WSMB. Beethoven's "Eroica" will be rendered under the direction of Koushevitsky, noted conductor. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will speak.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

OCT 22 1931

(Associated Press Radio Editor)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. (P)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL

OCT 20 1931

BEFORE THE MIKE

New York, Oct. 20. (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF, WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER

(Central Standard Time Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup starting at 3 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 22 1931

The air waves will sing a requiem to Thomas Alva Edison as the majestic measures of Beethoven's "Eroica" played by the Boston Symphony orchestra over WBEN and the combined NBC networks, reach a saddened people between 4 and 5 P. M. Edison said a short while before he died, "If I had but 24 hours to live and could hear great music, I would choose 'Eroica.'" It is a fitting memorial.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NILES, MICH.
DAILY STAR

OCT 20 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(P)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (P)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

OCT 22 1931

AROUND THE RADIO CLOCK

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

New York, Oct. 21 (P).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 20 1931

Edison to Have Tribute Paid To Him on Thursday

Boston Symphony on Special NBC Program Honoring Ohio Inventor.

NEW YORK, OCT. 20.—(P).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

Honoring the memory of Thomas A. Edison, inventive genius who died Sunday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a full hour's program over WSB and associated stations of the National Broadcasting Company Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The program will be relayed from Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALEM, OHIO
NEWS

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ—NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

A new daily series with Alice Joy

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

* * *

Musical and verbal tributes to Thomas A. Edison also are scheduled by a number of stations, including a performance of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony over both NBC networks Thursday night by the Boston symphony orchestra.

Favorite songs of Edison and a talk by Harvey Firestone Jr. were included in an NBC broadcast relayed by WTAM last night.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROWNWOOD, TEXAS
BULLETIN

Radio Day by Day

(Time is Central Standard Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(P)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 21 1931

WBEN WILL BROADCAST MEMORIAL SYMPHONY

A memorial to Thomas Alva Edison, featuring Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Koussevitsky, will be broadcast over the NBC network including station WBEN, from 4 to 5 p. m. tomorrow.

Written in 1803, the "Eroica" was originally dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon Bonaparte. The original name of the symphony, "Sinfonia Eroica Composta per Festeggiare Il Sovvenire d'un grand' Unomo," meant "heroic symphony, composed to celebrate the memory of a great man."

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 22 1931

EDISON MEMORIAL

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, will play Beethoven's Eroica Symphony as a memorial to Thomas Alva Edison at 4 p. m. Thursday over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Co. WTAM has announced it will be in the network for this special program. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will speak.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

OCT 23 1931

Memorial Concert at Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (P).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half. The performance was broadcast over a nation wide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

OCT 22 1931

HONORING the memory of Thomas Edison, a special performance of Beethoven's great Eroica symphony by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will be broadcast through The Oregonian between 1 and 2 o'clock this afternoon. Beethoven, whose compositions were Edison's favorites, began the Eroica in 1803 with the intention of dedicating it to Napoleon Bonaparte. He later destroyed the original dedication and inscribed on the title page. "To the Memory of a Great Man." The second of the four movements is a "Marcia Funebre."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WATERBURY, CONN
REPUBLICAN

OCT 22 1931

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BATAVIA, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 20 1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.

(Time is eastern standard throughout).

New York, Oct. 20. (P).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

CROWDS MULTIPLY AT EDISON'S BIER

In a nation-wide radio requiem at 4 o'clock Thursday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will broadcast Mr. Edison's favorite composition, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, over a National Broadcasting Company network.

A short time before his death Mr. Edison, answering a questionnaire of Etude, the musical magazine, said, "If I had but twenty-four hours to live and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" The second part of the symphony contains, appropriately, a funeral march.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
MORNING POST

OCT 22 1931

Automotive
Auto Refinishing, Repairin
FOR BETTER automobile re
ing and machine work see
Work guaranteed. Claud C. S
bury, 16 12th St. Phone 72-52

BOS TO FAVORITE MUSIC

Broadcast of Beethoven's "Eroica" Will Start on WEAF and WJZ at 4 O'Clock.

RADIO TO PICTURE LAVAL'S ARRIVAL

Goes on WEAF Some Time Between 9 and 10:30 — Congressman Britten To Speak — Many Evening Features.

(Time is Eastern Standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. — (AP) — Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday. The programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF and WJZ setup, starting at 4 P. M.

Arrangements have been com-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE OSHKOSH, WIS.
DAILY NORTHWESTERN

OCT 20 1931

ON AIRWAYS TONIGHT

(By C. E. Butterfield, Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time is eastern standard)

New York—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchetra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-N. B. C.. from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD

OCT 22 1931

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon. The program, originating from Boston will be presented by the Boston symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

RADIO

DAY by DAY

by C. E BUTTERFIELD

(Associated Press Radio Editor.)

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

OCT 23 1931

Orchestra Honors Edison.

BOSTON, Oct. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert in Symphony hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

Symphony Edison Loved On Radio Networks Today

Boston Orchestra To Play Beethoven's 'Eroica;' Premier Laval's Arrival in New York Will Also Be Broadcast

Associated Press

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to [illegible] played in a special radio conc[illegible] this afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

Arrangements have been completed to broadcast the arrival of Premier Pierre Laval of France when he arrives in New York this morning enroute to Washington for conferences with President Hoover.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
NEWS

PICK OF AIR TONITE AND TOMORROW

Time given is Central Standard

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press.

OCT 23 1931

BOSTON CONCERT GIVEN IN MEMORY OF EDISON

Boston, Oct. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussvitzsky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall.

The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by station WEEI the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

OCT 22 193

By TED R. LIUZZA

A PROGRAM memorializing Thomas A. Edison and other outstanding network releases will occupy the radio spotlight this afternoon and tonight. New Orleans talent will be heard in two of the chain offerings.

The memory of Thomas Alva Edison will be honored in a special broadcast by the Boston Symphony orchestra at 3, NBC to WSMB. Beethoven's "Eroloa" will be rendered under the direction of Koushevitsky, noted conductor. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will speak.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

OCT 22 1931

(Associated Press Radio Editor)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL

OCT 20 1931

BEFORE THE MIKE

New York, Oct. 20. (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF, WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER

(Central Standard Time Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21. — (AP) — Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica," by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF - WJZ - NBC setup, starting at 3 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 22 1931

The air waves will sing a requiem to Thomas Alva Edison as the majestic measures of Beethoven's "Eroica" played by the Boston Symphony orchestra over WBEN and the combined NBC networks, reach a saddened people between 4 and 5 P. M. Edison said a short while before he died, "If I had but 24 hours to live and could hear great music, I would choose 'Eroica.'" It is a fitting memorial.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NILES, MICH.
DAILY STAR

OCT 20 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

931

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

OCT 22 1931

AROUND THE RADIO CLOCK

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

New York, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 20 1931

Edison to Have Tribute Paid To Him on Thursday

Boston Symphony on Special NBC Program Honoring Ohio Inventor.

NEW YORK, OCT. 20.—(AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

Honoring the memory of Thomas A. Edison, inventive genius who died Sunday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a full hour's program over WSB and associated stations of the National Broadcasting Company Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The program will be relayed from Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SALEM, OHIO
NEWS

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ—NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

A new daily series with Alice Jo

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

* * *

Musical and verbal tributes to Thomas A. Edison also are scheduled by a number of stations, including a performance of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony over both NBC networks Thursday night by the Boston symphony orchestra.

Favorite songs of Edison and a talk by Harvey Firestone Jr. were included in an NBC broadcast relayed by WTAM last night.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROWNWOOD, TEXAS
BULLETIN

Radio Day by Day

(Time is Central Standard Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 21 1931

WBEN WILL BROADCAST MEMORIAL SYMPHONY

A memorial to Thomas Alva Edison, featuring Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Koussevitsky, will be broadcast over the NBC network including station WBEN, from 4 to 5 p. m. tomorrow.

Written in 1803, the "Eroica" was originally dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon Bonaparte. The original name of the symphony, "Sinfonia Eroica Composta per Festeggiare Il Sovvenire d'un grand' Unomo," meant "heroic symphony, composed to celebrate the memory of a great man."

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 22 1931

EDISON MEMORIAL

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, will play Beethoven's Eroica Symphony as a memorial to Thomas Alva Edison at 4 p. m. Thursday over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Co. WTAM has announced it will be in the network for this special program. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will speak.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

OCT 23 1931

Memorial Concert at Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half. The performance was broadcast over a nation wide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

OCT 22 1931

HONORING the memory of Thomas Edison, a special performance of Beethoven's great Eroica symphony by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will be broadcast through The Oregonian between 1 and 2 o'clock this afternoon. Beethoven, whose compositions were Edison's favorites, began the Eroica in 1803 with the intention of dedicating it to Napoleon Bonaparte. He later destroyed the original dedication and inscribed on the title page, "To the Memory of a Great Man." The second of the four movements is a "Marcia Funebre."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
WATERBURY, CONN
REPUBLICAN

OCT 22 1931

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BATAVIA, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 20 1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor.

(Time is eastern standard throughout).

New York, Oct. 20. (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

CROWDS MULTIPLY AT EDISON'S BIER

In a nation-wide radio requiem at 4 o'clock Thursday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will broadcast Mr. Edison's favorite composition, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, over a National Broadcasting Company network.

A short time before his death Mr. Edison, answering a questionnaire of Etude, the musical magazine, said, "If I had but twenty-four hours to live and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" The second part of the symphony contains, appropriately, a funeral march.

34

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LONG ISLAND CITY, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

OCT 22 1931

Radio Fulfils Last Wish of Great Inventor; Boston Symphony Unit to Play 'Eroica'

By TURNER DIALLE.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tonight.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 o'clock tonight.

A short time before his death, Edison informed the Etude magazine:

"If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emporer, the outraged composer struck Bonoparte's name from the symphony.

[illegible] Seidel violinst, accom-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 20 1931

RADIO DAY by DAY
by C.E BUTTERFIELD

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TARRYTOWN, N. Y
NEWS

OCT 21 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Errocia" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networkks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CONCORD, N. H.
MONITOR PATRIOT

OCT 20 1931

Radio
(Time is Eastern Standard Throughou

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribut is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison i a special broadcast on Thursday b the Boston Symphony orchestra. Th program will go over WEAF-WJZ NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL

OCT 20 1931

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time is Eastern Standard thruout)

NEW YORK — (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD

[illegible]

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem today in memory of the great inventor. Beethoven will be included in a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over WEAF at 4 p. m. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude Magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live and could hear great music I would choose Beethoven's Eroica.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BEAUMONT, TEX.
ENTERPRISE

OCT 22 1931

Today's Radio Programs

e) mas A. to be oncert from the an Eroica
by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF - WJZ - NBC setup, starting at 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

OCT 22 1931

Program Features on the Air Today
All Listed in Eastern Standard Time

New York, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m .

THIS CLIPPING FROM OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

NBC transcontinentals for morrow will include the Bos spmyhony memorial to Thom Edison . . . A special performa of Beethoven's "Eroica Sympho under the direction of Serge Ko sevitsky, will be heard on this p gram, which will be broadcast fr Chicago between 1 and 2 p. m. released through KGO and K . . . KGO high spots for tonight include an interview by Grantla Rice with Major Ralph Sas Army coach, West Point . . . Th broadcast will be on the air fro 7:30 to 8 . . . Aileen Fealy a Phyllida Ashley will be heard Piano Pictures from 9:15 to 9:30

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 22 1931

FORMER MEMBER OF HUB SYMPHONY DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP).—Boris Kreinin, aged 52, former concertmaster and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago. He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera Theatre in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert-master. He leaves a wife and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JAMAICA, N. Y.
QUEENS COUNTY NEWS

17

OCT 21 1931

"EROICA" FOR EDISON

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow. His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be heard over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 p.m.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's '!Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Standard Unio

[illegible] 2 [illegible] 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HONOR EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 21.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony Hall, Boston, tomorrow afternoon, Oct. 22. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, considered the noblest memorial music ever written, will be played as a tribute to the genius of the great inventor. No admission will be charged. The performance will be broadcast over a nation-wide chain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CANTON, OHIO
Repository & News

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO THOMAS EDISON

Orchestra Will Broadcast Special Program Thursday Afternoon.

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

OCT 20 1931

Today's Radio Highlights
By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

New York—Tribute is to be paid Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p.m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

OCT 23 1931

MEMORIAL IN MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Free Concert to Honor Edison

Boston, Oct. 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert today at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

The performance was broadcast over a nation-wide network. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SANDUSKY, OHIO
REGISTER

[illegible] 22 [illegible]

Around the RADIO Clock
BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4:00 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

OCT 20 193

RADIO NOTES
(By C. E. Butterfield)
(Time is Eastern Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

in Air ony, the played by
Symphony Orchestra in a memorial broadcast over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 8 p. m. Last year Mr. Edison was one of several distinguished men asked by "Etude" to indicate what piece of music they would choose to hear if they knew they had twenty-four hours to live. Mr. Edison's reply was: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live and could hear great music I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

The symphony, dedicated by the composer "to the life of a great man." will be broadcast from Symphony Hall, Boston, under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 20 1931

Orchestra Will Give Special Program
BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is Eastern Standard throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AUBURN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

OCT 20 1931

RADIO DAY by DAY
by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

(Time Is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
DEMOCRAT

OCT 20 1931

Time is Central Standard throughout.

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CORRY, PA.
JOURNAL

OCT 2 [illegible]

Thome A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert this afternon. The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists cf the playing of "Eroica" by Bethoven. The net work will be combined WEAF and WJZ setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

OCT 20 1931

RADIO DAY by DAY
by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Associated Press Radio Editor.

(Time is Central Standard throughout).

New York, Oct. 20.—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison, in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
TIMES-PRESS

OCT 21 1931

Honor

THOMAS EDISON, the gentle, kindly benefactor of mankind—whose labors brought light where previously there had been but darkness — whose death has left the whole world in sorrow—will be honored tonight thruout the nation by a minute of darkness, if suggestion of President Hoover is carried out.

On both NBC nets at 9:58 tonight, regular programs will stand aside for a three-minute tribute to the dead—at 10 announcers will ask listeners to extinguish lights for one minute, . . . will give the signal when that period is over. Columbia net probably will also carry out the same program.

Edison is also to be honored by an hour's broadcast starting at 4 Thursday afternoon over NBC, thru WTAM . . . Judge Frederick P. Cabot of Boston will pay tribute . . . the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's "Eroica" . . . several other programs have been and will be given in tribute to the dead inventor . . .

* * *

INFORMATION OBSCURED

34

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LONG ISLAND CITY, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

OCT 2 2 1931

Radio Fulfils Last Wish of Great Inventor; Boston Symphony Unit to Play 'Eroica'

By TURNER DIALLE.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tonight.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 o'clock tonight.

A short time before his death, Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emporer, the outraged composer struck Bonoparte's name from the symphony.

violinst, accom-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 2 0 1931

CE Co

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TARRYTOWN, N. Y
NEWS

OCT 2 1 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Errocia" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networkks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 P. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CONCORD, N. H.
MONITOR PATRIOT

OCT 2 0 1931

Radio

(Time is Eastern Standard Throughou

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribu is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison i a special broadcast on Thursday b the Boston Symphony orchestra. Tl program will go over WEAF-WJ NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL

OCT 2 0 1931

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time is Eastern Standard thruout)

NEW YORK — (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem today in memory of the great inventor. Beethoven will be included in a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over WEAF at 4 p. m. A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude Magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live and could hear great music I would choose Beethoven's Eroica."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BEAUMONT, TEX.
ENTERPRISE

OCT 2 2 1931

Today's Radio Programs

(Eastern Standard Time)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

OCT 2 2 1931

Program Features on the Air Today

All Listed in Eastern Standard Time

New York, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

NBC transcontinentals for morrow will include the Bost spmyhony memorial to Thomas Edison . . . A special performa of Beethoven's "Eroica Sympho under the direction of Serge Ko sevitsky, will be heard on this pr gram, which will be broadcast fr Chicago between 1 and 2 p. m. a released through KGO and K . . . KGO high spots for tonight w include an interview by Grantlan Rice with Major Ralph Sass Army coach, West Point . . . Th broadcast will be on the air fr 7:30 to 8 . . . Aileen Fealy a Phyllida Ashley will be heard Piano Pictures from 9:15 to 9:3

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

OCT 2 2 1931

FORMER MEMBER OF HUB SYMPHONY DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP).—Boris Kreinin, aged 52, former concert-master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago. He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera Theatre in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert-master. He leaves a wife and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE JAMAICA, N. Y.
QUEENS COUNTY NEWS

77

OCT 2 1 1931

"EROICA" FOR EDISON

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow. His favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be heard over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 p.m.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's '!Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The heroic symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor. The public will be admitted to participate in the memorial.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Standard Unio

OCT 2 1 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HONOR EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 21.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony Hall, Boston, tomorrow afternoon, Oct. 22. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, considered the noblest memorial music ever written, will be played as a tribute to the genius of the great inventor. No admission will be charged. The performance will be broadcast over a nation-wide chain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CANTON, OHIO
Repository & News

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO THOMAS EDISON

Orchestra Will Broadcast Special Program Thursday Afternoon.

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

OCT 2 0 1931

A JOURNAL-NEWS,

oda Highlights

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

New York—Tribute is to be paid Thomas A. Edison in a special

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

OCT 23 1931

MEMORIAL IN MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Free Concert to Honor Edison

Boston, Oct. 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert today at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

The performance was broadcast over a nation-wide network. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THI~ CLIPPING FROM SANDUSKY, OHIO
REGISTER

OCT 2 2 1931

Around the RADIO Clock

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

NEW YORK, Oct. 21 (AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4:00 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

OCT 20 1931

RADIO NOTES

(By C. E. Butterfield)
(Time is Eastern Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

Favorite Symphony to Go on Air

Mr. Edison's favorite symphony, the Eroica, of Beethoven, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a memorial broadcast over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 8 p.m. Last year Mr. Edison was one of several distinguished men asked by "Etude" to indicate what piece of music they would choose to hear if they knew they had twenty-four hours to live. Mr. Edison's reply was: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live and could hear great music I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

The symphony, dedicated by the composer "to the life of a great man," will be broadcast from Symphony Hall, Boston, under the direction of Arthur F. Eades, guest conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 20 1931

Orchestra Will Give Special Program

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is Eastern Standard throughout).

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AUBURN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

OCT 2 0 1931

RADIO DAY by DAY

by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

(Time Is Eastern Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
DEMOCRAT

OCT 2 0 1931

Time is Central Standard throughout.

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CORRY, PA.
JOURNAL

OCT 2 2 1931

Thome A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert this afternon. The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Bethoven. The net work will be combined WEAF and WJZ setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

OCT 2 0 1931

RADIO DAY by DAY

by C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Associated Press Radio Editor.
(Time is Central Standard throughout).

New York, Oct. 20.—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison, in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE AKRON, O.
TIMES-PRESS

OCT 2 1 1931

Honor

THOMAS EDISON, the gentle, kindly benefactor of mankind—whose labors brought light where previously there had been but darkness — whose death has left the whole world in sorrow—will be honored tonight thruout the nation by a minute of darkness, if suggestion of President Hoover is carried out.

On both NBC nets at 9:58 tonight, regular programs will stand aside for a three-minute tribute to the dead—at 10 announcers will ask listeners to extinguish lights for one minute, . . . will give the signal when that period is over. Columbia net probably will also carry out the same program.

Edison is also to be honored by an hour's broadcast starting at 4 Thursday afternoon over NBC, thru WTAM . . . Judge Frederick P. Cabot of Boston will pay tribute . . . the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Beethoven's "Eroica" . . . several other programs have been and will be given in tribute to the dead inventor . . .

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FAIRMONT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN

OCT 20 1931

ORCHESTRA WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO THOS A EDISON

New Joy Daily Series Will Start On NBC Chain October 26

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

(Time is Eastern Standard throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (By the Associated Press). — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

OCT 23 1931

Edison Concert Given By Boston Symphone

Boston, Oct. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall.

The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

OCT 22 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON WDAF.

Program at 3 o'Clock Today as Memorial to Edison.

The Boston Symphony orchestra today will broadcast over WDAF, The Star's station, a special memorial program to Thomas A. Edison. The program, which will start at 3 o'clock this afternoon, will be a special performance of the symphony "Eroica" by Ludwig Beethoven. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS OBSERVER

OCT 23 1931

Edison Memorial Concert.

Boston, Oct. 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nation wide net work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 21 1931

According to word from New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special program in tribute to Thomas A. Edison. The program will be broadcast from 4 to 5 o'clock on Thursday over both networks of NBC. The broadcast will be on WWJ. The "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven will be played. There will be a talk by Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 22 1931

Favorite Music Of Edison To Be Broadcast

A special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony," will be broadcast by the Boston Symphony orchestra over the National Broadcasting Company network through the Arizona Republic-Electrical Equipment company station KTAR between 2 and 2:30 o'clock this afternoon in honor of the memory of the late Thomas A. Edison.

The orchestra is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Beethoven's compositions were Edison's favorites.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER

OCT 20 1931

(By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.)
(Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
NEWS

A special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony," one of the favorites of the late Thomas Alva Edison, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1 ~~to 2 o'clock~~ Thursday afternoon. Both KECA and KFI will release the broadcast locally, it is announced. Beethoven began this symphony in 1803, intending to dedicate it to Napoleon Bonaparte. He then changed his mind, discarded the original dedication and inscribed on the title page of the work, "To the memory of a great man."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

1931

RADIO NOTES
(By C. E. Butterfield)
(Time is Eastern Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS OBSERVER

OCT 23 1931

Edison Memorial Concert.

Boston, Oct. 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nation wide net work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 22 1931

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

OCT 21 1931

YOUR RADIO TODAY

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST-DISPATCH

THE Boston Symphony orchestra is playing an hour's program this afternoon as a memorial to Edison. It begins at 3 over KPRC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES HERALD

OCT 2 1931

New York, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN
HERALD

OCT 21 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

1931

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra via the NBC at 4 p. m. today in "Eroica," by Beethoven, another of the late Thomas Edison's favorite symphonies, as a tribute to the great inventor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

OCT 21 1931

YOUR RADIO TODAY

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

OCT 21 1931

THURSDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a memorial performance for Thomas A. Edison tomorrow afternoon from four to five o'clock, featuring the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven. Koussevitzky will be the conductor. The speaker will be Judge Frederick P. Cabot. WTAM will carry the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

1931

Boston Orchestra Honors Memory of Thomas A. Edison

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Thursday afternoon, Oct. 22. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony will be played as a tribute to the genius of the great inventor. No admission will be charged. The performance will be broadcast over a nation-wide chain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

OCT 20 1931

Tapping the Air With The Radio Editor

And Associated Press

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LONG BEACH, CALIF.
SUN

A memorial concert to the late Thomas Alva Edison will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon at 1 o'clock, both KFI and KECA relaying the program to Southern California listeners. Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" will be featured.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD,
(Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time Is E. S. T. Throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT

OCT 20 1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAZLETON, PA.
PLAIN SPEAKER

OCT 20 1931

Radio Tribute To Edison.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

1931

Radio is to pay its tribute to Thomas A. Edison in a special broad-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR GAZETTE

OCT 20 1931

RADIO Day By Day

By C. E. Butterfield

New York—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 2 1931

WJAR WILL BROADCAST MEMORIAL TO EDISON

Beethoven's "Eroica" To Be Presented Over Nation-wide Hookup.

A musical memorial to Thomas A. Edison, Beethoven's "Eroica," played by the Boston Symphony orchestra over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company, will be heard locally over WJAR, The Outlet Company, Thursday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock. Mr. Edison is said to have preferred this symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," to all other great music. The symphony depicts the struggle, nobility and death of an heroic figure.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD

Edison Tribute To Be Paid In Radio Broadcast

(San Angelo time throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 23 1931

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—A tribute to the memory of Thomas A. Edison was paid by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon when Beethoven's third symphony, the Eroica, was played at Symphony Hall. The symphony was broadcast on a national hook-up.

The audience stood in silence for one minute while the lights were dimmed in memory of the inventor.

Dr. Koussevitzky, in choosing the Eroica as a fitting musical memorial, was unaware that the symphony was Edison's favorite.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
LAWRENCE, MAS
TELEGRAM

OCT 22 1931

and radio artists.

TRIBUTE TO EDISON

4 P. M.—WEEI and WBZ. Performance of Beethoven's "Eroica," by Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, from Symphony Hall, Boston.

IMMIGRATION STATION

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

OCT 21 1931

Both networks of the National Broadcasting Company will carry a memorial to Thomas A. Edison by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 3 p. m. Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

1931

HUB SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

The performance was broadcast over a nation-wide network. The program included Beethoven "Eroica" symphony. The Boston orchestra was the only one in the country to pay such tribute to the great inventor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
FAIRMONT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN

OCT 20 1931

ORCHESTRA WILL PAY TRIBUTE TO THOS A EDISON

New Joy Daily Series Will Start On NBC Chain October 26

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

(Time is Eastern Standard throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (By the Associated Press). — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

OCT 23 1931

Edison Concert Given By Boston Symphone

Boston, Oct. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall.

The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

OCT 22 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON WDAF.

Program at 3 o'Clock Today as Memorial to Edison.

The Boston Symphony orchestra today will broadcast over WDAF, The Star's station, a special memorial program to Thomas A. Edison. The program, which will start at 3 o'clock this afternoon, will be a special performance of the symphony "Eroica" by Ludwig Beethoven. The orchestra will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS OBSERVER

OCT 23 1931

Edison Memorial Concert.

Boston, Oct. 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nation wide net work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 21 1931

According to word from New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special program in tribute to Thomas A. Edison. The program will be broadcast from 4 to 5 o'clock on Thursday over both networks of NBC. The broadcast will be on WWJ. The "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven will be played. There will be a talk by Judge Frederick P. Cabot.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHOENIX, ARIZ.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 22 1931

Favorite Music Of Edison To Be Broadcast

A special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony," will be broadcast by the Boston Symphony orchestra over the National Broadcasting Company network through the Arizona Republic-Electrical Equipment company station KTAR between 2 and 2:30 o'clock this afternoon in honor of the memory of the late Thomas A. Edison.

The orchestra is under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, Beethoven's compositions were Edison's favorites.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER

OCT 20 1931

(By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.)
(Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 6 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
NEWS

A special performance of Beethoven's great "Eroica Symphony," one of the favorites of the late Thomas Alva Edison, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1 ~~to 2 o'clock~~ Thursday afternoon. Both KECA and KFI will release the broadcast locally, it is announced. Beethoven began this symphony in 1803, intending to dedicate it to Napoleon Bonaparte. He then changed his mind, discarded the original dedication and inscribed on the title page of the work, "To the memory of a great man."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

1931

RADIO NOTES

(By C. E. Butterfield)
(Time is Eastern Standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS OBSERVER

OCT 23 1931

Edison Memorial Concert.

Boston, Oct. 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nation wide net work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 22 1931

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ATLANTIC CITY, N. J
PRESS

OCT 21 1931

YOUR RADIO TODAY

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST-DISPATCH

THE Boston Symphony orchestra is playing an hour's program this afternoon as a memorial to Edison. It begins at 3 over KPRC.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES HERALD

OCT 2 1931

New York, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW BRITAIN, CONN
HERALD

OCT 21 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tomorrow.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be heard over combined networks of NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

1931

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra via the NBC at 4 p. m. today in "Eroica," by Beethoven, another of the late Thomas Edison's favorite symphonies, as a tribute to the great inventor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

OCT 21 1931

YOUR RADIO TODAY

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the ~~Boston~~ Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

OCT 21 1931

The Bos
Thomas A.
the "Eroica"
The speaker

our th-ly-our so ed.

3	Internat Pet	10[illegible]
1	Inter Sup Pow	12[illegible]
1	Ital Euperpo A	2
7	Lone Star Gas	9⅞
2	Mid West Util	11
4	Mo Kan P L	2½
4	Nat Fuel G	15
2	Nat Investors	3
2	Nat S T Sec A	4

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

24 1931

Boston Orchestra Honors Memory of Thomas A. Edison

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison, in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Thursday afternoon, Oct. 22. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony will be played as a tribute to the genius of the great inventor. No admission will be charged. The performance will be broadcast over a nation-wide chain.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCI

OCT 20 1931

Tapping the Air With The Radio Editor

And Associated Press

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LONG BEACH, CALIF.
SUN

A memorial concert to the late Thomas Alva Edison will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon at 1 o'clock, both KFI and KECA relaying the program to Southern California listeners. Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" will be featured.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. ALBANS, VT.
MESSENGER

1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
(Associated Press Radio Editor.)
(Time Is E. S. T. Throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—!—Tribute is to be paid Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ASHLAND, KY.
INDEPENDENT

OCT 20 1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HAZLETON, PA.
PLAIN SPEAKER

OCT 20 1931

Radio Tribute To Edison.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

0 1931

Radio is to pay its tribute to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday over the combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company at 3 p. m. The program is to last a full hour and will feature music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR GAZETTE

OCT 20 1931

RADIO Day By Day

By C. E. Butterfield

New York—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OC 2 1931

WJAR WILL BROADCAST MEMORIAL TO EDISON

Beethoven's "Eroica" To Be Presented Over Nation-wide Hookup.

A musical memorial to Thomas A. Edison, Beethoven's "Eroica," played by the Boston Symphony orchestra over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company, will be heard locally over WJAR, The Outlet Company, Thursday afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock. Mr. Edison is said to have preferred this symphony, dedicated by Beethoven "to the life of a great man," to all other great music. The symphony depicts the struggle, nobility and death of an heroic figure.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANGELO, TEXAS
STANDARD

Edison Tribute To Be Paid In Radio Broadcast

(San Angelo time throughout.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 23 1931

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—A tribute to the memory of Thomas A. Edison was paid by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon when Beethoven's third symphony, the Eroica, was played at Symphony Hall. The symphony was broadcast on a national hook-up.

The audience stood in silence for one minute while the lights were dimmed in memory of the inventor.

Dr. Koussevitzky, in choosing the Eroica as a fitting musical memorial, was unaware that the symphony was Edison's favorite.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
LAWRENCE, MAS
TELEGRAM

OCT 22 1931

and radio artists.

TRIBUTE TO EDISON

4 P. M.—WEEI and WBZ. Performance of Beethoven's "Eroica," by Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, from Symphony Hall, Boston.

IMMIGRATION STATION

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

OCT 21 1931

Both networks of the National Broadcasting Company will carry a memorial to Thomas A. Edison by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 3 p. m. Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

1931

HUB SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

The performance was broadcast over a nation-wide network. The program included Beethoven "Eroica" symphony. The Boston orchestra was the only one in the country to pay such tribute to the great inventor.

36

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. JOURNAL

OCT 2 0 1931

Memorial Symphony

Asked once by an adroit reporter what he would request if given only 24 hours to live, Mr. Edison replied: "Among the few things would be to hear a great symphony orchestra presenting Beethoven's Third Symphony, 'Eroica'."

It was only the other day that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, heard that story. And on Thursday night, both NBC networks will carry the Boston orchestra's presentation of that symphony for a full hour.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK NEWS

OCT 2 2 1931

A short time before his death, Thomas A. Edison told a reporter: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's Eroica Symphony."

* * *

The inventor's last wish in music is to be heard by millions of listeners throughout the country at 4 this afternoon. Through WEAF, WJZ, and the combined NBC networks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will broadcast this heroic composition. A worthy tribute to a benefactor of mankind.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BLUEFIELD, W. VA.

SUNSET NEWS

OCT 2 0 1931

(Time is eastern standard throug out.)

New York. (AP)—Tribute is to paid to Thomas A. Edison in a sp cial broadcast on Thursday by t Boston Symphony orchestra. T program will go over WEAF-WJ NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO

VINDICATOR

OCT 2

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF and WJZ chains from four to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WICHITA FALLS, TEX.

TIMES

(Time Is Central Standard Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MONROE, MICH.

EVE. NEWS

OCT 2 0 1931

(By The Associated Press)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

READING, PA.

TIMES

OCT 2 3 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's 'Eroica" sym-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MERIDEN, CONN.

JOURNAL

1931

New York, Oct. 20. (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF, WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

ADVERTISER

ELMIRA, N. Y.

OCT 2 2 1931

(Eastern Standard Time)

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

LEWISTON, ME.

SUN

OCT 2 3 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nationwide radio requiem for the great inventor on Thursday, October 22. His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4.00 to 5.00 p.m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

READING, PA.

TIMES

OCT 2 3 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's 'Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER

OCT 23 1931

CONCERT HONORS EDISON

Boston Symphony Gives Free Recital in Memory of Inventor

Boston, Oct. 23.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert yesterday at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PORTSMOUTH, O.

TIMES

Program Will Pay Tribute To Thomas Edison

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

* * *

A new daily series with Alice Joy ... opens on WEAF-NBC Oct

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

YOUNGSTOWN, O.

VINDICATOR

OCT 20 1931

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF and WJZ chains from four to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BURLINGTON, VT.

FREE PRESS

OCT 2 2 1931

Today's Radio Highlights

(Eastern Standard Time)

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert this afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC set-up, starting at 4:00 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DOVER, OHIO

DAILY REPORTER

OCT 2 2 1931

Radio

Today's Features

Hour's program by Boston Symphony, Sergei Koussevitzky directing in memory of Thomas A. Edison, 4 p. m., WTAM, WGAR . . . Irene Bordoni, French star, singing with Vallee's Band, 8 p. m., WTAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM

YOUNGSTOWN, O.

TELEGRAM

OCT 21 1931

An Edison memorial program is scheduled for both the Red and Blue networks Thursday from 4 to 5. The Boston Symphony, directed by Koussevitsky, will present a special performance of Eroica symphony. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will deliver the euology. WTAM is scheduled to carry the program.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.

SUN

Dedicated to the memory of Thomas Alva Edison, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a special program to be released by NBC station KFSD between 1 and 2 p. m. Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROANOKE, VA.

TIMES

OCT 2 2 1931

AROUND THE RADIO CLOCK

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Associated Press Radio Editor.

Time Is Eastern Standard Throughout

New York, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4:00 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

AKRON, O.

BEACON JOURNAL

OCT 2

Another radio tribute will be paid Edison Thursday when the Boston Symphony orchestra offers a special broadcast over NBC-WJZ network. Time for the program is 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

FORT SMITH, ARK.

SO. WEST AMERICA

OCT 22 1931

(Time Is Central Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21.-(AP)-Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

TAUNTON, MASS.

GAZETTE

OCT 2 0 1931

(By The Associated Press.)

(Time Is Eastern Standard.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

YONKERS, N. Y.

HERALD

1931

New York, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—(By Associated Press) The Boston symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Kouvotski, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison, with a special concert at Symphony hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SCRANTON, PA.

REPUBLICAN

OCT 2 2 1931

◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆◆

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

(Associated Press Radio Editor)

(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

KNOXVILLE, TENN.

JOURNAL

OCT 2 2 1931

EDISON TRIBUTE

An A. P. dispatch says that Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will be played in a special radio concert today at 3 p. m. by the Boston Symphony orchestra over the WEAF and WJZ networks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE, VA.

WORLD NEWS

OCT 2 0 1931

Edison Tribute

New York, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF, WJZ,—NBC from 4 to 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

MADISON, WIS.

CAPITAL TIMES

Edison Tribute on WIBA Thursday

Boston Symphony in Special Performance at 3 p. m.

A special memorial program in tribute to Thomas A. Edison, will be broadcast over WIBA and an NBC network Thursday afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony orchestra directed by Koussevitsky will feature the broadcast with a special performance of "Eroica," by Beethoven. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will make the only remarks to be heard during the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.

EVE. JOURNAL

1931

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Associated Press Radio Editor

(Time is Eastern Standard thruout)

NEW YORK — (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

POST STANDARD

HONOR EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22. (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at symphony hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

LOUISVILLE, KY.

HERALD POST

OCT 2 0 1931

Tribute to Edison Paid By Symphony Orchestra

New York, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SIOUX FALLS, S. D.

LEADER

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Associated Press Radio Editor

(Time is Central Standard)

New York, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

A new daily series with Alice Joy as soloist, opens on WEAF-NBC October 26. It will be put on three times nightly except Sunday, at 6:30 for the east, 10:30 for the middle west and 11:45 for the far west. Howard Claney is now introducing the B. A. Rolfe orchestra numbers on WEAF-NBC in place of Edward Thorgerson.

Try these on your radio tonight:

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

GAZETTE

RADIO DAY BY DAY

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

Associated Press Radio Editor

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

36

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL
OCT 20 1931

Memorial Symphony

Asked once by an adroit reporter what he would request if given only 24 hours to live, Mr. Edison replied: "Among the few things would be to hear a great symphony orchestra presenting Beethoven's Third Symphony, 'Eroica'."

It was only the other day that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, heard that story. And on Thursday night, both NBC networks will carry the Boston orchestra's presentation of that symphony for a full hour.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK NEWS
OCT 22 1931

A short time before his death, Thomas A. Edison told a reporter: "If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's Eroica Symphony."

* * *

The inventor's last wish in music is to be heard by millions of listeners throughout the country at 4 this afternoon. Through WEAF, WJZ, and the combined NBC networks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will broadcast this heroic composition. A worthy tribute to a benefactor of mankind.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BLUEFIELD, W. VA.
SUNSET NEWS
OCT 20 1931

(Time is eastern standard throughout.)

New York. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
OCT 20

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF and WJZ chains from four to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WICHITA FALLS, TEX.
TIMES

(Time Is Central Standard Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MONROE, MICH.
EVE. NEWS
OCT 20 1931

(By The Associated Press)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE READING, PA.
TIMES
OCT 23 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's 'Eroica" sym-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL
1931

New York, Oct. 20. (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF, WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ADVERTISER
ELMIRA, N. Y.
OCT 22 1931

(Eastern Standard Time)

New York, Oct. 21—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of 'Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
OCT 23 1931

as A. Edison's last wish in be realized in a nation- requiem for the great Thursday, October 22. symphony, the thoven, will com- concert by the Orchestra to be bined networks of Broadcasting Com- 00 to 5.00 p.m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM READING, PA.
TIMES
OCT 23 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall. The performance was broadcast over a nationwide network by Station WEEI, the station bearing Edison's name. The program included Beethoven's 'Eroica" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. PUBLIC LEDGER
OCT 23 1931

CONCERT HONORS EDISON

Boston Symphony Gives Free Recital in Memory of Inventor

Boston, Oct. 23.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert yesterday at Symphony Hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTSMOUTH, O.
TIMES

Program Will Pay Tribute To Thomas Edison

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

* * *

A new daily series with Alice Joy ... WEAF-NBC Oct

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR
OCT 20 1931

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF and WJZ chains from four to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS
OCT 22 1931

Today's Radio Highlights

(Eastern Standard Time)

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert this afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consist of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC set-up, starting at 4:00 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DOVER, OHIO
DAILY REPORTER

Radio

Today's Features

Hour's program by Boston Symphony, Sergei Koussevitzky directing, in memory of Thomas A. Edison, 4 p. m., WTAM, WGAR . . . Irene Bordoni, French star, singing with Vallee's Band, 8 p. m., WTAM

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
TELEGRAM
OCT 21 1931

AN Edison memorial program is scheduled for both the Red and Blue networks Thursday from 4 to 5. The Boston Symphony, directed by Koussevitsky, will present a special performance of Eroica symphony. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will deliver the euology. WTAM is scheduled to carry the program.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
SUN

Dedicated to the memory of Thomas Alva Edison, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in a special program to be released by NBC station KFSD between 1 and 2 p. m. Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
OCT 22 1931

AROUND THE RADIO CLOCK

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor.

Time Is Eastern Standard Throughout

New York, Oct. 21 (AP).—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4:00 o'clock.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
AKRON, O.
BEACON JOURNAL
OCT 2 1931

Another radio tribute will be paid Edison Thursday when the Boston Symphony orchestra offers a special broadcast over NBC-WJZ network. Time for the program is 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FORT SMITH, ARK.
SO. WEST AMERICA

(Time Is Central Standard Throughout)

New York, Oct. 21.—(AP)—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert Thursday afternoon.

The program, originating from Boston, will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 3 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 20 1931

(By The Associated Press.)
(Time Is Eastern Standard.)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD
1931

New York, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY HONORS EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—(By Associated Press) The Boston symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Kouvotski, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison, with a special concert at Symphony hall. The tickets, distributed free, were all taken in an hour and a half.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCRANTON, PA.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 22 1931

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
(Associated Press Radio Editor)
(Time is Eastern Standard Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert tomorrow.

The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NEC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL
OCT 22 1931

EDISON TRIBUTE

An A. P. dispatch says that Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony, the "Eroica," by Beethoven, will be played in a special radio concert today at 3 p. m. by the Boston Symphony orchestra over the WEAF and WJZ networks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD NEWS
OCT 20 1931

Edison Tribute

New York, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF, WJZ,—NBC from 4 to 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

Edison Tribute on WIBA Thursday

Boston Symphony in Special Performance at 3 p. m.

A special memorial program in tribute to Thomas A. Edison, will be broadcast over WIBA and an NBC network Thursday afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock.

The Boston Symphony orchestra directed by Koussevitsky will feature the broadcast with a special performance of "Eroica," by Beethoven. Judge Frederick P. Cabot will make the only remarks to be heard during the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
EVE. JOURNAL
1931

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time is Eastern Standard thruout)

NEW YORK — (AP) — Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST STANDARD

HONOR EDISON

BOSTON, Oct. 22. (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at symphony hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD POST
OCT 20 1931

Tribute to Edison Paid By Symphony Orchestra

New York, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SIOUX FALLS, S. D.
LEADER

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor
(Time is Central Standard)

New York, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

A new daily series with Alice Joy as soloist, opens on WEAF-NBC October 26. It will be put on three times nightly except Sunday, at 6:30 for the east, 10:30 for the middle west and 11:45 for the far west. Howard Claney is now introducing the B. A. Rolfe orchestra numbers on WEAF-NBC in place of Edward Thorgerson.

Try these on your radio tonight:

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

RADIO DAY BY DAY

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

New York, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

OCT 22 1931

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem today. His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be heard over WHAM and combined networks from 4 to 5 o'clock this afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

[illegible]

THURSDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a memorial performance for [illegible]mas [illegible]son tomorrow afternoon from four to five o'clock, featuring "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven. Koussevitzky will be the conductor. speaker will be Judge Frederick P. Cabot. WTAM will carry the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
UNION

Boston Symphony to Radio Edison Tribute Thursday

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP).—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

OCT 22 1931

THOMAS A. EDISON'S last wish in music will be realized in a Nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor. His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over WRC this afternoon at 4 o'clock.

A short time before his death Edison informed the Etude magazine: "If I had but 24 hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica.'" His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguihed Americans.

The memorial program will be broadcast direct from Symphony Hall in Boston, under the direction of Sergei Koussevitsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

[illegible]T 20 1931

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

OCT 22 1931

Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock over the combined WTAF and WJZ networks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Wichita Falls, Tex.
TIMES

OCT 20 1931

RADIO WAVES

(Time Is Central Standard Throughout)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20. (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER JOURNAL

OCT 22 1931

W·H·A·S
RADIO
FEATURES FOR TODAY

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's greatest, will radiocast over WHAS and both networks of NBC for an hour starting at 3 o'clock Thursday afternoon a memorial programme for Thomas A. Edison. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has chosen the Beethoven "Eroica" as the chief number to be performed in the memorial.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 21 1931

Boston Symphony Honors Edisor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will give a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, with a program including Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Admission will be free. The program will be broadcast over a nation-wide network.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

OCT 20 1931

—The Columbians — Also WADC

(Time is central standard)

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 21 1931

Memorial services in honor of Thomas Alva Edison will be broadcast by KDKA at 4 o'clock Thursday afternoon. The program will include a special performance of Eroica by Beethoven, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky.

Short wave facilities of W8XK will carry the program to foreign countries.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

The Boston Symphony gave a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison yesterday afternoon in the Massachusetts capital. Serge Koussevitzky presented the members of his orchestra in Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony as a tribute to the great inventor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM IONIA, MICH.
SENTINEL STANDARD

[illegible]T 20 1931

New York. Oct. 20.—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BATAVIA, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 23 1931

In Boston the symphony orchestra gave a special concert in memory of Thomas A. Edison.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEXINGTON, KY.
LEADER

OCT 20 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston symphony orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOWLING GREEN, KY.
PARK CITY NEWS

OCT 20 1931

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 3 to 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

OCT 23 1931

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP).—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

[illegible]

By THE OWL

A NATIONWIDE radio tribute to Thomas A. Edison is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon from 4 to 5 o'clock over the WJZ chain. It will come to Rochester listeners from WHAM. The program will consist of Beethoven's immortal Eroica, played by the Boston Symphony. It was Mr. Edison's favcrite music and will be played as a memorial to him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 22 1931

(Eastern Standard Time)

Thomas A. Edison's favorite symphony is to be played in a special radio concert today. The program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and consists of the playing of "Eroica" by Beethoven. The network will be the combined WEAF-WJZ-NBC setup, starting at 4 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD

OCT 22 1931

Chamber of Commerce over WBRC.

* * *

Tribute to Thomas A. Edison will be paid in a special program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra over an NBC network including WAPI from 3 to 4 p.m., Thursday.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 2[illegible]

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD.
Associated Press Radio Editor

New York—(AP)—Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ-NBC from 4 to 5 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RAPID CITY, S. D.
JOURNAL

[illegible]

New York, Oct. 20—(AP)— Tribute is to be paid to Thomas A. Edison in a special broadcast on Thursday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will go over WEAF-WJZ NBC from 2 to 3 p. m.

338

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

1 1931

Symphony Audiences Asked To Omit Mid-Number 'Hand'

CONCERT-GOERS will be asked this year, for the first time in Columbus' musical history, to refrain from applause between movements of a symphony and between divisions of other compositions.

In the past the habit has been frowned upon by orchestra conductors but no particular effort has been made to cure it.

"In all major cities where there is a resident symphony orchestra the audiences have learned to withhold applause until the conclusion of a divided composition," said Dr. Royal Hughes, head of the music department at Ohio State university. "I believe we should fall in line in this matter."

Dr. Hughes will instruct his classes and will have bulletins posted about the university buildings calling attention to the new concert practice. It is at the express wish of many orchestra conductors that these efforts are being made.

The symphony season will open Thursday, Oct. 29, with the appearance of the Boston orchestra, followed on Dec. 1 by the Detroit, when Florence Stage, Columbus girl who returns from concert successes abroad, will be piano soloist. The series includes also the Cincinnati orchestra, Feb. 8; the Cleveland, March 7, and the Chicago, April 5. Season tickets are on sale at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
POST

OCT 21 1931

Also Koussevitzky.

In "Sergei Koussevitzky and His Epoch" ($3.50. Alfred Knopf) Arthur Lourie has set forth a work dealing with the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Lourie, who is a fellow countryman of his subject, gives a readable account of Koussevitzky's career—his fortuitous adoption of the double-bass as an instrument of virtuosity and his adventures in orchestral direction—but the author's worship of the conductor is too fervent to permit of much critical discrimination. The intelligentsia of Massachusetts will doubtless be surprised to learn from Mr. Lourie that Koussevitzky introduced Brahms to Boston, where he had been respected but very little played," and that the conductor made him a very popular composer."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 22 1931

SELECT "LA VALSE"

Boston Symphony's Recording Is Record-of-the-Month.

The November record-of-the-month, as selected from its recent recordings by the Victor company, is Ravel's "La Valse" played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Columbus musicians will note with interest that that composition described as a choreographic poem, is listed by Dr. Koussevitzky for his program at Memorial Hall, Oct. 29.

The Boston Orchestra concert is the first in the series sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The orchestras from Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland are to follow in the course of the season.

Seats are available at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
EXAMINER

OCT 22 1931

Maestro

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who'll direct Boston Symphony in Edison Memorial Concert over both KFI and KECA from 1 to 2 this afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 22

A Musical Treat.

LOVERS of music in Columbus and central Ohio have reason to rejoice over the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Oct. 29, when it will open a season of symphonic concerts arranged by the Central Ohio Symphony Club. For years the Boston orchestra has been acclaimed the greatest of its kind. It has been fortunate in having an abundance of wealthy friends, who pour millions into the treasury to maintain and improve it and the greatest living conductors have been employed to direct its programs. It was born under a lucky star and its career has been marked by steady progress in the direction of musical idealism. Its appearance in any city is a musical event of the first importance, and Columbus is fortunate in securing it for the first of the five programs of the season. For the present year its programs have been chosen by its patrons, a referendum request having been distributed last spring. Columbus will hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most popular offerings, and excerpts from the masterful Wagner, always welcomed by music lovers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 23 1931

Pretty Soft Now

AN item in The Citizen conveys the cheering information that 3000 seats in Memorial Hall are being equipped with comfortable pads and will be ready for the Oct. 29 concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the Central Ohio Symphony Club.

Everyone who has suffered on those seats in their original, unpadded condition will thrill to this news. One variety of hard times, thank goodness, is going—we hope forever.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
~~NEWS~~
Tribune

OCT 23 1931

Koussevitzky Program for Boston Symphony Orchestra Here October 27 Announced

The following program is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra to the Choral Union Series on October 27: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin;" Ravel's "Daphnis et Choe," Ballet Second Suite; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Op. 92.

Handel enthusiasts particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic genius. This concerto, played by the full string section of the Boston Symphony orchestra, reveals as only such music could the marvellous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this famous organization.

Liszt described the Prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the top-most register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail. It descends and becomes fullbodied, as man struggles to rise to the divine, ineffable gift. The Prelude ends as it began in the "clear blue of Heaven, and the presence of the Angelic Hosts."

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tonepainters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy. In sheer lovliness and grace, certain wood-wind passages in "dawn" and "pantomime" of this suite, have perhaps been excelled by no other composer. This score is also probably his largest canvas, and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes this suite. When Ravel made his only visit to America in 1928, he was guest of honor at the concert by this orchestra in Carnegie Hall, N. Y. Koussevitzky conducted several of the eminent Frenchman's works, including this one. The composer, who sat in a box, was given an ovation by the New York public at the conclusion of the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite.

The symphony of the occasion will be the Seventh of Beethoven in A major, which, among the immortal nine, stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception; it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms. The impetus of the first and last movement sweeps all before them; the scherzo is as rapid as the divine allegretto. The rhythmic pulse of this symphony led Wagner to call it "The apothcosis of the dance."

Other concerts in the Choral Union Series will take place as follows: Ossip Gabrilowitsch, in piano recital on November 17; the Revelers, James Melton, 1st tenor, Lewis James, 2nd tenor, Phil Dewey, baritone, Wilfred Glenn, bass and Frank Black, director and pianist, December 3; Detroit Symphony orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor, December 15; Don Cossack Russian Chorus, Serge Jaroff, Conductor, January 13; Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Rudolph Siegel, Guest Conductor, January 25; Yehudi Menuhin, Febrauray 4; Percy Grainger, February 19, and Rosa Ponselle, March 7.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LEADER
High Point, N.C.

OCT

HONORS EDISON

Boston, Oct. 22.—The Boston symphony orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, today honored the memory of Thomas A. Edison with a special memorial concert at Symphony Hall.

The performance was broadcast over a nation-wide net work.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

Words and Music

By Deems Taylor

* * *

ARTHUR LOURIE, in his new life of Serge Koussevitzky, heads his chapters with appropriate quotations from Russian authors. One of them is the following:

Moscow . . . Moscow . . .
—Pushkin.

* * *

THIS, it seems to me, establishes a world's record, both for brevity and for hero worship. An author who can elicit the compliment of reprint by the reiteration of a proper noun certainly has a loyal public.

Not that our own literature is barren of such gems of thought. For the convenience of any who wish to use similar compact quotations from American and English authors I submit the following:

Gone, gone . . .
—Edna St. Vincent Millay
Tiger, tiger . . .
—Blake
Awake, awake . . .
—John Ruskin
Blow, blow . . .
—Shakespeare
Columbia, Columbia . . .
—Timothy Dwight

—not forgetting, of course,

Goosie, goosie . . .
—Mother Goose
Baa, baa . . .
—Ibid

—and, putting those Russians in their place,

Break, break, break . . .
—Tennyson

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE
Cambridge, Mass.

OCT 23

First Concert of 51st Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony orchestra has been giving regular series of concerts in Sanders theatre for fifty seasons. It is a long and glorious record of achievement under conductors from George Henschel to our present conductor, Dr. George Koussevitzky. The first concert of the 51st season was given on Thursday evening of last week. With this concert Dr. Koussevitzky began his eighth season as director of the orchestra. The program for this concert included two organ choral preludes by J. S. Bach orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg; Brahms' fourth symphony in E minor; "Les Aeolides" by Cesar Franck and the second suite from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe" by Maurice Ravel.

Bach's two chorals, heard here originally a few seasons ago, in the modernized orchestral arrangement, show clever treatment, but those who have heard them played on the organ as originally intended, would fail to recognize them in the orchestral arrangement, for there is missing that something which only the organ can supply. The orchestra can never suggest the organ although the former has far greater variety and character.

Cesar Franck's "Aeolides" is an early work, which has not been heard here for a number of years. It has interesting moments but not an example of the composer at his best, nor one that will endure like his symphony, or some of his organ chorals or the piano and violin sonata.

Brahms' fourth and last symphony in E minor, received a memorable performance, ranking with that given in Boston at the Brahms Festival, two years ago. Formerly, hearing this symphony left the listener unmoved although admiring the unquestioned musicianship. Now, however, under Dr. Koussevitzky, one finds in it more of human tenderness and warmth, even if it were Brahms expressing his final thoughts.

Although Ravel's ballet suite is a marvellous medium for orchestral virtuosity, it should be given a rest for a season or two at least, for despite all its cleverness, there is comparatively little to find that is of intrinsic worth, beneath the glitter and show made by all the resources of the modern orchestra. Nevertheless it is something to admire in its way, when given in a manner that perhaps only our Boston orchestra can give it. Strong in every sense of the word; as a virtuoso performance, unrivalled for complete technical mastery as well as vividness of color and rhythm.

The second concert in the series will be on Thursday evening, Nov. 5.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

OCT 23 1931

BORIS KREININ DIES.

Member of Boston Orchestra Succumbs to Injuries.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 22.—Private funeral services will be held for Boris Kreinin, 52 years old, of Hemenway Street, Back Bay, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died at the city hospital today of injuries suffered when he was struck by a motor truck on his way home on Saturday night.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra members stood in silence for one minute at the rehearsal at Symphony Hall on receiving word of his death. He had been a member of the orchestra since 1925, playing at the second desk of the first violin section. In his native Russia he had been soloist and concertmaster in Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow and also had been soloist and assistant conductor at the Opera Theatre in Petrograd.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 23 1931

Boris Kreinin, Violinist

Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies of Injuries

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Oct. 22.—Boris Kreinin, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the City Hospital today of injuries received when struck by a motor truck on his way home Saturday night. He was fifty-two years old.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra members stood in silence for one minute at the rehearsal at Symphony Hall on receiving word of his death. He had been connected with the orchestra since 1925, playing at the second desk of the first violin section. In his native Russia he was soloist and concert master in Koussevitzky's Orchestra in Moscow and also had been soloist and assistant conductor at the Opera Theater at Petrograd.

39

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1931

Kreminin, Russian Musician, Dies Of Auto Injuries

BOSTON, Oct. 23. — Boris Kreinin, 52, [illegible] concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago.

He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera theater in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925.

When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 23 1931

KREININ DIES OF INJURIES

Boston, Oct. 22—(AP)—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile, several days ago. He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the opera theater at Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN

OCT 23 1931

BORIS KREININ.

BOSTON, Oct. 23.—Private funeral services are to be held for Boris Kerinin, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died yesterday at the City Hospital of injuries received on Saturday night when he was run down by a motor truck. Mr. Kreinin was 52 years old and had been a member of the orchestra since 1925, playing at the second desk of the first violin section.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

BORIS KREININ

BOSTON, Oct. 22, (AP)—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago. He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera theatre in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST STANDARD

OCT 2[illegible] 193

MUSICIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 22. (AP)—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

OCT 23 19[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

OCT 22 1931

NEWS FLASHES

BOSTON, Oct. 22 (AP)—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Kouscevitsky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries when struck by an automobile several days ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER

OCT 24 1931

First Woolsey Concert Nov. 10

On Tuesday evening, November 10, Vladimir Horowitz, noted Russian pianist, will appear in Woolsey hall, the occasion marking the first of the five fine musical events that will comprise the Woolsey hall concert series for 1931-32.

Following in order will be the Don Cossack Russian Male Chorus on December 2; Albert Spalding, American violinist, on January 12; the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 2, and Rosa Ponselle of the Metropolitan on March 30.

Although less than a month has elapsed since the first announcement of the annual series of brilliant musical events that is the highlight of New Haven's winter season, last year's tremendous subscription mark has already been passed, and many more subscribers will doubtless be added before Mr. Horowitz makes his bow here next month for the first time in a number of years.

Many reasons are advanced for the increasing interest in the Woolsey hall series, all of which are logical. This season's roster is particularly appealing by the all-around excellence of the offerings. Where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has generally ben the only event other than the soloists on the list, the new progra mprovides an additional notable feature in the Don Cossacks. Thirty-six in number, and led by the dynamic Serge Jaroff, these "Singing "Horsemen of the Steppes" proved to be the most important musical importation in years when they came to this country last season. Their return was signalized last week in New York, where they againr eecived the wide acclaim that characterized their first American appearance.

Plus the Boston Symphony and the Don Cossacks, three such brilliant soloists as Horowitz, Spalding and Ponselle round out a most varied and colorful schedule, and the popular prices for tickets to the entire course provide a powerful appeal to lovers of fine music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COVINGTON, KY.
POST

OCT 24 1931

Harold C. Morris Scoress Success

Cincinnatians, especially those in music circles, were interested in dispatches from Boston Saturday which told of the triumph accorded a Cincinnati Conservatory of Music graduate, Harold C. Morris, pianist and composer, who is soloist this week at the Friday and Saturday symphony concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Koussevitzky.

Morris played his own piano concerto at the concert Friday and was given an ovation.

Morris, who studied composition with Dr. Edgar Stillman Kelley of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music artist faculty, has been soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, playing one of his own compositions when Eugene Ysaye was conductor.

He married Cosby Dansby, who was studying at the Conservatory when he was also a student. They have a daughter, Susan, 6, and Mrs. Morris took her to Boston to hear her father play. Mr. and Mrs. Morris live in New York.

The New York Chamber Music Society is playing a new composition of Morris' this season. Last winter Morris' new composition for quintet was played by two widely known string quartets, including the New York String Quartet with Morris at the piano. Last week a composition of his was presented before the National Opera Club of New York.

Morris, who graduated from the Conservatory in 1913, was given an honorary degree of master of music from the Conservatory in 1922.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 24 1931

Number for Concert

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, to be played in Memorial Hall at 8:15 p. m. Thursday by the Boston Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, has not been previously heard in Columbus for six years. It is considered, next to the Fifth Symphony, the most popular of all Beethoven's works, and has been interpreted as military, pastoral, religious and festive music.

The box office at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts., is open daily for the sale of season tickets. Single concert tickets will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the box office and Thursday night at Memorial Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
POST

OCT 24 1931

Cincinnatians, especially those in music circles, were interested in dispatches from Boston Saturday which told of the triumph accorded a Cincinnati Conservatory of Music graduate, Harold C. Morris, pianist and composer, who is soloist this week at the Friday and Saturday symphony concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Koussevitzky.

Morris played his own piano concerto at the concert Friday and was given an ovation.

Morris, who studied composition with Dr. Edgar Stillman Kelley of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music artist faculty, has been soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, playing one of his own compositions when Eugene Ysaye was conductor.

He married Cosby Dansby, who was studying at the Conservatory when he was also a student. They have a daughter, Susan, 6, and Mrs. Morris took her to Boston to hear her father play. Mr. and Mrs. Morris live in New York.

The New York Chamber Music Society is playing a new composition of Morris' this season. Last winter Morris' new composition for quintet was played by two widely known string quartets, including the New York String Quartet with Morris at the piano. Last week a composition of his was presented before the National Opera Club of New York.

Morris, who graduated from the Conservatory in 1913, was given an honorary degree of master of music from the Conservatory in 1922.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN

OCT 24 19

Latest Recordings

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, plays Maurice Ravel's "La Valse" (Victor Records 7413-7414-A). This expresses an old established type of dance music in modern style. The melodies are tantalizingly similar to Viennese waltzes. "La Valse" requires three record sides. The fourth is an orchestration by Ravel of Debussy's Dance, originally a piano composition.

Trio No. 7 in B Flat Major, Opus 97, by Beethoven, is played by Alfred Cortot, Jacques Thibaud, Pablo Casals. This recording (Album M-92) is on five Victor records. The music represents various moods. A charming Scherzo (second movement) is replete with the bubbling mirth that often peeps through the more somber moments of Beethoven's compositions . . . and the Andante (third movement), lofty and inspiring, is one of the noblest melodies in all of his works.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
SAT. NIGHT

[illegible] 4 193[illegible]

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, now celebrating its fiftieth year, will play in Masonic Auditorium Wednesday evening under the auspices of the Philharmonic Concert Co. Director Serge Koussevitzky has arranged a program which includes Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 by Handel; two nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes, Debussy; Ravel's choregraphic poem, La Valse, and the Strauss tone poem, Ein Heldenleben.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CORTLAND, N. Y.
STANDARD

OCT 24 1931

charges of participating in a [illegible] in Russian ports.

Boris Kreinen, violinist of Boston Symphony Orchestra, dies of injuries reeived when struck [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

OCT 25 1931

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has announced th[illegible] will not experiment as deeply with modern music as he has heretofore.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

OCT 25 1931

MUSIC

By MARY B. SWAN

Orchestral Series Opens

It is certain that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, plays at Elmwood Music Hall tomorrow evening it will be given an ovation. The program chosen for the first concert in the Buffalo Musical Foundation series of four has been selected with extreme care.

Handel enthusiasts, particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic genius. This concerto, played by the full string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reveals as only such music could the marvelous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this famous organization. Dr. Koussevitzky will also play Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin. Liszt described the Prelude as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmost register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in Daphnis and Chloe. In sheer loveliness and grace, certain woodwind passages in dawn, and pantomime, of this suite, have perhaps been excelled by no other composer.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present as the principal number on the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. This score is often considered the greatest by the Russian master and of higher brilliance and finer texture than his Pathetic Symphony No. 6. Its first and last movements are characterized by the imposing theme Fate, as stated by the brass choir which is the dominating note of the score. In the finale, as well, the delightful folk melody, "In the Woods There Stood a Birch Tree," is introduced. The melodious slow movement has also a suggestion of a folk song. The Scherzo has a remarkable use of Pizzicati, and indeed the musicians lay down their bows and play practically the entire number by plucking the strings.

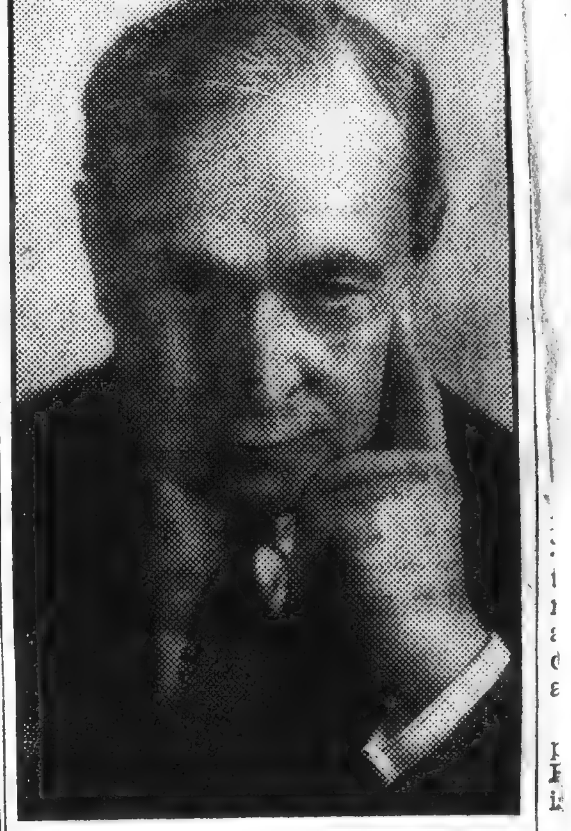
The complete program follows:

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Prelude to Lohengrin .... Wagner
Daphnis et Chloe, Ballet; Suite No. 2.
Lever du Jour-Pantomime-Danse Generale .... Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor—Op 36 .... Tchaikovsky

For the Boston symphony concert, and also for the series of four including the Chicago, Detroit and Cleveland orchestras, seats now are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

* * *

Conductor



Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall tomorrow evening.
—Photo by Garo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 25 1931

Serve Music Fifty Years

Boston Symphony Completes Half Century in Concert Work

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appears at Syria Mosque on Friday, has just completed a half century of concerts.

For 37 of this orchestra's 50 illustrious years it was the unequaled creation and possession of Henry L. Higginson, who, having established the first permanent American orchestra of the highest standard, brought a succession of the foremost conductors of each epoch to shape its beauties.

Among these were Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled the orchestra into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Then there were the brilliant years of Arthur Nikisch, and later of Dr. Karl Muck, who carried it to a then unprecedented state of virtuosity and beauty.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, profiting by this rich heritage, has added a new breadth of vision, and an utter command for its realization. Having passed the jubilee year, in many ways the summit of its long achievement, the Boston Symphony Orchestra approaches the fifty-first season with the same personnel, and a fame quite its own in the world of orchestral music.

Friday's program follows:

Handel—Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12.
Debussy—Two Nocturnes.
(a) Nuages.
(b) Fetes.
Ravel—La Valse, Choregraphic Poem.
Strause—Ein Heldenleben, Tone Poem Op. 40.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 25 1931

Boston Group to Lead Season of Symphonies

Boston Program.

As for the program which will be offered Thursday night, too much cannot be said for its excellence. The fact that the orchestra will play the Beethoven Seventh Symphony represents a victory on the part of Mrs. Huntington, who insisted on it in behalf of music lovers here. The composition has not previously been played in Columbus for six years.

One of the master's later compositions, it is considered by some his most magnificent. Certainly it ranked high in the poll taken last year of great men and women to discover their preferences in music. Moving as the music is, it is subject to so many and so varied interpretations by different people that it is impossible to characterize it.

This number will be played last on the program, which will open with the Handel Concert Grosso, number 12, in B minor, for strings. This number is calculated to show with brilliant effect the extraordinary beauty of the Boston orchestra.

The Prelude to Lohengrin, another number on the program, was described by Lizst as a "sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestial life."

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855."

Season tickets may be obtained daily from 9 to 5 p. m. at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. Single admission tickets will be for sale Wednesday and Thursday at the same place, or Thursday night in Memorial Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 23 1931

Kreminin, Russian Musician, Dies Of Auto Injuries

BOSTON, Oct. 23. — Boris Kreinin, 52, concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago.

He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera theater in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925.

When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 23 1931

KREININ DIES OF INJURIES

Boston, Oct. 22—(AP)—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile, several days ago. He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the opera theater at Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SUN
OCT 23 1931

BORIS KREININ.

BOSTON, Oct. 23.—Private funeral services are to be held for Boris Kerinin, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died yesterday at the City Hospital of injuries received on Saturday night when he was run down by a motor truck. Mr. Kreinin was 52 years old and had been a member of the orchestra since 1925, playing at the second desk of the first violin section.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

BORIS KREININ

BOSTON, Oct. 22, (AP)—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago. He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera theatre in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925. When outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST STANDARD
OCT 2 193

MUSICIAN DIES

BOSTON, Oct. 22. (AP)—Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
OCT 23 1931

CONCERT MASTER DIES

Boston, Oct. 22 — (AP) — Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's Orchestra in Moscow, died today of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago.

[illegible] 1931

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
OCT 24 1931

First Woolsey Concert Nov. 10

On Tuesday evening, November 10, Vladimir Horowitz, noted Russian pianist, will appear in Woolsey hall, the occasion marking the first of the five fine musical events that will comprise the Woolsey hall concert series for 1931-32.

Following in order will be the Don Cossack Russian Male Chorus on December 2; Albert Spalding, American violinist, on January 12; the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 2, and Rosa Ponselle of the Metropolitan on March 30.

Although less than a month has elapsed since the first announcement of the annual series of brilliant musical events that is the highlight of New Haven's winter season, last year's tremendous subscription mark has already been passed, and many more subscribers will doubtless be added before Mr. Horowitz makes his bow here next month for the first time in a number of years.

Many reasons are advanced for the increasing interest in the Woolsey hall series, all of which are logical. This season's roster is particularly appealing by the all-around excellence of the offerings. Where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has generally ben the only event other than the soloists on the list, the new progra mprovides an additional notable feature in the Don Cossacks. Thirty-six in number, and led by the dynamic Serge Jaroff, these "Singing "Horsemen of the Steppes" proved to be the most important musical importation in years when they came to this country last season. Their return was signalized last week in New York, where they againr eecived the wide acclaim that characterized their first American appearance.

Plus the Boston Symphony and the Don Cossacks, three such brilliant soloists as Horowitz, Spalding and Ponselle round out a most varied and colorful schedule, and the popular prices for tickets to the entire course provide a powerful appeal to lovers of fine music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COVINGTON, KY.
POST
OCT 24 1931

Harold C. Morris Scoress Success

Cincinnatians, especially those in music circles, were interested in dispatches from Boston Saturday which told of the triumph accorded a Cincinnati Conservatory of Music graduate, Harold C. Morris, pianist and composer, who is soloist this week at the Friday and Saturday symphony concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Koussevitzky.

Morris played his own piano concerto at the concert Friday and was given an ovation.

Morris, who studied composition with Dr. Edgar Stillman Kelley of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music artist faculty, has been soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, playing one of his own compositions when Eugene Ysaye was conductor.

He married Cosby Dansby, who was studying at the Conservatory when he was also a student. They have a daughter, Susan, 6, and Mrs. Morris took her to Boston to hear her father play. Mr. and Mrs. Morris live in New York.

The New York Chamber Music Society is playing a new composition of Morris' this season. Last winter Morris' new composition for quintet was played by two widely known string quartets, including the New York String Quartet with Morris at the piano. Last week a composition of his was presented before the National Opera Club of New York.

Morris, who graduated from the Conservatory in 1913, was given an honorary degree of master of music from the Conservatory in 1922.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 24 1931

Number for Concert

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, to be played in Memorial Hall at 8:15 p. m. Thursday by the Boston Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, has not been previously heard in Columbus for six years. It is considered, next to the Fifth Symphony, the most popular of all Beethoven's works, and has been interpreted as military, pastoral, religious and festive music.

The box office at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts., is open daily for the sale of season tickets. Single concert tickets will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the box office and Thursday night at Memorial Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI, O.
POST
OCT 24 1931

Cincinnatians, especially those in music circles, were interested in dispatches from Boston Saturday which told of the triumph accorded a Cincinnati Conservatory of Music graduate, Harold C. Morris, pianist and composer, who is soloist this week at the Friday and Saturday symphony concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Koussevitzky.

Morris played his own piano concerto at the concert Friday and was given an ovation.

Morris, who studied composition with Dr. Edgar Stillman Kelley of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music artist faculty, has been soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, playing one of his own compositions when Eugene Ysaye was conductor.

He married Cosby Dansby, who was studying at the Conservatory when he was also a student. They have a daughter, Susan, 6, and Mrs. Morris took her to Boston to hear her father play. Mr. and Mrs. Morris live in New York.

The New York Chamber Music Society is playing a new composition of Morris' this season. Last winter Morris' new composition for quintet was played by two widely known string quartets, including the New York String Quartet with Morris at the piano. Last week a composition of his was presented before the National Opera Club of New York.

Morris, who graduated from the Conservatory in 1913, was given an honorary degree of master of music from the Conservatory in 1922.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CALL BULLETIN
OCT 24 19

Latest Recordings

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, plays Maurice Ravel's "La Valse" (Victor Records 7413-7414-A). This expresses an old established type of dance music in modern style. The melodies are tantalizingly similar to Viennese waltzes. "La Valse" requires three record sides. The fourth is an orchestration by Ravel of Debussy's Dance, originally a piano composition.

Trio No. 7 in B Flat Major, Opus 97, by Beethoven, is played by Alfred Cortot, Jacques Thibaud, Pablo Casals. This recording (Album M-92) is on five Victor records. The music represents various moods. A charming Scherzo (second movement) is replete with the bubbling mirth that often peeps through the more somber moments of Beethoven's compositions . . . and the Andante (third movement), lofty and inspiring, is one of the noblest melodies in all of his works.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
SAT. NIGHT
[illegible] 4 1931

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, now celebrating its fiftieth year, will play in Masonic Auditorium Wednesday evening under the auspices of the Philharmonic Concert Co. Director Serge Koussevitzky has arranged a program which includes Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 by Handel; two nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes, Debussy; Ravel's choregraphic poem, La Valse, and the Strauss tone poem, Ein Heldenleben.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CORTLAND, N. Y.
STANDARD
OCT 24 1931

charges of participating in a in Russian ports.

Boris Kreinen, violinist of Boston Symphony Orchestra, dies of injuries reeived when

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
OCT 25 1931

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, has announced th[illegible] will not experiment as deeply with modern music as he has heretofore.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
OCT 25 1931

MUSIC

By MARY B. SWAN

Orchestral Series Opens

It is certain that when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, plays at Elmwood Music Hall tomorrow evening it will be given an ovation. The program chosen for the first concert in the Buffalo Musical Foundation series of four has been selected with extreme care.

Handel enthusiasts, particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic genius. This concerto, played by the full string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reveals as only such music could the marvelous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this famous organization. Dr. Koussevitzky will also play Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin. Liszt described the Prelude as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmost register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in Daphnis and Chloe. In sheer loveliness and grace, certain woodwind passages in dawn, and pantomime, of this suite, have perhaps been excelled by no other composer.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present as the principal number on the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. This score is often considered the greatest by the Russian master and of higher brilliance and finer texture than his Pathetic Symphony No. 6. Its first and last movements are characterized by the imposing theme Fate, as stated by the brass choir which is the dominating note of the score. In the finale, as well, the delightful folk melody, "In the Woods There Stood a Birch Tree," is introduced. The melodious slow movement has also a suggestion of a folk song. The Scherzo has a remarkable use of Pizzicati, and indeed the musicians lay down their bows and play practically the entire number by plucking the strings.

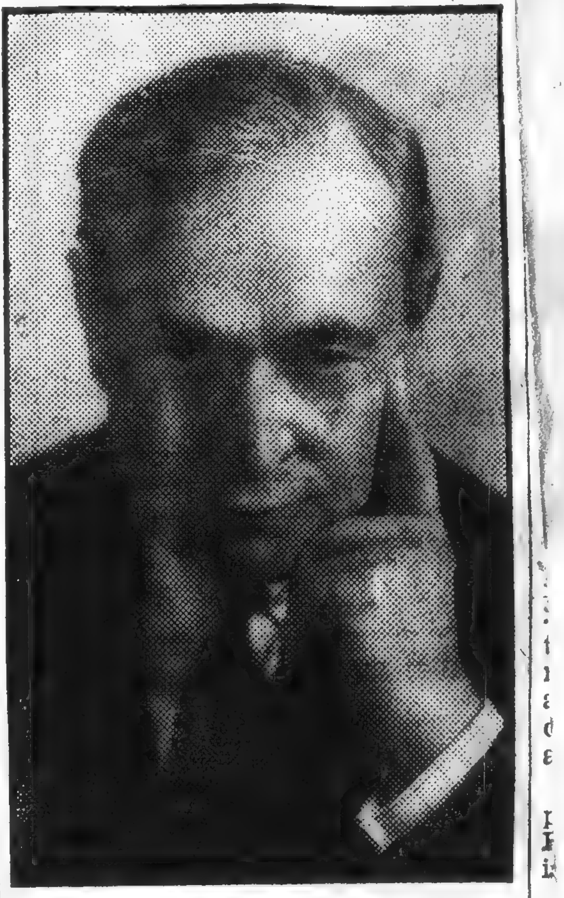
The complete program follows:

Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Prelude to Lohengrin .... Wagner
Daphnis et Chloe, Ballet; Suite No. 2.
Lever du Jour-Pantomime-Danse Generale .... Ravel
Symphony No. 4 in F. Minor—Op 36 .... Tchaikovsky

For the Boston symphony concert, and also for the series of four including the Chicago, Detroit and Cleveland orchestras, seats now are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

* * *

Conductor



Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall tomorrow evening.
—Photo by Garo

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 25 1931

Serve Music Fifty Years

Boston Symphony Completes Half Century in Concert Work

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appears at Syria Mosque on Friday, has just completed a half century of concerts.

For 37 of this orchestra's 50 illustrious years it was the unequaled creation and possession of Henry L. Higginson, who, having established the first permanent American orchestra of the highest standard, brought a succession of the foremost conductors of each epoch to shape its beauties.

Among these were Wilhelm Gericke, who through 12 years drilled the orchestra into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Then there were the brilliant years of Arthur Nikisch, and later of Dr. Karl Muck, who carried it to a then unprecedented state of virtuosity and beauty.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, profiting by this rich heritage, has added a new breadth of vision, and an utter command for its realization. Having passed the jubilee year, in many ways the summit of its long achievement, the Boston Symphony Orchestra approaches the fifty-first season with the same personnel, and a fame quite its own in the world of orchestral music.

Friday's program follows:

Handel—Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12.
Debussy—Two Nocturnes.
(a) Nuages.
(b) Fetes.
Ravel—La Valse, Choregraphic Poem.
Strause—Ein Heldenleben, Tone Poem Op. 40.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 25 1931

Boston Group to Lead Season of Symphonies

Boston Program.

As for the program which will be offered Thursday night, too much cannot be said for its excellence. The fact that the orchestra will play the Beethoven Seventh Symphony represents a victory on the part of Mrs. Huntington, who insisted on it in behalf of music lovers here. The composition has not previously been played in Columbus for six years.

One of the master's later compositions, it is considered by some his most magnificent. Certainly it ranked high in the poll taken last year of great men and women to discover their preferences in music. Moving as the music is, it is subject to so many and so varied interpretations by different people that it is impossible to characterize it.

This number will be played last on the program, which will open with the Handel Concert Grosso, number 12, in B minor, for strings. This number is calculated to show with brilliant effect the extraordinary beauty of the Boston orchestra.

The Prelude to Lohengrin, another number on the program, was described by Lizst as a "sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life."

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855."

Season tickets may be obtained daily from 9 to 5 p. m. at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. Single admission tickets will be for sale Wednesday and Thursday at the same place, or Thursday night in Memorial Hall.

40

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune
OCT 25 1931

Koussevitzky Here Nov. 19 and 21; Opens 8th Boston Season

Orchestra to Give Ten Concerts at Carnegie Hall Besides Five in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just completed the third week of its home season in Symphony Hall. The coming week will be devoted to a westward tour on concerts in Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca.

In New York, the orchestra will give its usual five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evenings, November 19 and January 7; Friday evening, February 5, and Thursday evening, March 3 and April 7; and Saturday afternoons, November 21, January 9, February 6, March 5 and April 9. Five concerts will also be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Novelties thus far offered by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston were Mahler's ninth symphony, October 16-17, and a new piano concerto by Harold Morris, given yesterday and last Friday with the composer as soloist. Other novelties to be offered in Boston this season are a symphonic ode composed for this orchestra by Aaron Copland; "Music for Orchestra" by Constant Lambert; a suite by Ernest Toch, six pieces by Anton von Webern, "Scene Carnavalesque" by Riccardo Dick-Mangiagalli; a concerto grosso by Martelli, Miaskovsky's "Concertino Lyrique," Respighi's orchestration of Rachmaninoff's "Etudes Tableaux," a suit by Frid, Stravinsky's violin concerto, a symphony by Louis Gruenberg and a symphony by Paul Ferroud.

Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Mahler's sixth symphony and Bruckner's third and eighth symphonies, and, among other infrequently performed works, Sibelius's fourth symphony, Reger's Hiller Variations, Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabin's "Urometheus." On the hundredth anniversary of Goethe's death next March, Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Brahm's rhapsody for alto, both employing Goethe texts, will be played. The choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe will take part with the orchestra in Mozart's Requiem and Bach's B minor Mass.

Among scores which are not yet completed, but are to be performed by the Boston Symphony for the first time are Sibelius's eighth symphony; an "Epitaph" for chorus and orchestra by Vladimir Dukelsky and Florent Schmidt's piano concerto.

This is the orchestra's fifty-first season, and its eighth under Koussevitzky's direction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 25 1931

Boston Orchestra To Play Strauss

THE APPEARANCE of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Masonic Auditorium next Wednesday evening, promises to be a social as well as a musical event.

During the days of the Detroit Orchestral Association, which was the forerunner of the present Detroit Symphony Society, appearances of the famous Boston band were always hailed as outstanding events of the season.

The appearance of the Boston organization at this time is of special significance as this is the fiftieth anniversary year. To celebrate the half century of existence the orchestra is appearing in a few of the larger cities bringing its entire personnel of 110 men.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has appeared in Detroit once before as director of the Boston Orchestra and his achievements in the East are well known to the local musical public.

For the Detroit concert Doctor Koussevitzky has arranged a programme of unusual variety:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra
in B Minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
a. Nuages
b. Fetes
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem .. Ravel
"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem,
Op. 40 .... Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 25 1931

FUTURE MU

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a concert here on Friday, Oct. 30, will coincide with the rounding out of the organization's first 50 years.

Since its last visit here a new and surpassingly brilliant era has been added to the history of the illustrious organization whose name has so long been associated with the utmost perfection in symphonic performance.

It was in the autumn of 1924 that Serge Koussevitzky came to America to head the orchestra. Fabulous reports had come from Europe about the Russian genius. The orchestra which he had assembled in Russia before the war, and his concerts in Moscow and Petrograd were still famous, though no longer existing. Koussevitzky was also known by the repute of his Volga expeditions, when he journeyed 2,500 miles in a specially chartered steamer, carrying symphony concerts into the great interior of Russia.

After the Revolution, Koussevitzky became the talk of London and Paris on account of his annual series of concerts in each city.

In America, Koussevitzky came to what was undoubtedly the finest orchestra he had ever had to do his bidding.

The orchestra, reaffirming its traditional fame, responds as a rare, single instrument to the slightest gesture of the commander.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America, all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists of prospective subscribers in New York and in Boston as well, even though concerts in the orchestra's own locality have been increased to five series, or more than 70 concerts.

* * *

Symphony Society

Here Friday

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky
The eminent Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque, Friday evening of this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra In Nearby Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra will present a concert in Memorial hall, Columbus, Thursday evening under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

This orchestra was engaged for concert in Dayton under the recently cancelled symphony course.

Memorial hall in Columbus has been recently equipped with new seats, which do away with the noise and clatter which in the past proved an annoyance to concert goers.

The program for the evening includes:

Handel—Concerto grosso for string orchestra. B minor No. 12.
Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Ravel—"La Valse" Choregraphic poem.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.

Anyone desiring to arrange for seats may do so through Patricia O'Brien, 114 North Main street (Anderson-Soward company).

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 25 1931

Visitor

Noted Conductor Brings Boston Orchestra Here Wednesday.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE following program is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday evening, Oct. 28, at Masonic Auditorium: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12; Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," and "Fetes"; Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse", and Strauss' Tone Poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

The Concerto Grosso is played by the full string section of the orchestra. Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," reveal this composer as an impressionist painter. It is music of mood and subtle suggestion.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument on the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855." Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prud'homme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass."

Richard Strauss wrote "Ein Heldenleben" (a Hero Life) at the conclusion of the past century. It was first performed in the United States by Theodore Thomas in Chicago in March, 1900, performances following in other cities. The score called for an unusually large orchestra; many special instruments of brass and percussion being employed in the battle episode. Strauss, in this score, depicts the career of a hero. It opens with the typical valiant theme which describes the hero's character. A second episode is called "The Hero's Adversaries," envious and mocking. Then the hero's "Helpmate" is set forth in which the solo violin presents the tender feminine motive. A flourish of trumpets announces the battle in which the hero overcomes his foes. "The Hero's Mission of Peace" gives an autobiographical touch to this musical narrative, quoting themes from Strauss' foremost works — "Don Juan," "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Tod und Verklarung," "Don Quixote," "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche" and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
OCT 25 1931

Kreinin, Russian Musician, Dies of Auto Injuries

BOSTON, Oct. 24.—Boris Kreinin, fifty-two, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago.

He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera Theater in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 19[illegible] outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH
OCT 25 1931

Community Aid and Fine Art On Symphony Club's Agenda

Boston Symphony Is To Be Opening Concert

COLUMBUS draws near the opening of its 1931-32 music season with increasing excitement at the extraordinary number of excellent features to be offered. This year will be remembered for several things, but chief among them probably will be two:

This year the Symphony Club of Central Ohio offers, for the first time in its eight years of life, five great orchestras instead of four.

NEW SEATS READY.

Memorial hall seats—for many years the bugbear of concert-goers—have been completely done over, being padded and covered with composition leather in a neutral green color. Not only that, they have been blocked to a comfortable angle, reducing the danger of slipping forward in an unwary moment. These seats are the permanent gift of the Symphony club, of which Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington is president and Mrs. F. A. Miller associate president. Cost of the work was defrayed by a fund started by Mrs. Miller.

A CALL TO QUIET.

One other matter: Among the innovations will be a change in concert etiquette. Applause between movements of symphonies, and between divisions of other compositions, will be discouraged. Objections to this habit have been voiced by orchestra leaders in the past, and the cry for quiet during long numbers, even when they are divided by long pauses, is being taken up by educators and lecturers of Columbus. A special lecture on the subject is being prepared by Dr. Royal Hughes of the music department of Ohio State university for use in his classes.

SERIES IS UNUSUAL.

Of course, the series itself is the best news of all, starting as it does with the peerless Boston Symphony orchestra under the superb direction of the famous Serge Koussevitzky, next Thursday evening.

But even the appearance of the Boston cannot dim the prospect of the four following numbers in this series, which closes April 5 with the advent of the Chicago orchestra.

The Detroit Symphony, which will bring to Columbus besides its regular personnel a Columbus girl who has won fame abroad, is scheduled for Tuesday evening, Dec. 1. Miss Florence Stage, who early began her training here as a pianist, comes back with the Detroit orchestra to play a piano concerto under the baton of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, himself a great pianist and a great admirer of Miss Stage.

Taste for modern music became strongly developed in Vienna, but Brahms and Chopin remained among Miss Stage's favorites.

Miss Stage comes to Memorial hall fresh from successes abroad, where she was acclaimed by music critics in Germany, Italy and Czechoslovakia.

The Cincinnati Symphony orchestra and the Cleveland orchestra are the two other attractions scheduled for Feb. 8 and March 7, respectively.

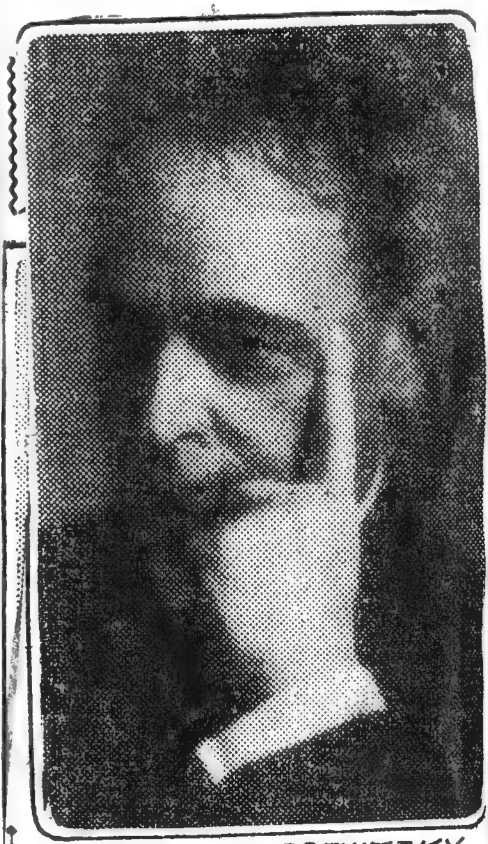
SALE IS AT KOCH'S.

Season tickets are on sale daily from 9 to 5 p. m. at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Single admission seats will be available Wednesday and Thursday at the same place, or in Memorial hall the night of the concert.

The complete program follows:

Concerto Grosso for String
Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 .. Handel
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—
Large—Allegro.
(First Time In Columbus)
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem ... Ravel
INTERMISSION.
Symphony No. 7 in A Major,
Op. 92 .... Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 25 1931



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
~~(CONDUCTOR)~~
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
OCT 25 1931

WILL CONDUCT ON WEDNESDAY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Masonic Auditorium Wednesday evening, promises to be a social as well as a musical event.

During the days of the Detroit Orchestral Association which was the forerunner of the present Detroit Symphony Society, appearances of the Boston Band were always hailed as outstanding events of the season. The appearance of the organization of 111 men at this time is of special significance as this is the 50th anniversary year.

Dr. Koussevitzky has appeared in Detroit once before as director of the Boston Orchestra and his achievements in the past are well known to the local musical public. For the local concert Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program of excellence and the occasion is certain to mark a high spot in the season's activities. Following is the complete program:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra
in B Minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Two Noctures .... Debussy
(a) Nuages
(b) Fetes
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem .... Ravel
"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem,
Op. 40 .... Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald Tribune

40

OCT 25 1931

Koussevitzky Here Nov. 19 and 21; Opens 8th Boston Season

Orchestra to Give Ten Concerts at Carnegie Hall Besides Five in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just completed the third week of its home season in Symphony Hall. The coming week will be devoted to a westward tour on concerts in Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca.

In New York, the orchestra will give its usual five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evenings, November 19 and January 7; Friday evening, February 5, and Thursday evening, March 3 and April 7; and Saturday afternoons, November 21, January 9, February 6, March 5 and April 9. Five concerts will also be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Novelties thus far offered by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston were Mahler's ninth symphony, October 16-17, and a new piano concerto by Harold Morris, given yesterday and last Friday with the composer as soloist. Other novelties to be offered in Boston this season are a symphonic ode composed for this orchestra by Aaron Copland; "Music for Orchestra" by Constant Lambert; a suite by Ernest Toch, six pieces by Anton von Webern, "Scene Carnavalesque" by Riccardo Dick-Mangiagalli; a concerto grosso by Martelli, Miaskovsky's "Concertino Lyrique," Respighi's orchestration of Rachmaninoff's "Etudes Tableaux," a suit by Frid, Stravinsky's violin concerto, a symphony by Louis Gruenberg and a symphony by Paul Ferroud.

Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Mahler's sixth symphony and Bruckner's third and eighth symphonies, and, among other infrequently performed works, Sibelius's fourth symphony, Reger's Hiller Variations, Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabin's "Urometheus." On the hundredth anniversary of Goethe's death next March, Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Brahm's rhapsody for alto, both employing Goethe texts, will be played. The choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe will take part with the orchestra in Mozart's Requiem and Bach's B minor Mass.

Among scores which are not yet completed, but are to be performed by the Boston Symphony for the first time are Sibelius's eighth symphony; an "Epitaph" for chorus and orchestra by Vladimir Dukelsky and Florent Schmidt's piano concerto.

This is the orchestra's fifty-first season, and its eighth under Koussevitzky's direction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

OCT 25 1931

Boston Orchestra To Play Strauss

THE APPEARANCE of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Masonic Auditorium next Wednesday evening, promises to be a social as well as a musical event.

During the days of the Detroit Orchestral Association, which was the forerunner of the present Detroit Symphony Society, appearances of the famous Boston band were always hailed as outstanding events of the season.

The appearance of the Boston organization at this time is of special significance as this is the fiftieth anniversary year. To celebrate the half century of existence the orchestra is appearing in a few of the larger cities bringing its entire personnel of 110 men.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has appeared in Detroit once before as director of the Boston Orchestra and his achievements in the East are well known to the local musical public.

For the Detroit concert Doctor Koussevitzky has arranged a programme of unusual variety:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra
in B Minor, No. 12 ....Handel
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
a. Nuages
b. Fetes
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem..Ravel
"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem,
Op. 40 ....Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 25 1931

FUTURE MU

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give a concert here on Friday, Oct. 30, will coincide with the rounding out of the organization's first 50 years.

Since its last visit here a new and surpassingly brilliant era has been added to the history of the illustrious organization whose name has so long been associated with the utmost perfection in symphonic performance.

It was in the autumn of 1924 that Serge Koussevitzky came to America to head the orchestra. Fabulous reports had come from Europe about the Russian genius. The orchestra which he had assembled in Russia before the war, and his concerts in Moscow and Petrograd were still famous, though no longer existing. Koussevitzky was also known by the repute of his Volga expeditions, when he journeyed 2,500 miles in a specially chartered steamer, carrying symphony concerts into the great interior of Russia.

After the Revolution, Koussevitzky became the talk of London and Paris on account of his annual series of concerts in each city.

In America, Koussevitzky came to what was undoubtedly the finest orchestra he had ever had to do his bidding.

The orchestra, reaffirming its traditional fame, responds as a rare, single instrument to the slightest gesture of the commander.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America, all places for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists of prospective subscribers in New York and in Boston as well, even though concerts in the orchestra's own locality have been increased to five series, or more than 70 concerts.

* * *

Symphony Society

Here Friday

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky
The eminent Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque, Friday evening of this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

Boston Orchestra In Nearby Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra will present a concert in Memorial hall, Columbus, Thursday evening under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

This orchestra was engaged for concert in Dayton under the recently cancelled symphony course.

Memorial hall in Columbus has been recently equipped with new seats, which do away with the noise and clatter which in the past proved an annoyance to concert goers.

The program for the evening includes:

Handel—Concerto grosso for string orchestra. B minor No. 12.
Wagner—Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Ravel—"La Valse" Choregraphic poem.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.

Anyone desiring to arrange for seats may do so through Patricia O'Brien, 114 North Main street (Anderson-Soward company).

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 25 1931

Visitor

Noted Conductor Brings Boston Orchestra Here Wednesday.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE following program is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday evening, Oct. 28, at Masonic Auditorium: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12; Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," and "Fetes"; Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse", and Strauss' Tone Poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

The Concerto Grosso is played by the full string section of the orchestra. Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," reveal this composer as an impressionist painter. It is music of mood and subtle suggestion.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument on the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855." Its first Paris performance led a critic to quote Prud'homme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano." He described it by saying: "There is a certain threatening in this bacchanale, a drunkenness, as it were, warning itself of its decay, perhaps by the dissonances and shock of timbres, especially the repeated combinations in which the strings grate against the brass."

Richard Strauss wrote "Ein Heldenleben" (a Hero Life) at the conclusion of the past century. It was first performed in the United States by Theodore Thomas in Chicago in March, 1900, performances following in other cities. The score called for an unusually large orchestra; many special instruments of brass and percussion being employed in the battle episode. Strauss, in this score, depicts the career of a hero. It opens with the typical valiant theme which describes the hero's character. A second episode is called "The Hero's Adversaries," envious and mocking. Then the hero's "Helpmate" is set forth in which the solo violin presents the tender feminine motive. A flourish of trumpets announces the battle in which the hero overcomes his foes. "The Hero's Mission of Peace" gives an autobiographical touch to this musical narrative, quoting themes from Strauss' foremost works — "Don Juan," "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Tod und Verklarung," "Don Quixote," "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche" and others.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

T 25 193

Kreinin, Russian Musician, Dies of Auto Injuries

BOSTON, Oct. 24.—Boris Kreinin, fifty-two, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, died of injuries received when struck by an automobile several days ago.

He was once soloist and assistant conductor in the Opera Theater in Petrograd and had been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since [illegible] outdoor concerts were inaugurated in 1929 he was made concert master. He leaves a widow and son.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 25 1931

Community Aid and Fine Art On Symphony Club's Agenda

Boston Symphony Is To Be Opening Concert

COLUMBUS draws near the opening of its 1931-32 music season with increasing excitement at the extraordinary number of excellent features to be offered. This year will be remembered for several things, but chief among them probably will be two:

This year the Symphony Club of Central Ohio offers, for the first time in its eight years of life, five great orchestras instead of four.

NEW SEATS READY.

Memorial hall seats—for many years the bugbear of concert-goers—have been completely done over, being padded and covered with composition leather in a neutral green color. Not only that, they have been blocked to a comfortable angle, reducing the danger of slipping forward in an unwary moment. These seats are the permanent gift of the Symphony club, of which Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington is president and Mrs. F. A. Miller associate president. Cost of the work was defrayed by a fund started by Mrs. Miller.

A CALL TO QUIET.

One other matter: Among the innovations will be a change in concert etiquette. Applause between movements of symphonies, and between divisions of other compositions, will be discouraged. Objections to this habit have been voiced by orchestra leaders in the past, and the cry for quiet during long numbers, even when they are divided by long pauses, is being taken up by educators and lecturers of Columbus. A special lecture on the subject is being prepared by Dr. Royal Hughes of the music department of Ohio State university for use in his classes.

SERIES IS UNUSUAL.

Of course, the series itself is the best news of all, starting as it does with the peerless Boston Symphony orchestra under the superb direction of the famous Serge Koussevitzky, next Thursday evening.

But even the appearance of the Boston cannot dim the prospect of the four following numbers in this series, which closes April 5 with the advent of the Chicago orchestra.

The Detroit Symphony, which will bring to Columbus besides its regular personnel a Columbus girl who has won fame abroad, is scheduled for Tuesday evening, Dec. 1. Miss Florence Stage, who early began her training here as a pianist, comes back with the Detroit orchestra to play a piano concerto under the baton of Ossip Gabrlowitsch, himself a great pianist and a great admirer of Miss Stage.

Taste for modern music became strongly developed in Vienna, but Brahms and Chopin remained among Miss Stage's favorites.

Miss Stage comes to Memorial hall fresh from successes abroad, where she was acclaimed by music critics in many, Italy and Czechoslovakia.

e Cincinnati Symphony orches- nd the Cleveland orchestra are wo other attractions scheduled b. 8 and March 7, respectively.

IS AT KOCH'S.

n tickets are on sale daily from p. m. at the Carl Koch Co., d Broad streets. Single ad- on seats will be available Wednesday and Thursday at the same place, or in Memorial hall the night of the concert.

The complete program follows:

Concerto Grosso for String
Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 .. Handel
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—
Large—Allegro.
(First Time In Columbus)
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem ...Ravel
INTERMISSION.
Symphony No. 7 in A Major,
Op. 92 .... Beethoven
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
Allegretto.
Presto; Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
Allegro con brio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 25 1931

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
(CONDUCTOR)
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 25 1931

WILL CONDUCT ON WEDNESDAY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Masonic Auditorium Wednesday evening, promises to be a social as well as a musical event.

During the days of the Detroit Orchestral Association which was the forerunner of the present Detroit Symphony Society, appearances of the Boston Band were always hailed as outstanding events of the season. The appearance of the organization of 111 men at this time is of special significance as this is the 50th anniversary year.

Dr. Koussevitzky has appeared in Detroit once before as director of the Boston Orchestra and his achievements in the past are well known to the local musical public. For the local concert Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged a program of excellence and the occasion is certain to mark a high spot in the season's activities. Following is the complete program:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra
in B Minor, No. 12..............Handel
Two Noctures ....Debussy
(a) Nuages
(b) Fetes
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem........Ravel
"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem,
Op. 40 ....Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 25 1931

Koussevitzky to Feature 'Ein Heldenleben' Here

The following program is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening, October 30, at Syria Mosque: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes;" Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

Handel enthusiasts particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic genius. This concerto, played by the full string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reveals as only such music could, the marvelous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this famous organization.

The French school will be represented by Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." These pieces distinctly reveal this master as an impressionist painter, and the fact that he painted in tones instead of in pigments, makes the classification all the more striking.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855." Its first Paris performances led a critic to quote Prud'homme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano."

Richard Strauss wrote his masterly score, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life") at the conclusion of the past century. It was first performed in the United States by Theodore Thomas in Chicago, March 1900, performances following in other cities in quick succession. The score called for an unusually large orchestra, many special instruments of brass and percussion being employed in the famous battle episode. Strauss, in this score, depicts the career of a hero according to the free fantasy of this, his most highly creative life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

1931

OFFER MUSIC AT ANN ARBOR

Boston Orchestra in Concert Tuesday

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 24—The following program is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here Tuesday in the Choral Union Series: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet, Second Suite; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Op. 92.

Handel's Concerto, played by the full string section of the Orchestra, reveals as only such music could the marvellous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this famous organization.

Liszt described the Prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magio formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmost register of the orchestra.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tonepainters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy.

The Beethoven Symphony stands with the Fifth and Ninth in the grandeur of its conception; it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms.

Other concerts in the Series are Ossip Gabrilowitsch, in piano recital, Nov. 17; The Revelers, Dec. 3; Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director, Dec. 15; Don Cossack Russian Chorus, Serge Jaroff, conductor, Jan. 13; Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Rudolf Siegel, guest conductor, Jan. 25; Yehudi Menuhin, Feb. 4; Percy Grainger, Feb. 19, and Rosa Ponselle, March 7.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH HERALD

T 25 19

* * *

That the Boston Symphony orchestra is beginning its season with an unchanged personnel and a schedule of concerts, which is the largest in its history, speaks very well for the conductor Serge Koussevitzky. During this week the orchestra will tour, appearing in Buffalo, Pittsburgh and other cities, going as far west as Detroit.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 25 1931

A member of the Boston Symphony orchestra was fatally injured by an automobile truck when on his way home after the concert in Boston a week ago. He was a native of Russia, like Dr Koussevitzky, the conductor, and was a musician of some standing. A fatal accident to a pedestrian who happens to be a man of special talent is no different from any other, so far as public responsibility for highway safety is concerned. But the public might well be made more conscious of its responsibility by the victim's possession of some socially available talent, capacity or disposition. Such, however, is seldom the case. It is difficult to arouse public interest in the problem of making the streets safe for persons on foot, no matter who suffers or how distressing the circumstances. Even the high cost of motor insurance has not fully taught the lesson that reasonable safety—which no state at present has attained—is economical as well as socially desirable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

1931

TCHAIKOVSKY'S Fourth Symphony, which will be the principal number on the Boston Symphony orchestra's program at Elmwood Music hall tomorrow evening, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was composed during the winter of 1877-78. Much romance centers around the symphony, which Tschaikovsky dedicated to "his best friend," Nadejda Von Meck, his senior by nearly ten years, a widow and the mother of eleven children.

Early in life, Nadejda married a railway engineer, who, with her help, amassed a great fortune. His widow was a woman of strong and sane intellect who cared nothing for society and lived an extremely secluded existence.

She was, however, passionately fond of music, and engaged the services of a young violinist named Kotek as "domestic musician." From him she heard of Tchaikovsky's private life, his dire poverty and his longing to give up teaching and devote himself to composition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 26 193

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Present Varied Program Tuesday

From the quiet beauty of a Handel concerto for strings to the consuming thunder of a Beethoven symphony will swing the famous Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert Tuesday evening in Hill auditorium. This musical organization premiere is the second presentation of the current Choral Union series and will be featured by the appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky with the conductor's baton.

The program in full includes: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor No. 12; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ravel's "Daphnis et Cloe", Ballet, Second Suite; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Op. 92.

Handel enthusiasts particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic genius. This concerto, played by the full string section of the Boston Symphony orchestra, reveals as only such music could the marvellous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this outstanding organization.

Liszt described the Prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the top-most register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail. It descends and becomes fullbodied, as man struggles to rise to the divine, ineffable gift. The Prelude ends as it began in the "clear blue of Heaven, and the presence of the Angelic Hosts."

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tonepainters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe". It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy. In sheer loveliness and grace, certain wood-wind passages in "dawn" and "pantomime" of this suite, have perhaps been excelled by no other composer. This score is also probably his largest canvas, and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes this suite. When Ravel made his only visit to America in 1928, he was guest of honor at the concert by this orchestra in Carnegie hall, N. Y. Koussevitzky conducted several of the eminent Frenchman's works, including this one. The composer, who sat in a box, was given an ovation by the New York public at the conclusion of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The symphony of the occasion will be the Seventh of Beethoven in A major, which, among the immortal nine, stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception; it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms. The impetus of the first and last movements sweeps all before them; the scherzo is as rapid a the divine allegretto. The Rhythmi pulse of this symphony led Wagne to call it "The apotheosis of th dance."

Other concerts in the Chora Union series will take place a follows: Ossip Gabrilowitsch, i piano recital on Nov. 17; Th Revelers, James Melton, first teno Lewis James, second tenor, Ph Dewey, baritone, Wilfred Glen bass and Frank Black, Direct and Pianist; Dec. 3, Detroit Syn phony Orchestra, Ossip Gabril witsch, conductor. Dec. 15; D Cossack Russian chorus, Ser Jaroff, conductor.Jan. 13; Detro Symphony orchestra, Dr. Rud Siegel, guest conductor, Jan. 2 Yehudi Menuhin, Feb. 4; Per Grainger, Feb. 19 and Rosa Po selle, March 7.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
DAILY PRESS
OCT 26 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY TO APPEAR TUESDAY

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BE HEARD IN ANN ARBOR SIXTH TIME

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 26— The Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be heard in Hill Auditorium in the Choral Union Series, Tuesday night, appeared in this series on five previous occasions. Twice during the early nineties, again about twenty-five years ago, their fourth appearance took place in the spring of 1913 being one of the last Choral Union Concerts to be heard in old University hall. In January 1917 they made their fifth appearance, this time in Hill Auditorium. It is thus nearly fifteen years since this organization has given a concert in Ann Arbor. On his previous tours, he has been presided over by such distinguished conductors as Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur and Karl Muck.

On this occasion Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the first Russian to direct America's most famous band of players, will be heard in Ann Arbor for the first time. Koussevitzky has been at the head of the organization for eight years and followed a long and distinguished line of great musicians of various nationalities, including George Hensohel, Max Fielder, Gericke, Emil Paur, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux etc. Unlike most of the great orchestras which usually curtail their personnel when on the road, the Boston Symphony always carry a full quota of men and on this occasion will bring 111 players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. BEE NEWS
OCT 26 1931

Words and Music

Koussevitzky's Rise and His Legend

By Deems Taylor

NEW YORK, Oct. 25.

A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter.

So the lad departed taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects, and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: The Conservatory and the Philharmonic school. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic school, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring.

* * *

Wins 11th Hour Chance

Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory, and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study; the French horn, the trombone, or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

* * *

Legends, Then Truth

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians Dragonetti and Bottesini.)

The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists, and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately choose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious; for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument. If the desire were enough, the subways would be jammed with Kreislers, Heifetzes, Zimbalists, Rachmaninoffs, Paderewskis, Casalses, and Salmonds.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

* * *

Catches Fleet Romance

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Madame Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian music publishing house, for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical, or too commercially unpromising, for other publishers to venture.

In order to save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrushka," on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw. When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but be bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian music publishing house, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

(Copyright, 1931)

INFORMATION OBSCURED

41

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 25 1931

Koussevitzky to Feature 'Ein Heldenleben' Here

The following program is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening, October 30, at Syria Mosque: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes;" Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," and Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

Handel enthusiasts particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic genius. This concerto, played by the full string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reveals as only such music could, the marvelous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this famous organization.

The French school will be represented by Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." These pieces distinctly reveal this master as an impressionist painter, and the fact that he painted in tones instead of in pigments, makes the classification all the more striking.

Ravel's "La Valse" bears this argument upon the printed score: "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter little by little. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An Imperial Court about 1855." Its first Paris performances led a critic to quote Prud'homme's revolutionary remark: "We dance on a volcano."

Richard Strauss wrote his masterly score, "Ein Heldenleben" ("A Hero's Life") at the conclusion of the past century. It was first performed in the United States by Theodore Thomas in Chicago, March 1900, performances following in other cities in quick succession. The score called for an unusually large orchestra, many special instruments of brass and percussion being employed in the famous battle episode. Strauss, in this score, depicts the career of a hero according to the free fantasy of this, his most highly creative life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 26 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Present Varied Program Tuesday

From the quiet beauty of a Handel concerto for strings to the consuming thunder of a Beethoven symphony will swing the famous Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert Tuesday evening in Hill auditorium. This musical organization premiere is the second presentation of the current Choral Union series and will be featured by the appearance of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky with the conductor's baton.

The program in full includes: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor No. 12; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ravel's "Daphnis et Cloe", Ballet, Second Suite; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Op. 92.

Handel enthusiasts particularly cherish the Concerto Grosso, the form into which the master wrote some of his pages of truest grandeur and melodic genius. This concerto, played by the full string section of the Boston Symphony orchestra, reveals as only such music could the marvellous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this outstanding organization.

Liszt described the Prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the top-most register of the orchestra. It is Wagner's first music of the Holy Grail. It descends and becomes fullbodied, as man struggles to rise to the divine, ineffable gift. The Prelude ends as it began in the "clear blue of Heaven, and the presence of the Angelic Hosts."

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe". It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy. In sheer loveliness and grace, certain wood-wind passages in "dawn" and "pantomime" of this suite, have perhaps been excelled by no other composer. This score is also probably his largest canvas, and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes this suite. When Ravel made his only visit to America in 1928, he was guest of honor at the concert by this orchestra in Carnegie hall, N. Y. Koussevitzky conducted several of the eminent Frenchman's works, including this one. The composer, who sat in a box, was given an ovation by the New York public at the conclusion of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The symphony of the occasion will be the Seventh of Beethoven in A major, which, among the immortal nine, stands with the fifth and ninth in the grandeur of its conception; it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms. The impetus of the first and last movements sweeps all before them; the scherzo is as rapid as the divine allegretto. The Rhythmic pulse of this symphony led Wagne to call it "The apotheosis of th dance."

Other concerts in the Chora Union series will take place a follows: Ossip Gabrilowitsch, i piano recital on Nov. 17; Th Revelers, James Melton, first teno Lewis James, second tenor, Ph Dewey, baritone, Wilfred Glen bass and Frank Black, Directo and Pianist; Dec. 3, Detroit Syn phony Orchestra, Ossip Gabrilo witsch, conductor. Dec. 15; Do Cossack Russian chorus, Serg Jaroff, conductor.Jan. 13; Detro Symphony orchestra, Dr. Rudo Siegel, guest conductor, Jan. 2 Yehudi Menuhin, Feb. 4; Per Grainger, Feb. 19 and Rosa Po selle, March 7.

THIS CLIPPING FROM OMAHA, NEB.
EVE. BEE NEWS
OCT 26 1931

Words and Music
Koussevitzky's Rise and His Legend

By Deems Taylor

NEW YORK, Oct. 25.

A youngster of 14 ran away from his Russian home because he wanted to study music.

He wanted to be a real musician—a professional, in fact. What sort of professional didn't particularly matter.

So the lad departed taking with him what clothes he had—they were not a heavy burden—and three rubles that he had saved. The three rubles took him as far as Moscow, where he arrived without a kopek in his pocket, with no prospects, and no acquaintances.

There were two training schools in Moscow: The Conservatory and the Philharmonic school. The boy, whose name was Serge Koussevitzky, went first to the Conservatory. Nothing. Examinations were over, the term had already begun, and no more pupils could be admitted. Come back next year.

So he went to the Philharmonic school, where he heard the same story. No more students; come back in the spring.

* * *

Wins 11th Hour Chance

Something in the boy's earnestness, his desperation, must have touched the heart of Shestakovsky, the director, for he suddenly relented and waived the rules. The boy should be allowed to take the entrance examination at once.

He passed the examination with ease. He had a good ear, a good musical memory, and sufficient knowledge of the rudiments to make him a possible student. But a new difficulty arose. Since the boy was penniless and homeless, he would have to be given one of the free scholarships, which also carried with them a small stipend. It was late in the season, however, and there were only three left. Nobody had wanted them. Which would he choose to study; the French horn, the trombone, or the double bass!

"I choose the double bass," he said.

* * *

Legends, Then Truth

There have been many rumors and conjectures as to how Koussevitzky came to choose the career that made him one of the three greatest double-bass virtuosi the world has ever seen (the other two were the Italians Dragonetti and Bottesini.)

The one most often repeated is that Koussevitzky, determined to make a name for himself, and seeing the ranks of the violinists, 'cellists, and pianists already studded with great names, deliberately choose an exotic instrument, in which he would have little competition.

This has always sounded stupid to me, as well as malicious; for it takes a good deal more than determination to become an outstanding performer on any instrument. If the desire were enough; the subways would be jammed with Kreislers, Heifetzes, Zimbalists, Rachmaninoffs, Paderewskis, Casalses, and Salmonds.

The true story sounds much more interesting and plausible. It is told in Arthur Lourie's new "Koussevitzky," a biography of the Russian conductor that has just been brought out by Alfred Knopf.

* * *

Catches Fleet Romance

In the book you will read the romantic story of his marriage to Madame Koussevitzky, whom he saw first among the audience at one of his recitals in 1901. It was two years before he even learned her name, and another year before he managed to meet her. They were married in 1905.

That same year he dropped the double-bass almost entirely in order to realize his greatest ambition, to be an orchestral conductor. He had made a fortune as a virtuoso.

He went to Moscow in 1909 and organized a series of orchestral concerts in his own name. He also founded the Russian music publishing house, for the exploitation of young Russian composers, with the particular aim of publishing scores that were too radical, or too commercially unpromising, for other publishers to venture.

In order to save the firm from the dangers of one-man rule, even his own, Koussevitzky organized a jury to pass upon all submitted manuscripts. The jury promptly turned down Stravinsky's "Petrushka," on the ground that it was "not music," and only accepted it after Koussevitzky had threatened to withdraw. When they rejected Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" he did not threaten; but be bought out another publishing house, made it a branch of the Russian music publishing house, and there published anything he happened to like, without consulting the jury.

(Copyright, 1931)

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

25 1931

OFFER MUSIC AT ANN ARBOR

Boston Orchestra in Concert Tuesday

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 24—The following program is announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here Tuesday in the Choral Union Series: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet, Second Suite; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Op. 92.

Handel's Concerto, played by the full string section of the Orchestra, reveals as only such music could the marvellous ensemble playing of the string choirs of this famous organization.

Liszt described the Prelude to "Lohengrin" as "a sort of magic formula which, like a mysterious initiation, prepares our souls for the sight of unaccustomed things, and of a higher signification than that of our terrestrial life." It begins with soft, unearthly chords in the topmost register of the orchestra.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy.

The Beethoven Symphony stands with the Fifth and Ninth in the grandeur of its conception; it leads them all in its swift course and impelling rhythms.

Other concerts in the Series are Ossip Gabrilowitsch, in piano recital, Nov. 17; The Revelers, Dec. 3; Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director, Dec. 15; Don Cossack Russian Chorus, Serge Jaroff, conductor, Jan. 13; Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Rudolf Siegel, guest conductor, Jan. 25; Yehudi Menuhin, Feb. 4; Percy Grainger, Feb. 19, and Rosa Ponselle, March 7.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH HERALD

T 25 19

* * *

That the Boston Symphony orchestra is beginning its season with an unchanged personnel and a schedule of concerts, which is the largest in its history, speaks very well for the conductor Serge Koussevitzky. During this week the orchestra will tour, appearing in Buffalo, Pittsburgh and other cities, going as far west as Detroit.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 25 1931

A member of the Boston Symphony orchestra was fatally injured by an automobile truck when on his way home after the concert in Boston a week ago. He was a native of Russia, like Dr Koussevitzky, the conductor, and was a musician of some standing. A fatal accident to a pedestrian who happens to be a man of special talent is no different from any other, so far as public responsibility for highway safety is concerned. But the public might well be made more conscious of its responsibility by the victim's possession of some socially available talent, capacity or disposition. Such, however, is seldom the case. It is difficult to arouse public interest in the problem of making the streets safe for persons on foot, no matter who suffers or how distressing the circumstances. Even the high cost of motor insurance has not fully taught the lesson that reasonable safety—which no state at present has attained—is economical as well as socially desirable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

25 1931

TCHAIKOVSKY'S Fourth Symphony, which will be the principal number on the Boston Symphony orchestra's program at Elmwood Music hall tomorrow evening, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was composed during the winter of 1877-78. Much romance centers around the symphony, which Tschaikovsky dedicated to "his best friend," Nadejda Von Meck, his senior by nearly ten years, a widow and the mother of eleven children.

Early in life, Nadejda married a railway engineer, who, with her help, amassed a great fortune. His widow was a woman of strong and sane intellect who cared nothing for society and lived an extremely secluded existence.

She was, however, passionately fond of music, and engaged the services of a young violinist named Kotek as "domestic musician." From him she heard of Tchaikovsky's private life, his dire poverty and his longing to give up teaching and devote himself to composition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
DAILY PRESS
OCT 26 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY TO APPEAR TUESDAY

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO BE HEARD IN ANN ARBOR SIXTH TIME

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 26— The Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be heard in Hill Auditorium in the Choral Union Series, Tuesday night, appeared in this series on five previous occasions. Twice during the early nineties, again about twenty-five years ago, their fourth appearance took place in the spring of 1913 being one of the last Choral Union Concerts to be heard in old University hall. In January 1917 they made their fifth appearance, this time in Hill Auditorium. It is thus nearly fifteen years since this organization has given a concert in Ann Arbor. On his previous tours, he has been presided over by such distinguished conductors as Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur and Karl Muck.

On this occasion Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the first Russian to direct America's most famous band of players, will be heard in Ann Arbor for the first time. Koussevitzky has been at the head of the organization for eight years and followed a long and distinguished line of great musicians of various nationalities, including George Hensohel, Max Fielder, Gericke, Emil Paur, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux etc. Unlike most of the great orchestras which usually curtail their personnel when on the road, the Boston Symphony always carry a full quota of men and on this occasion will bring 111 players.

42

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 27 1931

Symphony Superb

Boston Orchestra Opens Foundation Series Here

By EDWARD H. DURNEY

The return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a season's absence, made for an auspicious beginning of the Buffalo Musical Foundation's Symphony series, Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall. The superb Boston organization always a welcome guest here, was doubly so on the present occasion, and a huge audience received with open arms the distinguished conductor and his glorious company.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program ranging from Handel to Ravel, and with his accustomed master touch and electrifying spirit he led his players to signal achievement. The Koussevitzky art happily combines subtlety and vitality, grace and rugged energy, brilliance and profundity; and his sensitive instrument ever reflects the guiding hand of genius.

Is a far cry from the stately, for- measures of Handel to the com- does of Tchaikovsky and the free- sevit Ravel, yet how justly did Kous- comp publish the message of each the th And how memorable are the "Lo g climaxes he achieved in the grin" Prelude, the Ravel suite and evening's symphony!

The Han "Concerto Grosso," No. 12, for strin orchestra, the first item of the evenin fare, benefitted by the clearest possib utterance of strings in musical convers Every figure was traced in proper ief and the style of the whole was im ccable.

The familiar "L engrin" excerpt shone anew at the K ssevitzky touch, and perhaps the bit of ulty utterance of violins at the beginning and end may be condoned as mere eviden e that after all the Boston Symphony orchestra is made up of human beings.

Nothing was lovlier than the Ravel, the Suite No. 2 from the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet. Here is a choice example of the Ravel creature genius—orchestration of light and shade, breathing the fragrance of the wood, caressing as a gentle breeze, displaying a color range from the most delicate tints to riotous hues and ever pulsating with life. And in performance the composer was highly favored. It would be difficult to imagine a more glowing, more worthy performance of the work than that afforded by the Boston forces.

The evening's symphony was Tchaikovsky's fourth, distinguished among the Russian's symphonic works though surpassed in beauty and appeal by his fifth and sixth. This F Minor opus presents a plenitude of material, even an abundance of beauty, but its atmosphere often is feverish and its more turbulent pages offer the listening ear something of a task. The delicate Scherzo with its prolonged pizzicato never fails to exert charm and the Finale in its spirit and brilliance is redeeming.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky was one of clarifying qualities, brilliant, stimulating, always musicianly. And memory harked back to an admirable performance of the same work by the Boston orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux, several seasons ago.

Needless to say the evening's effort met with enthusiastic response on the part of the listeners, and that honors were shared by leader and led.

The Buffalo Musical foundation, of which Marion De Forest is local manager, will present three more orchestral concerts in the present series.

Those Noticed in Audience at Symphony Concert Here

A large and enthusiastic audience was present, among them Mr. and Mrs. Frederick B. Cooley and Miss Katrina Cooley, the latter wearing a white fur coat over a white frock. Mrs. Hans Schmidt and her daughter, Mrs. Gustav F. Watters were present, the latter in a black chiffon gown with deep yoke of beige chiffon and lace. Mr. and Mrs. Norman P. Clement attended, the latter in a cherry red velvet coat with fur collar; Mr. and Mrs. Roland L. O'Brian, the latter in red. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, the latter in black with long mink coat.

Others attending were Mrs. George Bleistein, Mrs. Clinton R. Wyckoff, Mrs. William Warren Smith, Mrs. Wesley P. Montgomery, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Mrs. Daniel W. Streeter, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Alden Rogers, Dr. and Mrs. Francescus Visser't Hooft, Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mrs. Archibald M. Hazard, Dr. Samuel Van Vranken Holmes, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mrs. Charles A. White, Mr. and Mrs. Ashford G. P. Murch, Mrs. William T. Jebb and Dr. and Mrs. Irving M. Snow.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

OCT 27 1931

Sergei Koussevitzky, the orchestra leader, is the subject of a new biography bearing his name, written by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 27 1931

NOTES ON MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BUFFALO WELCOMES BOSTON SYMPHONY

By MARY M. HOWARD
Times Music Critic

Bravo for Buffalo!

It gave a glad hand and royal welcome to Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony players when they appeared last evening in Elmwood Music hall, in the initial concert of the orchestral series sponsored by the Musical Foundation.

It was like the good old times to see the audience, that was almost a capacity house, and it made one believe that in a time of depression many turn to music for a renewal of courage and a surcease from worry. Well deserved was the tribute paid to this dominant figure among present day conductors, and to his men, many of whom merit the title of artist.

The organization this season is celebrating its golden jubilee, and it seems to have mounted a little nearer than ever before to the summit on which stands the ideal.

Variety and Contrast

As is his wont, Dr. Koussevitzky selected a program of wide variety and telling contrast, all, with the exception of the opening number, familiar works which his orchestra has played here in former seasons. Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor, one of 12 grand concertos which he composed in the period of a month, was a grateful program opener.

Like all this master's writings, it has a harmonic web in which every tone seems an integral and necessary part of the musical texture, and a direct, straightforward style that makes instant appeal. It was played with a simplicity and dignity wholly in keeping with the character of the music, and awoke a responsive mood in every hearer.

The inspired strains of the Lohengrin Prelude always work a potent spell. This music, which portrays the descent from heaven of the Holy Grail, borne by angel hands, is a marvelous embodiment of musical genius and a knowledge that understood how to produce results which seem spontaneous. Wagner divided his string choir into many fine strands of tone, sometimes eight voices at once, and thus secured the floating, ethereal harmonies that depict the descent to earth of the angelic host and their return to their celestial abode.

The Prelude was given with fine delicacy and tonal sweetness, although the ascent of the angelic visitants was not quite as successful as their descent, the final measures being marred by a rather weak and uncertain tone.

Ravel's Ballet Suite No. 2, "Daphnis et Chloe," followed. This atmospheric and modernistic work, full of the discords dear to the heart of composers of today, and yet fascinating in its piquant flavor even to those who do not relish so much dissonance, was played with refreshing spirit, as if the players themselves enjoyed it, and with constant care for light and shade.

Plays Favorite

Tschaikovsky's F minor symphony, No. 4, was the one which the composer chose to present when he was invited to New York as guest conductor at the dedication of Carnegie hall in 1891.

He gave the symphony a program. To quote briefly: "The opening theme is Fate, overwhelming, invincible. Nothing remains but to resign ourselves to it and to lament in vain." The second movement pictures the Fate motive stealing in here and there.

Koussevitzky, a master of his craft, entered with wonderful understanding into the spirit of the music, and rose nobly to its splendid climaxes. The performance was glowing with color, irresistible in rhythm. The men responded wholeheartedly and with instant precision to the interpretative impulses of their leader, and the result was a splendid and uplifting musical achievement. Many were the recalls for the conductor, who justly included his players in the demonstrations of approval.

Incidentally, a search among old concert programs revealed the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra d the Tschaikovsky fourth sym- y in Buffalo 25 years ago, in the auditorium, then called Conven- hall, and under Wilhelm Gericke, ctor. This was probably the first mance of the work in this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

OCT 27 1931

Bostonians To Open C. U. Music Season

110 in Symphony Orchestra Which Will Give 'Post-Football" Concert Saturday Night in Bailey Hall—Promise 'Happy Program'

The new music season at Cornell University will be opened next Saturday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bailey Hall, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor.

It will be a "post-football" concert, falling as it does on the same day as the Cornell-Columbia game on Schoellkopf Field.

Paving the way for the symphonic performance, Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Music Department at the University, was to broadcast at 4:30 o'clock this afternoon over WEAI an explanatory lecture on the program. Another such talk will be given by him at the Music Building, 320 Wait Avenue, at 4 o'clock Friday afternoon and the public is invited.

The program Saturday will be: Brahms' Fourth Symphony; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse;" Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes;" Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Boston Symphony brings 110 musicians with it for this concert—the largest number that has ever played in Ithaca.

The orchestra is this season rounding out its first 50 years of existence. Koussevitzky came to America to head the organization in the autumn of 1924, after having achieved high reputation in Russia before the war. His concerts in Moscow and Petrograd were famous, and he won considerable note for his Volga expeditions, when he journeyed 2,500 miles in a specially chartered steamer carrying symphony concerts into the great interior of Russia.

Dr. Koussevitzky returned from a sojourn abroad this summer on Sept. 29 to prepare for the opening of his orchestra's 51st season. He predicts a greater musical season in America this year than ever before, despite the depression.

"Americans are a great musical race," he said, "they must have music to match their moods. Are they sad about their unemployment? Very well, then I will play them happy music, music that will make them think of other things, that will lift them away from business, music by our great and modern Americans, by Gershwin, by Copland, ah, there are two young Americans who will go far. They are so expressionistically modern. They feel the spirit of our day, they are experimental, they do not do always the expected but the novel and it is beautiful. I consider George Gershwin has great talent and is typically American."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1931

Tour Is Limited

Only five cities other than Columbus are on the itinerary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will come to Memorial Hall Thursday night to play the opening concert in the series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

The orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played Monday night in Buffalo and appears Tuesday in Ann Arbor, Mich. Wednesday the musicians will spend in Detroit and after leaving Columbus Thursday night will go to Pittsburgh and Ithaca, N. Y., before returning to Boston.

Single admission tickets for the concert will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LANSING, MICH.
CAPITAL NEWS

OCT 27 1931

Boston Symphony

ANN ARBOR (UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, will be featured by the 111-piece orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRAVERSE CITY, MICH.
RECORD EAGLE

OCT 27 1931

fractured skull.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 27.—(U. P.)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's seventh symphony, in a major, will be featured by the 111 piece orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

OCT 27 1931

Boston Symphony Plays in Ann Arbor

Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 pieces, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, arrives in Detroit today. A concert will be given tonight in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, and in Detroit Masonic Temple tomorrow night. The orchestra is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary with a tour of middle western cities.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

1931

Boston Symphony to Arrive Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 musicians will arrive Tuesday morning at the Michigan Central Station for its two Michigan concerts.

Tuesday evening the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will be heard in a program at Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor.

Wednesday evening at Masonic Auditorium, the organization will give its Detroit concert. The local program which will vary from the one to be given at Ann Arbor, is made up of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12; two Nocturnes by Debussy; "La Valse," by Ravel; and the Strauss Tone Poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 27 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FOR CONCERT WEDNESDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, celebrating its fiftieth year, arrived in Detroit today by special train on its tour of the middle west. The orchestra will leave late this afternoon for Ann Arbor, where it will appear tonight in the Hill Auditorium. Immediately after the concert the musicians will return to Detroit. Wednesday night the orchestra will appear at Masonic Temple in a concert that will include Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12; two nocturnes by Debussy; Ravel's "La Valse," and "Ein Heldenleben," by Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 27 1931

Special Car Bringing Boston Symphony

A special car will bring members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Columbus Thursday morning, after their appearance Wednesday night in Detroit. They will spend the day at the Deshler Wallick before making their appearance in Memorial hall.

They will initiate Thursday, the 1931-32 series of the Symphony club of Central, Ohio, which is bringing also the Detroit, Dec. 1, the Cincinnati, the Cleveland and the Chicago.

Single admission seats to the Boston orchestra will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third streets, and at the Memorial hall box office just before the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 28 1931

Boston Symphony To Open Season

The symphony orchestra season will open this week Friday night at Syria Mosque with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky. After an absence of two years the orchestra will be doubly welcome in a program of outstanding importance.

The great Strauss work, "Ein Heldenleben," seldom heard owing to the great number of players required, will be the major work Friday night, featuring 112 players. Other works include Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the choreographic poem, "La Valse," by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 27 1931

Boy Scouts

Members of the Ann Arbor Scoutleaders association have completed the work of cleaning the walls and ceiling of the Scout headquarters, and the task of redecorating the interior will be begun this week. This improvement has been needed for many months, and is being made without cost to the local Scout Council.

Local scouts will assist at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert on this evening at the Hill auditorium. Scoutmaster Paul Wesenberg will have charge of the group. Dark suits should be worn if possible. Scouts whose troops meet on Tuesday evening should not report at this concert.

PLAN JURY INQUIRY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 27 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ANN ARBOR TONIGHT

Special to The Free Press

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 26—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Ann Arbor appearance in 15 years, Tuesday night, playing on the Choral Union program of the University Musical Society. The full 111 pieces of the orchestra will be here. The Beethoven Seventh Symphony, in A Major, will be the feature number. The program also will include Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin and Ravel's "Daphnis Et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLDWATER, MICH.
REPORTER

OCT 27 1931

Ann Arbor, Oct. 27—(UP) — The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, will be featured by the 111 piece orchestra.

42

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 27 1931

Symphony Superb

Boston Orchestra Opens Foundation Series Here

By EDWARD H. DURNEY

The return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a season's absence, made for an auspicious beginning of the Buffalo Musical Foundation's Symphony series, Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall. The superb Boston organization always a welcome guest here, was doubly so on the present occasion, and a huge audience received with open arms the distinguished conductor and his glorious company.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program ranging from Handel to Ravel, and with his accustomed master touch and electrifying spirit he led his players to signal achievement. The Koussevitzky art happily combines subtlety and vitality, grace and rugged energy, brilliance and profundity; and his sensitive instrument ever reflects the guiding hand of genius.

[illegible] is a far cry from the stately, for- [illegible] measures of Handel to the com- [illegible] [illegible]des of Tchaikovsky and the free- [illegible] Ravel, yet how justly did Koussevitzky publish the message of each composer. And how memorable are the th[illegible] climaxes he achieved in the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Ravel suite and the evening's symphony!

The Handel "Concerto Grosso," No. 12, for string orchestra, the first item of the evening's fare, benefitted by the clearest possible utterance of strings in musical conversation. Every figure was traced in proper relief and the style of the whole was impeccable.

The familiar "Lohengrin" excerpt shone anew at the Koussevitzky touch, and perhaps the bit of faulty utterance of violins at the beginning and end may be condoned as mere evidence that after all the Boston Symphony orchestra is made up of human beings.

Nothing was lovlier than the Ravel, the Suite No. 2 from the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet. Here is a choice example of the Ravel creature genius—orchestration of light and shade, breathing the fragrance of the wood, caressing as a gentle breeze, displaying a color range from the most delicate tints to riotous hues and ever pulsating with life. And in performance the composer was highly favored. It would be difficult to imagine a more glowing, more worthy performance of the work than that afforded by the Boston forces.

The evening's symphony was Tchaikovsky's fourth, distinguished among the Russian's symphonic works though surpassed in beauty and appeal by his fifth and sixth. This F Minor opus presents a plenitude of material, even an abundance of beauty, but its atmosphere often is feverish and its more turbulent pages offer the listening ear something of a task. The delicate Scherzo with its prolonged pizzicato never fails to exert charm and the Finale in its spirit and brilliance is redeeming.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky was one of clarifying qualities, brilliant, stimulating, always musicianly. And memory harked back to an admirable performance of the same work by the Boston orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux, several seasons ago.

Needless to say the evening's effort met with enthusiastic response on the part of the listeners, and that honors were shared by leader and led.

The Buffalo Musical foundation, of which Marion De Forest is local manager, will present three more orchestral concerts in the present series.

Those Noticed in Audience at Symphony Concert Here

A large and enthusiastic audience was present, among them Mr. and Mrs. Frederick B. Cooley and Miss Katrina Cooley, the latter wearing a white fur coat over a white frock. Mrs. Hans Schmidt and her daughter, Mrs. Gustav F. Watters were present, the latter in a black chiffon gown with deep yoke of beige chiffon and lace. Mr. and Mrs. Norman P. Clement attended, the latter in a cherry red velvet coat with fur collar; Mr. and Mrs. Roland L. O'Brian, the latter in red. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, the latter in black with long mink coat.

Others attending were Mrs. George [illegible]stein, Mrs. Clinton R. Wyckoff, Mrs. William Warren Smith, Mrs. Wesley P. Montgomery, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Mrs. Daniel W. Streeter, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Alden Rogers, Dr. and Mrs. Francescus Visser't Hooft, Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mrs. Archibald M. Hazard, Dr. Samuel Van Vranken Holmes, Mrs. Gharles W. Goodyear, Mrs. Charles A. White, Mr. and Mrs. Ashford G. P. Murch, Mrs. William T. Jebb and Dr. and Mrs. Irving M. Snow.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

OCT 27 1931

Sergei Koussevitzky, the orchestra leader, is the subject of a new biography bearing his name, written by

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 27 1931

NOTES ON MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BUFFALO WELCOMES BOSTON SYMPHONY

By MARY M. HOWARD
Times Music Critic

Bravo for Buffalo!

It gave a glad hand and royal welcome to Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony players when they appeared last evening in Elmwood Music hall, in the initial concert of the orchestral series sponsored by the Musical Foundation.

It was like the good old times to see the audience, that was almost a capacity house, and it made one believe that in a time of depression many turn to music for a renewal of courage and a surcease from worry. Well deserved was the tribute paid to this dominant figure among present day conductors, and to his men, many of whom merit the title of artist.

The organization this season is celebrating its golden jubilee, and it seems to have mounted a little nearer than ever before to the summit on which stands the ideal.

Variety and Contrast

As is his wont, Dr. Koussevitzky selected a program of wide variety and telling contrast, all, with the exception of the opening number, familiar works which his orchestra has played here in former seasons. Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor, one of 12 grand concertos which he composed in the period of a month, was a grateful program opener.

Like all this master's writings, it has a harmonic web in which every tone seems an integral and necessary part of the musical texture, and a direct, straightforward style that makes instant appeal. It was played with a simplicity and dignity wholly in keeping with the character of the music, and awoke a responsive mood in every hearer.

The inspired strains of the Lohengrin Prelude always work a potent spell. This music, which portrays the descent from heaven of the Holy Grail, borne by angel hands, is a marvelous embodiment of musical genius and a knowledge that understood how to produce results which seem spontaneous. Wagner divided his string choir into many fine strands of tone, sometimes eight voices at once, and thus secured the floating, ethereal harmonies that depict the descent to earth of the angelic host and their return to their celestial abode.

The Prelude was given with fine delicacy and tonal sweetness, although the ascent of the angelic visitants was not quite as successful as their descent, the final measures being marred by a rather weak and uncertain tone.

Ravel's Ballet Suite No. 2, "Daphnis et Chloe," followed. This atmospheric and modernistic work, full of the discords dear to the heart of composers of today, and yet fascinating in its piquant flavor even to those who do not relish so much dissonance, was played with refreshing spirit, as if the players themselves enjoyed it, and with constant care for light and shade.

Plays Favorite

Tschaikovsky's F minor symphony, No. 4, was the one which the composer chose to present when he was invited to New York as guest conductor at the dedication of Carnegie hall in 1891.

He gave the symphony a program. To quote briefly: "The opening theme is Fate, overwhelming, invincible. Nothing remains but to resign ourselves to it and to lament in vain." The second movement pictures the weariness of life. The Scherzo, with its ever recurrent staccato figures by the plucked strings, is fascinating in rhythm, and is without definite mood, while the finale depicts a merrymaking of the people, yet with the somber Fate motive stealing in here and there.

Koussevitzky, a master of his craft, entered with wonderful understanding into the spirit of the music, and rose nobly to its splendid climaxes. The performance was glowing with color, irresistible in rhythm. The men responded wholeheartedly and with instant precision to the interpretative impulses of their leader, and the result was a splendid and uplifting musical achievement. Many were the recalls for the conductor, who justly included his players in the demonstrations of approval.

Incidentally, a search among old concert programs revealed the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Tschaikovsky fourth symphony in Buffalo 25 years ago, in the same auditorium, then called Convention hall, and under Wilhelm Gericke, conductor. This was probably the first performance of the work in this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 27 1931

Tour Is Limited

Only five cities other than Columbus are on the itinerary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will come to Memorial Hall Thursday night to play the opening concert in the series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

The orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, played Monday night in Buffalo and appears Tuesday in Ann Arbor, Mich. Wednesday the musicians will spend in Detroit and after leaving Columbus Thursday night will go to Pittsburgh and Ithaca, N. Y., before returning to Boston.

Single admission tickets for the concert will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LANSING, MICH.
CAPITAL NEWS

OCT 27 1931

Boston Symphony

ANN ARBOR (UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, will be featured by the 111-piece orchestra.

Music Season

110 in Symphony Orchestra Which Will Give 'Post-Football" Concert Saturday Night in Bailey Hall—Promise 'Happy Program'

The new music season at Cornell University will be opened next Saturday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bailey Hall, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor.

It will be a "post-football" concert, falling as it does on the same day as the Cornell-Columbia game on Schoellkopf Field.

Paving the way for the symphonic performance, Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Music Department at the University, was to broadcast at 4:30 o'clock this afternoon over WEAI an explanatory lecture on the program. Another such talk will be given by him at the Music Building, 320 Wait Avenue, at 4 o'clock Friday afternoon and the public is invited.

The program Saturday will be: Brahms' Fourth Symphony; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse;" Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes;" Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Boston Symphony brings 110 musicians with it for this concert—the largest number that has ever played in Ithaca.

The orchestra is this season rounding out its first 50 years of existence. Koussevitzky came to America to head the organization in the autumn of 1924, after hav- [illegible]ieved high reputation in [illegible] before the war. His con- [illegible] Moscow and Petrograd [illegible]mous, and he won con- [illegible] note for his Volga [illegible]s, when he journeyed [illegible] miles in a specially chartered steamer carrying symphony concerts into the great interior of Russia.

Dr. Koussevitzky returned from a sojourn abroad this summer on Sept. 29 to prepare for the opening of his orchestra's 51st season. He predicts a greater musical season in America this year than ever before, despite the depression.

"Americans are a great musical race," he said, "they must have music to match their moods. Are they sad about their unemployment? Very well, then I will play them happy music, music that will make them think of other things, that will lift them away from business, music by our great and modern Americans, by Gershwin, by Copland, ah, there are two young Americans who will go far. They are so expressionistically modern. They feel the spirit of our day, they are experimental, they do not do always the expected but the novel and it is beautiful. I consider George Gershwin has great talent and is typically American."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TRAVERSE CITY, MICH.
RECORD EAGLE

OCT 27 1931

fractured skull.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 27.—(U. P.)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's seventh symphony, in a major, will be featured by the 111 piece orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

OCT 27 1931

Boston Symphony Plays in Ann Arbor

Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 pieces, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, arrives in Detroit today. A concert will be given tonight in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, and in Detroit Masonic Temple tomorrow night. The orchestra is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary with a tour of middle western cities.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

7 1931

Boston Symphony to Arrive Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 musicians will arrive Tuesday morning at the Michigan Central Station for its two Michigan concerts.

Tuesday evening the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, will be heard in a program at Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor.

Wednesday evening at Masonic Auditorium, the organization will give its Detroit concert. The local program which will vary from the one to be given at Ann Arbor, is made up of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12; two Nocturnes by Debussy; "La Valse," by Ravel; and the Strauss Tone Poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 27 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FOR CONCERT WEDNESDAY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, celebrating its fiftieth year, arrived in Detroit today by special train on its tour of the middle west. The orchestra will leave late this afternoon for Ann Arbor, where it will appear tonight in the Hill Auditorium. Immediately after the concert the musicians will return to Detroit. Wednesday night the orchestra will appear at Masonic Temple in a concert that will include Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12; two nocturnes by Debussy; Ravel's "La Valse," and "Ein Heldenleben," by Strauss.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 27 1931

Special Car Bringing Boston Symphony

A special car will bring members of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Columbus Thursday morning, after their appearance Wednesday night in Detroit. They will spend the day at the Deshler Wallick before making their appearance in Memorial hall.

They will initiate Thursday, the 1931-32 series of the Symphony club of Central, Ohio, which is bringing also the Detroit, Dec. 1, the Cincinnati, the Cleveland and the Chicago.

Single admission seats to the Boston orchestra will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third streets, and at the Memorial hall box office just before the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 28 1931

Boston Symphony To Open Season

The symphony orchestra season will open this week Friday night at Syria Mosque with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky. After an absence of two years the orchestra will be doubly welcome in a program of outstanding importance.

The great Strauss work, "Ein Heldenleben," seldom heard owing to the great number of players required, will be the major work Friday night, featuring 112 players. Other works include Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the choreographic poem, "La Valse," by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 27 1931

Boy Scouts

Members of the Ann Arbor Scoutleaders association have completed the work of cleaning the walls and ceiling of the Scout headquarters, and the task of redecorating the interior will be begun this week. This improvement has been needed for many months, and is being made without cost to the local Scout Council.

Local scouts will assist at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert on this evening at the Hill auditorium. Scoutmaster Paul Wesenberg will have charge of the group. Dark suits should be worn if possible. Scouts whose troops meet on Tuesday evening should not report at this concert.

PLAN JURY INQUIRY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 27 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ANN ARBOR TONIGHT

Special to The Free Press

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 26—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Ann Arbor appearance in 15 years, Tuesday night, playing on the Choral Union program of the University Musical Society. The full 111 pieces of the orchestra will be here. The Beethoven Seventh Symphony, in A Major, will be the feature number. The program also will include Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin and Ravel's "Daphnis Et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLDWATER, MICH.
REPORTER

OCT 27 1931

Ann Arbor, Oct. 27—(UP) — The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's Seventh Sympthony, in A major, will be featured by the 111 piece orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 27 1931

ORCHESTRA HERE THURSDAY

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Columbus at 8:15 a. m. Thursday, in their special car. They will go to the Deshler-Wallick Hotel before their concert. The orchestra, which Thursday night will open the 1931-32 series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, includes Columbus among only six cities to whom it was able to grant an extra-schedule tour. Single seats go on sale Wednesday at the box office, in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third streets, or may be obtained before the concert at Memorial Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

Russian Musician Killed

Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow, and assistant conductor of the opera in Petrograd, died in Boston, Oct. 22 as the result of injuries sustained when struck by an automobile.

He had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS
OCT 27 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Ann Arbor appearance in 15 years, tonight, playing on the Choral Union program of the University Musical Society. The full 11 pieces of the orchestra will be in Ann Arbor. The Beethoven Seventh Symphony, in A Major, will be the feature number. The program also will include Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin and Ravel's 'Daphnis Et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIG RAPIDS, MICH.
PIONEER

OCT 27 1931

here yesterday afternoon.

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 27.—(UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's seventh symphony, in A major, will be featured by the 111 piece orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 28 1931

Tonight

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead his famous organization in Masonic Auditorium this evening.

MICHIGAN DAILY

Music

Oct 28

PHONY

Gorman

With Ravel's wizardry as his stimulus, Serge Koussevitsky last night proved himself a supreme virtuoso on what is undoubtedly the most thrilling instrument ever heard in Ann Arbor. "Daphnis and Chloe" probably has as much technical subtlety as any score in the orchestral repertoire. Ravel's is a peculiar mind: he writes evocative, shimmering, evanescent music with the utmost precision and the utmost caution to include full sublety of detail. Clearly the scores coming from such a mind present a peculiarly difficult problem to the conductor. The conductor has to build up a whole that will be magical (that is, mysterious and indefinably affecting) out of a score literally strewn with parts, all of which have to be both attended to and related. Mr. Koussevitsky very evidently has just the type of mind and just the type of orchestra to fully face such a problem. Probably no orchestra in the world has such security in each of its sections; probably very few conductors have the technical intelligence or (if they have that) the courage to be so amazingly attentive to detail as Mr. Koussevitsky is. The result of such courage is the extraordinary richness of last night's performance of "Daphnis and Chloe." All the detail was boldly projectetd. And with such finish! (One has only to mention the exquisite phrasing and the rhythmic precision of the woodwinds throughout the whole score to make clear what is meant). And yet—this is even more important—the performance was splendid and immediate and vital in its larger outlines. There was always fluent motion the direction of which was clearly defined. And the ability to project fluent motion (mysterious ambiguity!) that is nevertheless felt to be richly qualified at each single moment (if we could stop and abstract a moment) may be as satisfactory a definition as any of musical genius. At any rate, irrespective of anyone's ability to define it, undoubtedly the Ravel performance was enough to convince us all that Mr. Koussevitsky has it.

The performances of the Handel Concerto Grosso in B Minor and of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major were full corroboration. The string tone in the Handel always had real depth and was sensitively varied in the Largo movements. Koussevitsky seemed to have full sympathy with the directness, the logic and the nobility of the polyphonic idiom in the Allegro movements. The whole Concerto was both authentic and inspired.

Mr. J. W. N. Sullivan in his book on Beethoven says of the Seventh Symphony: "It is the first work on a grand scale in which that 'conflict (which was the root experience variously embodied in the third and fifth symphonies and in the Rasoumovsky quartets) is taken for granted and ignored, and the fruits of the victory enjoyed. The splendid introduction to the first movement gives the impression of a whole world stirring into exultant life and in the last two movements this exultant note has reached pure, joyful ecstasy." These words suggest the type of interpretation that Koussevitsky gave the Seventh. The first movement was taken at a slow tempo and dynamically it was restrained; it left a distinct impression of a state of mind not yet clear to itself. The powerful, exultant ecstasy of the last movement seemed in the experience of the symphony to have the subtle relation of being implicit in that early state of mind without being predictable from it. I mean to say that Mr. Koussevitsky's restraint in the first movement had the effect of concealing meaning and giving to the last movement the climactic power of nearly complete revelation. The Allegretto movement was given a beautiful rendering which also made clear, I think, what Mr. Sullivan meant by "enjoying the fruits of his victory." This was a remembered sorrow, soft and lovely and without the anguish of the earlier slow movements. This movement, too, progresses by revelation of implicit meaning. The soft, reticent opening bars are fully clarified in the splendid, fugal section towards the end (a use of polyphony characteristic of the later Beethoven.)

The whole symphony, I think,—and Mr. Koussevitsky seemed to me to make this especially clear—moves logically rather than, as in the third and fifth, dramatically. It seemed to me Mr. Koussevitsky's splendid reading closer to the classical symphony than either of the other two.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 28 1931

Boston Orchestra Is Widely Acclaimed at Auditorium

Koussevitzky Directs Men in Splendid Concert; Event Is Varied

By Carl E. Gehring

As artistic a triumph as John McCormack's success last week had been popular was recorded Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium when the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, scaled music's Olympian heights. Judged from any viewpoint, the poetry of Apollo and his lyre was eclipsed by this mercurial god of the podium who conducted with equal facility one of the world's finest orchestras in a many-sided program. Of such impact was the applause which followed the playing of Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B-Minor; the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin"; the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, of Ravel, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-Major, Op. 92, that, if Atlas did not feel the reverberations on his shoulders, Hill auditorium's foundations must have absorbed them.

Koussevitzky, to begin with, for all of his Russian antecedents, strikes a cosmopolitan note. Therein he is unlike most Slavs and so many other conductors who too often inject national leanings into their interpretations and choices of programs. This breadth of outlook is matched by the resourcefulness of Koussevitzky in action. An economy of effect in his directing gives one the feeling of much being held in reserve; this feeling is dispelled, or accentuated, depending on one's viewpoint, when he does let out. Then things happen, mighty thrusts from the Musical Left, as it were, being synonymous with doughty jabs from his left arm. In his stage presence and results, moreover, Koussevitzky is not unlike the late Arthur Nikisch or Dr. Karl Muck.

Fitting Orchestral Foil

Providing a good foil for the chameleon-like proclivities of its colorful leader, the Boston Symphony orchestra, whether considered as a single unit, as to choirs, or as to its individual members, is a supreme organization. This conclusion might have been gleaned from previous hearings of the body's fine recordings, "Daphnis and Chloe" being among them. While recordings may be deceptive, an actual hearing of the orchestra provided the ultimate believing in its excellence. To characterize the string choir as strikingly vibrant and sensitive to the director's merest flick of a finger; the wood choir as smooth and luminous; the brass as equally finished in double fortissimo or triple pianissimo, wherein it resounds with the sheen which usually is a woodwind attribute, is a summary, and only that, of what made Tuesday evening so memorable in local musical annals.

The quality of the string choir was manifest at the outset in Handel's score. If one previously had held a well justified notion of the superiority of the Philadelphia Orchestra's string choirs, one had to modify or, at least, qualify the opinion. From the standpoint of power, particularly while playing in octaves, the Philadelphia strings still seem to be without a peer. As to matters of balance and vibrancy, on the other hand, no better playing than was heard in the Concerto Grosso may be imagined. In tutti, the orchestral canvas elicited a perfect picture, with balance being the keynote; in pianissimo, the shadings were apt. As suggested before, although a Slav directed the Handel, the gorgeous Slavic outlines which Stokowski usually manages to infuse into his music, Brahms not excluded, were absent. Handel prevailed.

Wagner and Ravel

If Koussevitzky's handling of Handel had been surcharged with artistic perfection, his directing of Wagner and Ravel was equally effective. Here, with the full orchestra at his command, the total impact of Koussevitzky's genius for blending and combining instrumental timbres was experienced. The gradual grading up to the big climax of the "Lohengrin" Prelude, with its slow but perceptibile addition of orchestral units, was a peak of integration and fulfillment. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this typically Teutonic upward sweep and recession, moreover, contrasted well with his fanciful handling of the subtle French opus. Ravel's snippets of rhythm, splashes of color and wandering strands of melody, so dexterously interwoven, came through with the utmost in voicing; the pagan flavor of the music was in delightful taste, and the huge climax at the close was worked up into a perfect orgasm of orchestral fury.

While it would have been a treat indeed had Koussevitzky played us the new Roussel Symphony which he has been featuring of late, a treat of another kind was realized in his performance of Beethoven's "Dance" Symphony. Gone were the massive effects of the previous compositions; gone, the exquisite colorings of the brightly tinted Ravel score. In their place was heard the severer stuff of Beethoven; Beethoven, moreover, as Beethoven meant it. This is another way of saying that the purists had an evening of it; the utter catholicity of Koussevitzky's taste, the breadth of his vision, his fidelity to a composer's intentions all saw to that. With the conclusion of a final dance movement, wherein no vestige of a trepak was apparent, came to an end a concert which, for authenticity and artistic worth, succeeding concerts on the Choral Union series will be pressed to emulate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS
OCT 28 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY WELL RECEIVED IN AUDITORIUM CONCERT

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 28.—Program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appeared as the second in the Choral Union series in Hill Auditorium Tuesday night reached its climax in the rendition of "Daphnis et Chloe", by Ravel. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directed the group, which made its first appearance in Ann Arbor in 15 years.

The opening number, Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for strong orchestra in B. Minor, was followed by Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin". The Ravel ballet brought warm applause from the audience.

The Beethoven "Seventh Symphony" was played with fine spirit and Dr. Koussevitzky and the men of the orchestra shared the appreciation of those present.

Y NEWS. ANN ARBOR. MICH.

here

Boston Orchestra Is Widely Acclaimed at Auditorium

Koussevitzky Directs Men in Splendid Concert; Event Is Varied

By Carl E. Gehring

As artistic a triumph as John McCormack's success last week had been popular was recorded Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium when the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, scaled music's Olympian heights. Judged from any viewpoint, the poetry of Apollo and his lyre was eclipsed by this mercurial god of the podium who conducted with equal facility one of the world's finest orchestras in a many-sided program. Of such impact was the applause which followed the playing of Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B-Minor; the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin"; the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, of Ravel, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-Major, Op. 92, that, if Atlas did not feel the reverberations on his shoulders, Hill auditorium's foundations must have absorbed them.

Koussevitzky, to begin with, for all of his Russian antecedents, strikes a cosmopolitan note. Therein he is unlike most Slavs and so many other conductors who too often inject national leanings into their interpretations and choices of programs. This breadth of outlook is matched by the resourcefulness of Koussevitzky in action. An economy of effect in his directing gives one the feeling of much being held in reserve; this feeling is dispelled, or accentuated, depending on one's viewpoint, when he does let out. Then things happen, mighty thrusts from the Musical Left, as it were, being synonymous with doughty jabs from his left arm. In his stage presence and results, moreover, Koussevitzky is not unlike the late Arthur Nikisch or Dr. Karl Muck.

Fitting Orchestral Foil

Providing a good foil for the chameleon-like proclivities of its colorful leader, the Boston Symphony orchestra, whether considered as a single unit, as to choirs, or as to its individual members, is a supreme organization. This conclusion might have been gleaned from previous hearings of the body's fine recordings, "Daphnis and Chloe" being among them. While recordings may be deceptive, an actual hearing of the orchestra provided the ultimate believing in its excellence. To characterize the string choir as strikingly vibrant and sensitive to the director's merest flick of a finger; the wood choir as smooth and luminous; the brass as equally finished in double fortissimo or triple pianissimo, wherein it resounds with the sheen which usually is a woodwind attribute, is a summary, and only that, of what made Tuesday evening so memorable in local musical annals.

The quality of the string choir was manifest at the outset in Handel's score. If one previously had held a well justified notion of the superiority of the Philadelphia Orchestra's string choirs, one had to modify or, at least, qualify the opinion. From the standpoint of power, particularly while playing in octaves, the Philadelphia strings still seem to be without a peer. As to matters of balance and vibrancy, on the other hand, no better playing than was heard in the Concerto Grosso may be imagined. In tutti, the orchestral canvas elicited a perfect picture, with balance being the keynote; in pianissimo, the shadings were apt. As suggested before, although a Slav directed the Handel, the gorgeous Slavic outlines which Stokowski usually manages to infuse into his music, Brahms not excluded, were absent. Handel prevailed.

Wagner and Ravel

If Koussevitzky's handling of Handel had been surcharged with artistic perfection, his directing of Wagner and Ravel was equally effective. Here, with the full orchestra at his command, the total impact of Koussevitzky's genius for blending and combining instrumental timbres was experienced. The gradual grading up to the big climax of the "Lohengrin" Prelude, with its slow but perceptible addition of orchestral units, was a peak of integration and fulfillment. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this typically Teutonic upward sweep and recession, moreover, contrasted well with his fanciful handling of the subtle French opus. Ravel's snippets of rhythm, splashes of color and wandering strands of melody, so dexterously interwoven, came through with the utmost in voicing; the pagan flavor of the music was in delightful taste, and the huge climax at the close was worked up into a perfect orgasm of orchestral fury.

While it would have been a treat indeed had Koussevitzky played us the new Roussel Symphony which he has been featuring of late, a treat of another kind was realized in his performance of Beethoven's "Dance" Symphony. Gone were the massive effects of the previous compositions; gone, the exquisite colorings of the brightly tinted Ravel score. In their place was heard the severer stuff of Beethoven; Beethoven, moreover, as Beethoven meant it. This is another way of saying that the purists had an evening of it; the utter catholicity of Koussevitzky's taste, the breadth of his vision, his fidelity to a composer's intentions all saw to that. With the conclusion of a final dance movement, wherein no vestige of a trepak was apparent, came to an end a concert which, for authenticity and artistic worth, succeeding concerts on the Choral Union series will be pressed to emulate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH
NOV 1 - 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORS COLUMBUS PIANISTS.

Although Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was much occupied during his short visit to Columbus with his celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, he set a portion of his time for a meeting with Doro Smith, concert manager, under whose direction, Agnes Wright and Eldon Howells, will appear in a recital of music for two pianos at Central High school, December 3.

Dr. Koussevitzky spoke very enthusiastically of Miss Smith's plans to promote native talent, and gratefully accepted an invitation to be an honorary patron for the December concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL
OCT 28 1931

SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN AT ANN ARBOR

Ann Arbor, Oct. 28.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, made its first appearance in Ann Arbor in 15 years last night. The program reached its point of greatest intensity in the ballet music, "Daphnis et Chloe," of Ravel.

The opening number, Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B Minor, was followed by Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin." The Ravel ballet brought warm applause from the audience.

The Beethoven Seventh Symphony was played with fine spirit and Dr. Koussevitzky and the men of the orchestra shared the appreciation of those present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 28 1931

Boston Symphony On Way to Detroit

Special to THE DETROIT TIMES

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 28.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra left here today for their Detroit concert, after a rare exhibition of playing here before 5,500 persons in Hill Auditorium last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
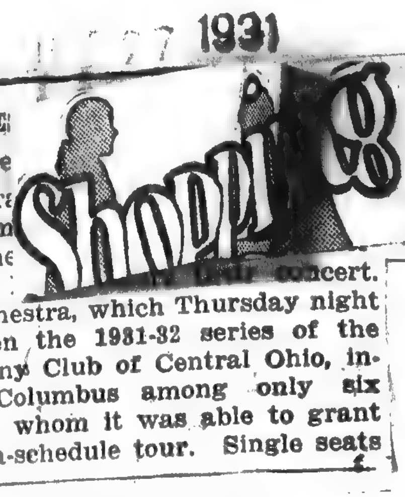
CITIZEN

... 27 1931



ORCHE

Membe

Orchestra

8:15 a. m

car. The Wallick ... concert. The orchestra, which Thursday night will open the 1931-32 series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, includes Columbus among only six cities to whom it was able to grant an extra-schedule tour. Single seats

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

Russian Musician Killed

Boris Kreinin, 52, former concert master and soloist of Serge ~~Kousse~~vitzky's orchestra in Moscow, and assistant conductor of the opera in Petrograd, died in Boston, Oct. 22 as the result of injuries sustained when struck by an automobile.

He had been a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra since 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

OCT 27 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its first Ann Arbor appearance in 15 years, tonight, playing on the Choral Union program of the University Musical Society. The full 11 pieces of the orchestra will be in Ann Arbor. The Beethoven Seventh Symphony, in A Major, will be the feature number. The program also will include Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin and Ravel's 'Daphnis Et Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BIG RAPIDS, MICH.
PIONEER

OCT 27 1931

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 27.—(UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's seventh symphony, in A major, will be featured by the 111 piece orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

... 28 1931

Tonight

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will [illegible] his famous organization in Masonic Auditorium this evening.*

MICHIGAN DAILY

Music

Oct 28

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Review by William J. Gorman

With Ravel's wizardry as his stimulus, Serge Koussevitsky last night proved himself a supreme virtuoso on what is undoubtedly the most thrilling instrument ever heard in Ann Arbor. "Daphnis and Chloe" probably has as much technical subtlety as any score in the orchestral repertoire. Ravel's is a peculiar mind: he writes evocative, shimmering, evanescent music with the utmost precision and the utmost caution to include full sublety of detail. Clearly the scores coming from such a mind present a peculiarly difficult problem to the conductor. The conductor has to build up a whole that will be magical (that is, mysterious and indefinably affecting) out of a score literally strewn with parts, all of which have to be both attended to and related. Mr. Koussevitsky very evidently has just the type of mind and just the type of orchestra to fully face such a problem. Probably no orchestra in the world has such security in each of its sections; probably very few conductors have the technical intelligence or (if they have that) the courage to be so amazingly attentive to detail as Mr. Koussevitsky is. The result of such courage is the extraordinary richness of last night's performance of "Daphnis and Chloe." All the detail was boldly projectetd. And with such finish! (One has only to mention the exquisite phrasing and the rhythmic precision of the woodwinds throughout the whole score to make clear what is meant). And yet—this is even more important—the performance was splendid and immediate and vital in its larger outlines. There was always fluent motion the direction of which was clearly defined. And the ability to project fluent motion (mysterious ambiguity!) that is nevertheless felt to be richly qualified at each single moment (if we could stop and abstract a moment) may be as satisfactory a definition as any of musical genius. At any rate, irrespective of anyone's ability to define it, undoubtedly the Ravel performance was enough to convince us all that Mr. Koussevitsky has it.

The performances of the Handel Concerto Grosso in B Minor and of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major were full corroboration. The string tone in the Handel always had real depth and was sensitively varied in the Largo movements. Koussevitsky seemed to have full sympathy with the directness, the logic and the nobility of the polyphonic idiom in the Allegro movements. The whole Concerto was both authentic and inspired.

Mr. J. W. N. Sullivan in his book on Beethoven says of the Seventh Symphony: "It is the first work on a grand scale in which that conflict (which was the root experience variously embodied in the third and fifth symphonies and in the Rasoumovsky quartets) is taken for granted and ignored, and the fruits of the victory enjoyed. The splendid introduction to the first movement gives the impression of a whole world stirring into exultant life and in the last two movements this exultant note has reached pure, joyful ecstasy." These words suggest the type of interpretation that Koussevitsky gave the Seventh. The first movement was taken at a slow tempo and dynamically it was restrained; it left a distinct impression of a state of mind not yet clear to itself. The powerful, exultant ecstasy of the last movement seemed in the experience of the symphony to have the subtle relation of being implicit in that early state of mind without being predictable from it. I mean to say that Mr. Koussevitsky's restraint in the first movement had the effect of concealing meaning and giving to the last movement the climactic power of nearly complete revelation. The Allegretto movement was given a beautiful rendering which also made clear, I think, what Mr. Sullivan meant by "enjoying the fruits of his victory." This was a remembered sorrow, soft and lovely and without the anguish of the earlier slow movements. This movement, too, progresses by revelation of implicit meaning. The soft, reticent opening bars are fully clarified in the splendid, fugal section towards the end (a use of polyphony characteristic of the later Beethoven.)

The whole symphony, I think,—and Mr. Koussevitsky seemed to me to make this especially clear—moves logically rather than, as in the third and fifth, dramatically. It seemed to me Mr. Koussevitsky's splendid reading closer to the classical symphony than either of the other two.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 28 1931

Boston Orchestra Is Widely Acclaimed at Auditorium

Koussevitzky Directs Men in Splendid Concert; Event Is Varied

By Carl E. Gehring

As artistic a triumph as John McCormack's success last week had been popular was recorded Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium when the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, scaled music's Olympian heights. Judged from any viewpoint, the poetry of Apollo and his lyre was eclipsed by this mercurial god of the podium who conducted with equal facility one of the world's finest orchestras in a many-sided program. Of such impact was the applause which followed the playing of Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B-Minor; the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin"; the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, of Ravel, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-Major, Op. 92, that, if Atlas did not feel the reverberations on his shoulders, Hill auditorium's foundations must have absorbed them.

Koussevitzky, to begin with, for all of his Russian antecedents, strikes a cosmopolitan note. Therein he is unlike most Slavs and so many other conductors who too often inject national leanings into their interpretations and choices of programs. This breadth of outlook is matched by the resourcefulness of Koussevitzky in action. An economy of effect in his directing gives one the feeling of much being held in reserve; this feeling is dispelled, or accentuated, depending on one's viewpoint, when he does let out. Then things happen, mighty thrusts from the Musical Left, as it were, being synonymous with doughty jabs from his left arm. In his stage presence and results, moreover, Koussevitzky is not unlike the late Arthur Nikisch or Dr. Karl Muck.

Fitting Orchestral Foil

Providing a good foil for the chameleon-like proclivities of its colorful leader, the Boston Symphony orchestra, whether considered as a single unit, as to choirs, or as to its individual members, is a supreme organization. This conclusion might have been gleaned from previous hearings of the body's fine recordings, "Daphnis and Chloe" being among them. While recordings may be deceptive, an actual hearing of the orchestra provided the ultimate believing in its excellence. To characterize the string choir as strikingly vibrant and sensitive to the director's merest flick of a finger; the wood choir as smooth and luminous; the brass as equally finished in double fortissimo or triple pianissimo, wherein it resounds with the sheen which usually is a woodwind attribute, is a summary, and only that, of what made Tuesday evening so memorable in local musical annals.

The quality of the string choir was manifest at the outset in Handel's score. If one previously had held a well justified notion of the superiority of the Philadelphia Orchestra's string choirs, one had to modify or, at least, qualify the opinion. From the standpoint of power, particularly while playing in octaves, the Philadelphia strings still seem to be without a peer. As to matters of balance and vibrancy, on the other hand, no better playing than was heard in the Concerto Grosso may be imagined. In tutti, the orchestral canvas elicited a per- ct picture, with balance being e keynote; in pianissimo, the hadings were apt. As suggested efore, although a Slav directed he Handel, the gorgeous Slavic outlines which Stokowski usually manages to infuse into his music, Brahms not excluded, were absent. Handel prevailed.

Wagner and Ravel

If Koussevitzky's handling of Handel had been surcharged with artistic perfection, his directing of Wagner and Ravel was equally effective. Here, with the full orchestra at his command, the total impact of Koussevitzky's genius for blending and combining instrumental timbres was experienced. The gradual grading up to the big climax of the "Lohengrin" Prelude, with its slow but perceptibile addition of orchestral units, was a peak of integration and fulfillment. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this typically Teutonic upward sweep and recession, moreover, contrasted well with his fanciful handling of the subtle French opus. Ravel's snippets of rhythm, splashes of color and wandering strands of melody, so dexterously interwoven, came through with the utmost in voicing; the pagan flavor of the music was in delightful taste, and the huge climax at the close was worked up into a perfect orgasm of orchestral fury.

While it would have been a treat indeed had Koussevitzky played us the new Roussel Symphony which he has been featuring of late, a treat of another kind was realized in his performance of Beethoven's "Dance" Symphony. Gone were the massive effects of the previous compositions; gone, the exquisite colorings of the brightly tinted Ravel score. In their place was heard the severer stuff of Beethoven; Beethoven, moreover, as Beethoven meant it. This is another way of saying that the purists had an evening of it; the utter catholicity of Koussevitzky's taste, the breadth of his vision, his fidelity to a composer's intentions all saw to that. With the conclusion of a final dance movement, wherein no vestige of a trepak was apparent, came to an end a concert which, for authenticity and artistic worth, succeeding concerts on the Choral Union series will be pressed to emulate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS

OCT 28 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY WELL RECEIVED IN AUDITORIUM CONCERT

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 28.—Program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which appeared as the second in the Choral Union series in Hill Auditorium Tuesday night reached its climax in the rendition of "Daphnis et Chloe", by Ravel. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directed the group, which made its first appearance in Ann Arbor in 15 years.

The opening number, Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for strong orchestra in B. Minor, was followed by Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin". The Ravel ballet brought warm applause from the audience.

The Beethoven "Seventh Symphony" was played with fine spirit and Dr. Koussevitzky and the men of the orchestra shared the appreciation of those present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

NOV 1 - 1931

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORS COLUMBUS PIANISTS.

Although Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was much occupied during his short visit to Columbus with his celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra, he set a portion of his time for a meeting with Doro Smith, concert manager, under whose direction, Agnes Wright and Eldon Howells, will appear in a recital of music for two pianos at Central High school, December 3.

Dr. Koussevitzky spoke very enthusiastically of Miss Smith's plans to promote native talent, and gratefully accepted an invitation to be an honorary patron for the December concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL

OCT 28 1931

SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN AT ANN ARBOR

Ann Arbor, Oct. 28.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, made its first appearance in Ann Arbor in 15 years last night. The program reached its point of greatest intensity in the ballet music, "Daphnis et Chloe," of Ravel.

The opening number, Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B Minor, was followed by Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin." The Ravel ballet brought warm applause from the audience.

The Beethoven Seventh Symphony was played with fine spirit and Dr. Koussevitzky and the men of the orchestra shared the appreciation of those present.

.Y NEWS. ANN ARBOR. MICH.

phere

Boston Orchestra Is Widely Acclaimed at Auditorium

Koussevitzky Directs Men in Splendid Concert; Event Is Varied

By Carl E. Gehring

As artistic a triumph as John McCormack's success last week had been popular was recorded Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium when the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, scaled music's Olympian heights. Judged from any viewpoint, the poetry of Apollo and his lyre was eclipsed by this mercurial god of the podium who conducted with equal facility one of the world's finest orchestras in a many-sided program. Of such impact was the applause which followed the playing of Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, in B-Minor; the Prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin"; the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, of Ravel, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-Major, Op. 92, that, if Atlas did not feel the reverberations on his shoulders, Hill auditorium's foundations must have absorbed them.

Koussevitzky, to begin with, for all of his Russian antecedents, strikes a cosmopolitan note. Therein he is unlike most Slavs and so many other conductors who too often inject national leanings into their interpretations and choices of programs. This breadth of outlook is matched by the resourcefulness of Koussevitzky in action. An economy of effect in his directing gives one the feeling of much being held in reserve; this feeling is dispelled, or accentuated, depending on one's viewpoint, when he does let out. Then things happen, mighty thrusts from the Musical Left, as it were, being synonymous with doughty jabs from his left arm. In his stage presence and results, moreover, Koussevitzky is not unlike the late Arthur Nikisch or Dr. Karl Muck.

Fitting Orchestral Foil

Providing a good foil for the chameleon-like proclivities of its colorful leader, the Boston Symphony orchestra, whether considered as a single unit, as to choirs, or as to its individual members, is a supreme organization. This conclusion might have been gleaned from previous hearings of the body's fine recordings, "Daphnis and Chloe" being among them. While recordings may be deceptive, an actual hearing of the orchestra provided the ultimate believing in its excellence. To characterize the string choir as strikingly vibrant and sensitive to the director's merest flick of a finger; the wood choir as smooth and luminous; the brass as equally finished in double fortissimo or triple pianissimo, wherein it resounds with the sheen which usually is a woodwind attribute, is a summary, and only that, of what made Tuesday evening so memorable in local musical annals.

The quality of the string choir was manifest at the outset in Handel's score. If one previously had held a well justified notion of the superiority of the Philadelphia Orchestra's string choirs, one had to modify or, at least, qualify the opinion. From the standpoint of power, particularly while playing in octaves, the Philadelphia strings still seem to be without a peer. As to matters of balance and vibrancy, on the other hand, no better playing than was heard in the Concerto Grosso may be imagined. In tutti, the orchestral canvas elicited a perfect picture, with balance being the keynote; in pianissimo, the shadings were apt. As suggested before, although a Slav directed the Handel, the gorgeous Slavic outlines which Stokowski usually manages to infuse into his music, Brahms not excluded, were absent. Handel prevailed.

Wagner and Ravel

If Koussevitzky's handling of Handel had been surcharged with artistic perfection, his directing of Wagner and Ravel was equally effective. Here, with the full orchestra at his command, the total impact of Koussevitzky's genius for blending and combining instrumental timbres was experienced. The gradual grading up to the big climax of the "Lohengrin" Prelude, with its slow but perceptibile addition of orchestral units, was a peak of integration and fulfillment. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this typically Teutonic upward sweep and recession, moreover, contrasted well with his fanciful handling of the subtle French opus. Ravel's snippets of rhythm, splashes of color and wandering strands of melody, so dexterously interwoven, came through with the utmost in voicing; the pagan flavor of the music was in delightful taste, and the huge climax at the close was worked up into a perfect orgasm of orchestral fury.

While it would have been a treat indeed had Koussevitzky played us the new Roussel Symphony which he has been featuring of late, a treat of another kind was realized in his performance of Beethoven's "Dance" Symphony. Gone were the massive effects of the previous compositions; gone, the exquisite colorings of the brightly tinted Ravel score. In their place was heard the severer stuff of Beethoven; Beethoven, moreover, as Beethoven meant it. This is another way of saying that the purists had an evening of it; the utter catholicity of Koussevitzky's taste, the breadth of his vision, his fidelity to a composer's intentions all saw to that. With the conclusion of a final dance movement, wherein no vestige of a trepak was apparent, came to an end a concert which, for authenticity and artistic worth, succeeding concerts on the Choral Union series will be pressed to emulate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

... 28 1931

Boston Symphony On Way to Detroit

Special to THE DETROIT TIMES

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 28.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra left here today for their Detroit concert, after a rare exhibition of playing here before 5,500 persons in Hill Auditorium last night.

44

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor. Masonic Auditorium. Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Debussy Two Nocturnes; Ravel "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem; Strauss "Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem, Op. 40.

By HERMAN WISE

Detroit, represented alas, by but little more than a handful,, Wednesday night at Masonic Auditorium, paid homage to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Orchestral music, the performance of which has been unsurpassed here in a decade, was the treat of those who attended.

A musically alert audience sat spellbound as the magnificent Dr. Koussevitzky led his 110 men through a program that was practically matchless for its beauty and inspiring qualities. It was an event that will remain in the minds of the hearers long after the current season has come to an end.

The organization which visited this city for the first time since Dr. Koussevitsky assumed its leadership eight years ago, established at once a permanent place for itself in the hearts of its auditors. There can be little doubt but that on the occasion of its 50th anniversary it is one of the three outstanding orchestras in the country today.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who appears to be so mild-tempered, so soft-mannered, so carefully restrained in his every movement, startled and amazed his audience to what almost unbelieveable distances he can direct the strength and loveliness of his orchestra. The obvious idol of each one of his players, Dr. Koussevitsky was able also to win the lasting love of everyone.

Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, the last of the group by the master classicist, was the opening number. Written for string orchestra, it afforded an ideal opportunity for the five string choirs to reveal their perfect ensemble and balance.

The lyrical intensities of the Handel work was music fit for the angels and especially effective was the larghetto e piano. R. Burgin, the orchestra's virtuoso concertmaster, J. Theodorowicz, his playing partner, and J. Bedetti, first 'cellist, received personal recognition for their fine playing in this composition.

"Ein Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss, played after the intermission, assumed the proportions of being the evening's climax, if it can truthfully be said there was a climax, so meaningful was the entire performance.

From the first announcement of the hero's theme to the final chords depicting the hero's escape from the world and the completion, the greatest of all the Tone Poems of the German composer was a thrilling experience, re-lived, almost, by the audience. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation made the music ring with greatness. Mr. Burgin shared the applause with his director for his superb playing.

The searching, seemingly unsatisfied Debussy Nocturnes—Nuages and Feres—impressionistic music that creeps smoothly into one's being, allowed the orchestra to display the tenderest pianissimos obtainable. The music is soul-stirring to the utmost.

Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse," a furious, almost terrific work of musical significance, made the audience insist that Dr. Koussevitzky call the men of the orchestra to their feet to share the appreciation.

The Ravel Waltz is contemporary music, having first been played in Paris in 1920. The frenzied, enchanting charm of the score places it high in the list of compositions destined to live.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

1931

SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN AT ANN ARBOR

Special to The Free Press

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 27—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, made its first appearance in Ann Arbor in 15 years tonight. The program reached its point of greatest intensity in the ballet music, "Daphnis et Chloe," of Ravel.

The opening number, Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B. Minor, was fallowed by Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin." The Ravel ballet brought warm applause from the audience.

The Beethoven Seventh Symphony was played with fine spirit and Dr. Koussevitzky and the men of the orchestra shared the appreciation of those present.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

OCT 28 1931

---

* * *

Good News

WHEN you elbow your way into Memorial Hall Thursday night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra you will find the familiar auditorium effectively disguised.

Funds solicited and contributed by officers of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio and their associates have purchased composition leather coverings for the seats. Personal employes — chauffeurs, gardeners, house boys—of those officers have been working for the past fortnight to finish the job.

The result is that by Thursday night over 3000 of the 3650 seats will wear new green coats, a green that matches the color of the balcony rail and other woodwork. And, more important, the chairs are at last made habitable by padding that will, in some mysterious way, contribute to your enjoyment of the music.

Single admissions for the Boston Symphony concert are now on sale at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

* * *

Heldt's band came into prominenc

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 28 1931

Backstage Hangings

For the first time in its history, Memorial Hall backstage will be decorated, conductors' rooms hung with curtains and dressing room furniture installed, when the Symphony Club of central Ohio prepare for the appearance of the Boston Orchestra on Thursday night.

Unlike the new seats, these decorations are not the permanent contribution of the club, but will be removed after each of the five concerts.

Single admissions to the Boston concert will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the boxoffice in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., and at Memorial Hall preceding the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 28 1931

Symphony Season

The symphony orchestra season will open Friday evening at Syria Mosque with the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra under its distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The Strauss work, "Ein Heldenleben," will be the major work Friday evening, featuring 112 players. Other works include Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra; two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the Choreographic poem, "La Valse," by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 28 1931

Boston Orchestra To Play Here Friday

The orchestra season will open Friday evening at Syria Mosque with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, appearing after an absence of two years. The Richard Strauss work, "Ein Heldenleben," seldom heard owing to the great number of players required, will be the major item on the program. Other numbers are Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchstra; two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the Choreographic poem, "La Valse," by Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM JACKSON, MICH.
TRIBUNE

OCT 28 1931

---

last night from a fractured sku

Ann Arbor, Oct. 27.—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's seventh symphony, in a major, will be featured by the 111 piece orchestra.

Next Beethoven May Be American

Columbus Dispatch Oct. 29

"Golden Age" Germinating

Serge Koussevitzky.

Famous Symphony Leader Sees This In Feverish Sweep of Composition Since World War.

By ANNE SCHATENSTEIN.

THE next golden age of music is germinating in America today, and the next Beethoven, the next greatest world genius in music, will be the product of American life.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra's world-known leader, interprets the tremendous impetus and production of music on this side of the Atlantic since the war, as sweeping to the evolution of such an efflorescence inevitably.

His orchestra will open the concert season of Columbus in Memorial hall, Thursday, at 8:15 p. m.

The great Koussevitzky, gracious and benign over a fire of fervor which gleams through his eyes,, talked the future of music in America with a glo wof pride for its promise in his Deshler Wallick hatel suite Thursday morning.

"Maybe somewhere on a farm, in a flat anywhere in America there grows this great genius now. Maybe he do not come for 10 years, 20 or 30. But come he must."

* * *

THE famous orchestra leader still has troubles with English as a medium of expression.

"M-m-m-m- what is the word?" he struggles impatiently.

"Verstehen Sie Deutsch vielleicht?"

Ah and then he broke into a great articulateness!

He described the great quantity of composition now being pro-

---

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor. Masonic Auditorium. Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Debussy Two Nocturnes; Ravel "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem; Strauss "Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem, Op. 40.

By HERMAN WISE

Detroit, represented alas, by but little more than a handful,, Wednesday night at Masonic Auditorium, paid homage to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Orchestral music, the performance of which has been unsurpassed here in a decade, was the treat of those who attended.

A musically alert audience sat spellbound as the magnificent Dr. Koussevitzky led his 110 men through a program that was practically matchless for its beauty and inspiring qualities. It was an event that will remain in the minds of the hearers long after the current season has come to an end.

The organization which visited this city for the first time since Dr. Koussevitsky assumed its leadership eight years ago, established at once a permanent place for itself in the hearts of its auditors. There can be little doubt but that on the occasion of its 50th anniversary it is one of the three outstanding orchestras in the country today.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who appears to be so mild-tempered, so soft-mannered, so carefully restrained in his every movement, startled and amazed his audience to what almost unbelieveable distances he can direct the strength and loveliness of his orchestra. The obvious idol of each one of his players, Dr. Koussevitsky was able also to win the lasting love of everyone.

Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12, the last of the group by the master classicist, was the opening number. Written for string orchestra, it afforded an ideal opportunity for the five string choirs to reveal their perfect ensemble and balance.

The lyrical intensities of the Handel work was music fit for the angels and especially effective was the larghetto e piano. R. Burgin, the orchestra's virtuoso concertmaster, J. Theodorowicz, his playing partner, and J. Bedetti, first 'cellist, received personal recognition for their fine playing in this composition.

"Ein Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss, played after the intermission, assumed the proportions of being the evening's climax, if it can truthfully be said there was a climax, so meaningful was the entire performance.

From the first announcement of the hero's theme to the final chords depicting the hero's escape from the world and the completion, the greatest of all the Tone Poems of the German composer was a thrilling experience, re-lived, almost, by the audience. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation made the music ring with greatness. Mr. Burgin shared the applause with his director for his superb playing.

The searching, seemingly unsatisfied Debussy Nocturnes—Nuages and Feres—impressionistic music that creeps smoothly into one's being, allowed the orchestra to display the tenderest pianissimos obtainable. The music is soul-stirring to the utmost.

Ravel's Choregraphic Poem, "La Valse," a furious, almost terrific work of musical significance, made the audience insist that Dr. Koussevitzky call the men of the orchestra to their feet to share the appreciation.

The Ravel Waltz is contemporary music, having first been played in Paris in 1920. The frenzied, enchanting charm of the score places it high in the list of compositions destined to live.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

29 1931

Symphony Orchestra Arrives for Concert

Boston Symphony orchestra and its director, the world-known Serge Koussevitsky, arrived in Columbus, Thursday morning, for their concert, which will be given at 8:15 p. m., in Memorial hall.

This musical event opens the Columbus concert season.

The orchestra arrived in a private car from Detroit. It will go to Pittsburgh and Ithaca from here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

29 1931

Music Notes

Boston Orchestra Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky as conductor, at 8:15 p. m. Thursday opens the annual series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio in Memorial Hall. This is the first of a group of five symphony concerts.

The major presentation of the night will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92. The performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12 is its initial one here.

The orchestra arrives at 8:15 a. m. Thursday from Detroit. The seat sale continues through the day at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts. The box office will be at Memorial Hall after 5:30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 29 1931

Koussevitzky Proves Thrilling Conductor in Long Programme

By Ralph Holmes

IN THE course of what is rumored to be his last American season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Masonic auditorium Wednesday evening to play a concert which will not soon be forgotten by the tiny band of Detroiters on hand to hear it.

True, there were not many of us, but if Doctor Koussevitzky gave us a thrill which will tingle our memories for quite some time, we, in turn, made amends for our scanty numbers with an ovation that lifted us to our feet, as well as his players.

There were even shouts of approval from the more unrestrained, and no orchestra and no performance could have deserved them more.

Koussevitzky is a great conductor and his orchestra a virtuoso organization. Without in any sense qualifying the high achievements of Ossip Garilowitsch and the much smaller Detroit symphony (85 as against Boston's 110), is is a fine thing that such a superlative ensemble under such a dynamic leader should visit us at intervals to remind Detroit players and patrons alike that there are still greater heights to scale.

KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston's programme was absorbing, too, though rather longer than we are accustomed to. It started with a Handel Concerto Grosso for strings only—and what strings!—and included the two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festival," as well as Ravel's "La Valse," before the intermission. After the interval we heard Richard Strauss' "A Hero's Life"—a long life, measured by music, lasting 45 minutes.

These are all numbers thoroughly familiar to Detroit symphony enthusiasts, but not in many, many seasons, if ever, have they been played here with such complete effectiveness as Wednesday evening.

The Boston strings are amazing in the suavity of their tone, the silken velvet of their texture, the singleness of their speech. The brass is at once resonant and rich, the woodwinds sensitive and sweet, and the entire ensemble so delicately responsive to the leader's demands that he can breathe a pianissimo more felt than heard, or achieve a climax soul-lifting not only in its volume, but in its sense of vibrant power.

There was plenty of scope, to be sure, for both leader and men in the programme. The Handel concerto with the various groups and solo instruments conversing among themselves was in very truth a "concourse of sweet sounds." "Clouds" permitted quite other effects, largely with the same instruments, themes and phrases dissolving into each other with fascinating formlessness exactly as the title indicates .

"Fetes" was something else again. Koussevitzky discovered in it a dramatic vigor which may have even more intense than Debussy intended but which certainly poured fire into the veins of the audience

It seemed a bit questionable to play Ravell after Debussy, but in the actual performance the choice proved not so bad, for here again the dynamic Russian, glorying in the possibilities of the splendid instrument at his command, infused into the score a new meaning. Perhaps it was just imagination, but "La Valse" Wednesday evening was not just a luscious melody striving to establish itself above a long series of tantalizing attacks and encroachments, but the dance of life itself throbbing on through a welter of chaos to an ultimate oblivion.

And then came "Heldenleben!" Volumes could be written about that.

The work may seem a kind of naive egotism on the part of Strauss—frankly using himself as a hero. But it doesn't take much psychological penetration to realize that we are all heroes of our own personal dramas. We hear in these pages only the reflection of our own lives, our own struggles against snarling enemies, our own immersions into black dispairs; the passion of our own hearts awakened by the song of the first violin, the aspiration toward our own unattainable ideals. Not many of us are ever permitted that feeling of final achievement which Strauss was able to voice at the pinnacle of this titanic work, but it's comforting to know that others have Personally, I wish that "Heldenleben" ended at that glorious climax, but Strauss was too profound and too honest not to remind us of the long stretch of reflection, sadness, recollection, inaction which can come at the end of too long a life—a kind of compensating serenity perhaps, but not again the great moment.

Well—Koussevitzky played it Wednesday night for every last implication there was in it, and it was no wonder the audience stood to honor him and his musicians.

Conducting for Koussevitzky seems, with each number, a new and very personal experience. He is not especially demonstrative, but he is very intense and he pleads with his whole being, and sometimes audibly, for just the effect he wants. I shudder to think what would happen if he didn't get it, but get it he does or elese the Boston and New York concerts of this orchestra would not be sold out weeks in advance.

If this is indeed Doctor Kussevitzky's last year in America, I hope he remembers Detroit for the enthusiasm and not the size of the audience it gave him.

STAY ON

UNITED ARTISTS

"The Unholy Garden." Ronald Colman, Fay Wray, Warren Hymer and Estelle Taylor in a high and wide adventure on the Sahara. Second week.

STATE

"Susan Lenox" opens tomorrow after two and a half weeks at the Paramount. Greta Garbo, Clark Gable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
OCT 29 1931

An explanatory lecture on the Boston Symphony program to be given ~~tomorrow~~ by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department, has been changed in time from 4 p. m. to 8:15 in the evening.

The talk will be given at the Music Building in Wait Avenue, and all persons interested in the compositions to be played by the famous orchestra in Bailey Hall Saturday night are invited to listen.

Special traffic arrangements were announced today to facilitate handling the concert crowd Saturday night. Tower Road will be used as the main approach to the building, and Reservoir Avenue will be employed only as an exit.

More parking space than hitherto will be provided, nearer to the auditorium. Additional areas will be available both east and west of Bailey Hall, towards the College of Home Economics and Rockefeller Hall.

The 110-piece orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the winter music season at Cornell with the following program:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
OCT 29 1931

* * *

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was ~~the honored guest~~ Wednesday noon at a luncheon held by The Bohemians, musicians' club, at the Harmonie Club. The leader directed his orchestra in a program Wednesday night at Masonic Auditorium. The Boston Orchestra this year is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 29 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY PERFORMANCE STUNNING BY BOSTONIANS

Stirring Program Is Presented by Visiting Orchestra To a Small Audience.

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a season of musical Utopia in Masonic Auditorium Wednesday evening. It would be pleasant to add that hosts of Detroiters were there to partake in it, but alas, the huge hall was bleak, with far more empty chairs than occupied. It is a pity that in these days of stern budgets more citizens did not esteem the Boston Symphony's date of first importance. For such it was. It was, indeed, one of the most magnificent performances of any sort of music that the town has seen in years.

Detroit has not listened to the Bostonians often in late seasons. Serge Koussevitzky, most graceful and well-tailored of conductors, has given us little opportunity to test his mettle. But Wednesday evening he painted his artistic personality in utter detail. He presented a program whose course summoned every phase of direction and interpretation which a conductor can well display. And since "magnificent" is the only word for the evening and since the evening was his doing entirely, the word can justly be fastened on to him, to be worn, as he appears to wear everything from his smile to his Legion of Honor rosette, with abounding grace.

One is chiefly astonished at the orchestra's dynamics whose perfections, of course, spell the responsiveness and flexibility of the band. It achieves a pianissimo which seems the very shadow of a breath, but so expertly accomplished that, however soft the whisper, every choir and many individual instruments are audible. Then the brass can lead the orchestra in a shout that is heart-quaking but done with perfect graciousness of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky can cause the whole ship's company of 111 men to release a fortissimo chord on such a very hair line of accuracy that the listener feels a sort of vacuum in his ears. And more and more. One thinks presently that the orchestra is so perfectly trained and disciplined that it could go into a tug-of-war or a hockey match with similar effect—if Dr. Koussevitzky were captain.

* * *

He has—fortunately—concentrated on music, and with his brain as well as his genius. Therefore he is able to reveal the "Heldenleben" of Strauss as a true epic, full of tenderness and passion and romance, with song and conflict in equal authenticity. One forgets altogether that the work is lengthy and devious; the hero has a long life but his soul goes marching on in splendor. If you have ever considered the "Heldenleben" a trumpety affair or suspected it of bombast, you should have heard it done a la Koussevitzky.

The Strauss was the final number. Before the intermission came Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor—for strings—the two familiar Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse." Here was knightly music from the great past, something of the classicism of the modern idiom and a stunning work by what unison the orchestra obeyed his indications, and with what sonority and sweetness his dreams were realized, might provide a long and learned essay.

The audience may have been of dismaying smallness but it isn't likely that Dr. Koussevitzky has anywhere been more cordially treated. Shouts often arose at the end of a number and, at the conclusion of the evening, all the cus-

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 29

Enthusiastic Over Boston Symphony

By the Chaperon

MASONIC TEMPLE auditorium is becoming the rendezvous of music-loving society folk . . . Last night Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, directed his Boston Symphony Orchestra there in a manner that fascinated the audience and even brought shouts of "bravo!" at the close of some of the numbers.

Mrs. John S. Newberry, so staunch a supporter of our own Symphony Orchestra, attended the concert. She wore a black lace evening gown with deep border of matching tulle at the hem. Her wrap was of black velvet richly furred in ermine at the collar. She entertained several friends.

Mrs. Fred T. Murphy, another "regular" at Detroit's symphonic concerts, arrived with several guests. She was stunning in a gown of sapphire blue chiffon velvet over which she wore a gold cloth wrap. Her evening slippers were jeweled blue satin and sparkled in the night.

Miss Mary Jo Petzold, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Petzold, was strikingly handsome in a gown of heavy white crepe fashioned on Voinnet lines. With this she wore a long wrap of Persian rose chiffon velvet. Bands of the velvet were caught in rope effect at the back. The wrap was trimmed in sable. She wore Persian rose slippers.

The petite Mrs. Floyd G. Hitchcock wore a canary gold crepe gown under her short ermine jacket. Mrs. James B. Steep, who came with Mr. Steep, was smart in horizon blue evening gown over which she wore a matching blue velvet short wrap.

A handsome creme-colored motor drove up to the entrance of the auditorium bringing the popular Mr. and Mrs. J. J. O'Brien. A little street urchin, just so high, rushed to open the door of the car. He politely offered Mr. O'Brien his arm. The arm was accepted. Mrs. O'Brien was charmed with the gallant "half minute," who assisted her as she alighted from the car. The tiny lad was paid and the remainder of the evening wore a grin broader than that.

Mrs. O'Brien was stunning in black lace with matching chiffon velvet wrap trimmed in ermine.

Miss Gail Stephens of Metamora was lovely in black lace and chiffon over which she wore black panne velvet long wrap. Little Miss Helene Nichols, who came with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Nichols of Grosse Pointe Farms, chose for the evening a smart gown of black chiffon designed with low decolette. Her black chiffon velvet wrap was trimmed in ermine. Later in the evening I saw Miss Joan Nichols with a handsome young man.

Miss Mary Ledyard was unusual in simple chiffon gown of wood brown with large beige coin dots. She wore a brown fur jacket, waist length.

Still others noted during the evening were Mrs. Truman Handy Newberry, Mrs. Harriet N. Atterbury, Mrs. J. Bell Moran, Mr. and Mrs. Owen R. Skelton, Miss Christine Symington, Dan Buell, Mr. and Mrs. David B. Mereing, Mr. and Mrs. Moritz Kahn, Mr. and Mrs. McKee Robison, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Siewert and John P. Antisdel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 29 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS TOMORROW

Concert to Open Season in Pittsburgh

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, will appear tomorrow night at Syria Mosque after an absence of two years.

Koussevitzky

This concert will inaugurate the season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association which will bring the Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis and Chicago Symphony Orchestras.

The Boston organization plays the following program tomorrow night:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12........Handel
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
a. Nuages. b. Fetes.
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem....Ravel
"Ein Heidenleben," Tone Poem Op. 40 ....Strauss

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH
OCT 29 1931

Boston Symphony To Play Tonight

The box office for the Boston Symphony orchestra performance tonight in Memorial hall will be open until 5 p. m. at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third streets, after which it will transfer to Memorial hall. Special rates are being made to bona fide students and teachers. The concert hour is 8:15. Koussevitzky will conduct.

Tickets ~~for the Detroit~~ Symphony, which will come Dec. 1, may be obtained after tonight from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
OCT 29 1931

CONCERT TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Play At Memorial Hall.

Purchasers of tickets to the concert to be given Thursday night at Memorial Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have received typewritten requests that they refrain from applauding between the four movements of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, the major item of the program.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, in common with other orchestral leaders, believes that applause in the midst of a composition breaks its continuity and he likes to have his audiences adopt the habit of silence.

Thursday's audience has also been asked to rise at Dr. Koussevitzky's entrance in greeting to him.

The Boston Symphony is the first in a series of five orchestras brought to Columbus by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland are scheduled for later appearances. Tickets are at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
OCT 29 1931

Boston Orchestra Appears Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 112 strong, will arrive tomorrow morning for the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The program, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, promises to be one of the outstanding events of the season. It follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor No. 12...Handel
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
(Nuages. Fetes).
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem ....Ravel
Ein Heldenleben ....Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 29 1931

DETROIT EVENING T en Dig

SECURITY CODE

John Grogan Begins U.S. Marshal's Duties

John H. Grogan today

Koussevitzky Proves Thrilling Conductor in Long Programme

By Ralph Holmes

IN THE course of what is rumored to be his last American season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Masonic auditorium Wednesday evening to play a concert which will not soon be forgotten by the tiny band of Detroiters on hand to hear it.

True, there were not many of us, but if Doctor Koussevitzky gave us a thrill which will tingle our memories for quite some time, we, in turn, made amends for our scanty numbers with an ovation that lifted us to our feet, as well as his players.

There were even shouts of approval from the more unrestrained, and no orchestra and no performance could have deserved them more.

Koussevitzky is a great conductor and his orchestra a virtuoso organization. Without in any sense qualifying the high achievements of Ossip Garilowitsch and the much smaller Detroit symphony (85 as against Boston's 110), is is a fine thing that such a superlative ensemble under such a dynamic leader should visit us at intervals to remind Detroit players and patrons alike that there are still greater heights to scale.

KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston's programme was absorbing, too, though rather longer than we are accustomed to. It started with a Handel Concerto Grosso for strings only—and what strings!—and included the two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festival," as well as Ravel's "La Valse," before the intermission. After the interval we heard Richard Strauss' "A Hero's Life"—a long life, measured by music, lasting 45 minutes.

These are all numbers thoroughly familiar to Detroit symphony enthusiasts, but not in many, many seasons, if ever, have they been played here with such complete effectiveness as Wednesday evening.

The Boston strings are amazing in the suavity of their tone, the silken velvet of their texture, the singleness of their speech. The brass is at once resonant and rich, the woodwinds sensitive and sweet, and the entire ensemble so delicately responsive to the leader's demands that he can breathe a pianissimo more felt than heard, or achieve a climax soul-lifting not only in its volume, but in its sense of vibrant power.

There was plenty of scope, to be sure, for both leader and men in the programme. The Handel concerto with the various groups and solo instruments conversing among themselves was in very truth a "concourse of sweet sounds." "Clouds" permitted quite other effects, largely with the same instruments, themes and phrases dissolving into each other with fascinating formlessness exactly as the title indicates.

"Fetes" was something else again. Koussevitzky discovered in it a dramatic vigor which may have even more intense than Debussy intended but which certainly poured fire into the veins of the audience

It seemed a bit questionable to play Ravell after Debussy, but in the actual performance the choice proved not so bad, for here again the dynamic Russian, glorying in the possibilities of the splendid instrument at his command, infused into the score a new meaning. Perhaps it was just imagination, but "La Valse" Wednesday evening was not just a luscious melody striving to establish itself above a long series of tantalizing attacks and encroachments, but the dance of life itself throbbing on through a welter of chaos to an ultimate oblivion.

And then came "Heldenleben!" Volumes could be written about that.

The work may seem a kind of naive egotism on the part of Strauss—frankly using himself as a hero. But it doesn't take much psychological penetration to realize that we are all heroes of our own personal dramas. We hear in these pages only the reflection of our own lives, our own struggles against snarling enemies, our own immersions into black dispairs; the passion of our own hearts awakened by the song of the first violin, the aspiration toward our own unattainable ideals. Not many of us are ever permitted that feeling of final achievement which Strauss was able to voice at the pinnacle of this titanic work, but it's comforting to know that others have.

Personally, I wish that "Heldenleben" ended at that glorious climax, but Strauss was too profound and too honest not to remind us of the long stretch of reflection, sadness, recollection, inaction which can come at the end of too long a life—a kind of compensating serenity perhaps, but not again the great moment.

Well—Koussevitzky played it Wednesday night for every last implication there was in it, and it was no wonder the audience stood to honor him and his musicians.

Conducting for Koussevitzky seems, with each number, a new and very personal experience. He is not especially demonstrative, but he is very intense and he pleads with his whole being, and sometimes audibly, for just the effect he wants. I shudder to think what would happen if he didn't get it, but get it he does or elese the Boston and New York concerts of this orchestra would not be sold out weeks in advance.

If this is indeed Doctor Kussevitzky's last year in America, I hope he remembers Detroit for the enthusiasm and not the size of the audience it gave him.

STAY ON

UNITED ARTISTS

"The Unholy Garden." Ronald Colman, Fay Wray, Warren Hymer and Estelle Taylor in a high and wide adventure on the Sahara. Second week.

STATE

"Susan Lenox" opens tomorrow after two and a half weeks at the Paramount. Greta Garbo, Clark Gable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 29 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY APPEARS TOMORROW

Concert to Open Season in Pittsburgh

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, will appear tomorrow night at Syria Mosque after an absence of two years.

This concert will inaugurate the season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association which will bring the Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis and Chicago Symphony Orchestras.

Koussevitzky

The Boston organization plays the following program tomorrow night:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
a. Nuages. b. Fetes.
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem ... Ravel
"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem Op. 40 .... Strauss

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH
OCT 29 1931

Boston Symphony To Play Tonight

The box office for the Boston Symphony orchestra performance tonight in Memorial hall will be open until 5 p. m. at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third streets, after which it will transfer to Memorial hall. Special rates are being made to bona fide students and teachers. The concert hour is 8:15. Koussevitzky will conduct.

Tickets for the Detroit Symphony, which will come Dec. 1, may be obtained after tonight from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS
OCT 29 1931

Explanatory Lecture To Be Given Friday On Campus Concert

An explanatory lecture on the Boston Symphony program to be given tomorrow by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department, has been changed in time from 4 p. m. to 8:15 in the evening.

The talk will be given at the Music Building in Wait Avenue, and all persons interested in the compositions to be played by the famous orchestra in Bailey Hall Saturday night are invited to listen.

Special traffic arrangements were announced today to facilitate handling the concert crowd Saturday night. Tower Road will be used as the main approach to the building, and Reservoir Avenue will be employed only as an exit.

More parking space than hitherto will be provided, nearer to the auditorium. Additional areas will be available both east and west of Bailey Hall, towards the College of Home Economics and Rockefeller Hall.

The 110-piece orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the winter music season at Cornell with the following program: Brahms' Fourth Symphony; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse;" Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes;" and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

year is celebrating its [illegible] versary.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
OCT 29 1931

CONCERT TONIGHT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Play At Memorial Hall.

Purchasers of tickets to the concert to be given Thursday night at Memorial Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have received typewritten requests that they refrain from applauding between the four movements of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, the major item of the program.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, in common with other orchestral leaders, believes that applause in the midst of a composition breaks its continuity and he likes to have his audiences adopt the habit of silence.

Thursday's audience has also been asked to rise at Dr. Koussevitzky's entrance in greeting to him.

The Boston Symphony is the first in a series of five orchestras brought to Columbus by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland are scheduled for later appearances. Tickets are at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
OCT 29 1931

A BIG EVENING BY BOSTONIANS

Stirring Program Is Presented by Visiting Orchestra To a Small Audience.

By RUSSELL McLAUCHLIN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a season of musical Utopia in Masonic Auditorium Wednesday evening. It would be pleasant to add that hosts of Detroiters were there to partake in it, but alas, the huge hall was bleak, with far more empty chairs than occupied. It is a pity that in these days of stern budgets more citizens did not esteem the Boston Symphony's date of first importance. For such it was. It was, indeed, one of the most magnificent performances of any sort of music that the town has seen in years.

Detroit has not listened to the Bostonians often in late seasons. Serge Koussevitzky, most graceful and well-tailored of conductors, has given us little opportunity to test his mettle. But Wednesday evening he painted his artistic personality in utter detail. He presented a program whose course summoned every phase of direction and interpretation which a conductor can well display. And since "magnificent" is the only word for the evening and since the evening was his doing entirely, the word can justly be fastened on to him, to be worn, as he appears to wear everything from his smile to his Legion of Honor rosette, with abounding grace.

One is chiefly astonished at the orchestra's dynamics whose perfections, of course, spell the responsiveness and flexibility of the band. It achieves a pianissimo which seems the very shadow of a breath, but so expertly accomplished that, however soft the whisper, every choir and many individual instruments are audible. Then the brass can lead the orchestra in a shout that is heart-quaking but done with perfect graciousness of tone. Dr. Koussevitzky can cause the whole ship's company of 111 men to release a fortissimo chord on such a very hair line of accuracy that the listener feels a sort of vacuum in his ears. And more and more. One thinks presently that the orchestra is so perfectly trained and disciplined that it could go into a tug-of-war or a hockey match with similar effect—if Dr. Koussevitzky were captain.

* * *

He has—fortunately—concentrated on music, and with his brain as well as his genius. Therefore he is able to reveal the "Heldenleben" of Strauss as a true epic, full of tenderness and passion and romance, with song and conflict in equal authenticity. One forgets altogether that the work is lengthy and devious; the hero has a long life but his soul goes marching on in splendor. If you have ever considered the "Heldenleben" a trumpety affair or suspected it of bombast, you should have heard it done a la Koussevitzky.

The Strauss was the final number. Before the intermission came Handel's Concerto Grosso in B Minor—for strings—the two familiar Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse." Here was knightly music from the great past, something of the classicism of the modern idiom and a stunning work by a contemporary; a splendid piece of program-building.

With what personal and significent system of cadence Dr. Koussevitzky read this music and with what unison the orchestra obeyed his indications, and with what sonority and sweetness his dreams were realized, might provide a long and learned essay.

The audience may have been of dismaying smallness but it isn't likely that Dr. Koussevitzky has anywhere been more cordially treated. Shouts often arose at the end of a number and, at the conclusion of the evening, all the customers stood in his honor. He shared his reception with the orchestra generally and especially with Mr. Burgin, the youthful concertmaster, who made a triumphant impression all his own.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
OCT 29 1931

Boston Orchestra Appears Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 112 strong, will arrive tomorrow morning for the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The program, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, promises to be one of the outstanding events of the season. It follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor No. 12...Handel
Two Nocturnes ....Debussy
(Nuages. Fetes).
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem ....Ravel
Ein Heldenleben ....Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
OCT 29

Enthusiastic Over Boston Symphony

By the Chaperon

MASONIC TEMPLE auditorium is becoming the rendezvous of music-loving society folk . . . Last night Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, directed his Boston Symphony Orchestra there in a manner that fascinated the audience and even brought shouts of "bravo!" at the close of some of the numbers.

Mrs. John S. Newberry, so staunch a supporter of our own Symphony Orchestra, attended the concert. She wore a black lace evening gown with deep border of matching tulle at the hem. Her wrap was of black velvet richly furred in ermine at the collar. She entertained several friends.

Mrs. Fred T. Murphy, another "regular" at Detroit's symphonic concerts, arrived with several guests. She was stunning in a gown of sapphire blue chiffon velvet over which she wore a gold cloth wrap. Her evening slippers were jeweled blue satin and sparkled in the night.

Miss Mary Jo Petzold, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Petzold, was strikingly handsome in a gown of heavy white crepe fashioned on Voinnet lines. With this she wore a long wrap of Persian rose chiffon velvet. Bands of the velvet were caught in rope effect at the back. The wrap was trimmed in sable. She wore Persian rose slippers.

The petite Mrs. Floyd G. Hitchcock wore a canary gold crepe gown under her short ermine jacket. Mrs. James B. Steep, who came with Mr. Steep, was smart in horizon blue evening gown over which she wore a matching blue velvet short wrap.

A handsome creme-colored motor drove up to the entrance of the auditorium bringing the popular Mr. and Mrs. J. J. O'Brien. A little street urchin, just so high, rushed to open the door of the car. He politely offered Mr. O'Brien his arm. The arm was accepted. Mrs. O'Brien was charmed with the gallant "half minute," who assisted her as she alighted from the car. The tiny lad was paid and the remainder of the evening wore a grin broader than that.

Mrs. O'Brien was stunning in black lace with matching chiffon velvet wrap trimmed in ermine.

Miss Gail Stephens of Metamora was lovely in black lace and chiffon over which she wore black panne velvet long wrap. Little Miss Helene Nichols, who came with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Nichols of Grosse Pointe Farms, chose for the evening a smart gown of black chiffon designed with low decolette. Her black chiffon velvet wrap was trimmed in ermine. Later in the evening I saw Miss Joan Nichols with a handsome young man.

Miss Mary Ledyard was unusual in simple chiffon gown of wood brown with large beige coin dots. She wore a brown fur jacket, waist length.

Still others noted during the evening were Mrs. Truman Handy Newberry, Mrs. Harriet N. Atterbury, Mrs. J. Bell Moran, Mr. and Mrs. Owen R. Skelton, Miss Christine Symington, Dan Buell, Mr. and Mrs. David B. Moreing, Mr. and Mrs. Moritz Kahn, Mr. and Mrs. McKee Robison, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Siewert and John P. Antisdel.

REDUCTION RATIO
16x

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

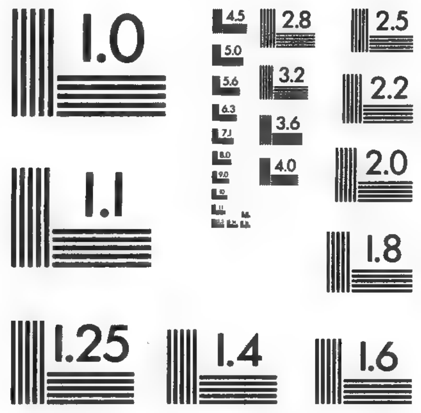
1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

46

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 30 1931

Music

SYMPHONY WINS SIGNAL TRIUMPH

Boston Orchestra Opens Season Here to Plaudits

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Superlatives are inadequate in describing the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, last night at Syria Mosque, for in inaugurating the season this celebrated organization and its famous conductor scored a signal triumph in the rendition of a program that was as superbly constructed as its performance was memorable.

The spirit and ideals of that incomparable music patron, Henry Higginson, who has long since entered into the Nirvana of great art patrons, seemed projected through the medium of the orchestra, that his vision, loving interest, and determination brought into existence, and supported for many years.

Ushering in the program came the last of Handel's stupendous Concertos Grosso, the twelfth, for strings; and if there had been any doubt of the possibilities of greatness of effect in a composition of this type, that doubt was dispelled by a beauty of tonal accomplishment in its performance.

Rare Musicianship

For sheer loveliness of instrumental bel canto, the gorgeous Concertos Grosso of Bach and Handel—when played as the Boston Symphony and Koussevitsky presented them—are unsurpassed. The nobility of the first Largo, the vigor of the fugal Allegro, the finely restrained emotion in the Larghetto and in the ensuing connective Largo, was encompassed with rare musicianship and skill, while the concluding Allegro was climaxed with playing of majestic grandeur. Schools of composition may come and go but these regal works of the domain of music will ever stir the souls of concert goers, as the Hendel work did last night when at its conclusion a storm of applause attested to the universal appeal that it commands.

In exquisite contrast followed the Debussy Nuages (Clouds), and Fetes (Festivals), in both of which the orchestra, under the magic spell of Koussevitsky's conducting, wove timbres of poeatic mysticism in a manner that was enthralling. Never before have we heard these ingratiating orchestral pastelles of Debussy performed with such entrancing effect.

'La Valse' is Highlight

Ravel's remarkably orchestrated choreographic poem, "La Valse" was another highlight. This brilliant work, fashioned on the compelling rhythm of the inimitable Viennese Waltz, runs the gamut of emotion. Delectable in its grace, the mood of the waltz mounts gradually until it reaches a climax of passionate ardor that borders on barbaric fury. Hypnotic in effect it won well deserved approbation.

The grand final of this memorable concert offered Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life)—a composition that will forever remain a tonal monument to a glorious music era, and to a transcendent musician—Richard Strauss—who probably is the foremost living composer.

Performance Impressive

The united efforts of the orchestra and Koussevitsky were productive of an inspired and highly impressive performance. They gave of themselves unstintedly and imbued this notable work with unusual vitality. Koussevitsky was complete master of his orchestral forces. He is the personification of unaffected grace, imparting his interpretive will without ostentation and in a manner that is indicative of consummate learning and profound knowledge of his art.

Richard Burgin, the concert master, played the solo sections of the Strauss Tone Poem with extraordinary skill and impeccability of technic, surmounting the tremendous musical and virtuosic demands with ease and finesse. Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra were tended an ovation at the completion of the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 30 1931

Inner Soul of Wagner, Beethoven, Handel and Ravel, Is Evoked by Koussevitzky, Leading His Boston Orchestra

By H. E. CHERRINGTON.

FROM the hallowed precincts of its own Orchestra hall last night came to our own Memorial the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the inspired and inspiring leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky. The concert marked the opening of the eighth season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, and it signalized the beginning of another year's delight for a few thousands of people, including the present writer, in the hearing of the highest type of music that the world affords

A half century and more of the Boston orchestra has naturally meant a wonderful development of the great band to which Colonel Higginson gave so much in the way, not only of support but of effective direction. The orchestra has now attained a stature that limns sharply against the horizon of our great musical attainments. Only three of four orchestras in the world can be compared with this, and only as many conductors, or a few more, have attained quite the stature of the almost worshipped Koussevitzky.

He comes before his audience, and at the head of his men, this calm, yet dynamic man, and very soon gives evidence that he is a master of music and a dominant leader of men.

GLORIES OF STRING CHOIR.

KOUSSEVITZKY, playing to a very large audience and one that did him every conceivable sort of honor—including the now somewhat perfunctory one of standing at the leader's entrance—was wise to open his program with the Handel Concerto Grosso for Strings, Opus 12, for he has a body of strings that we have seldom seen equaled, and we doubt if ever surpassed, among the bands which have come within our hearing. This fact was apparent all through this opening composition and especially in the second largo which was of opulent and rich-hued beauty; the tempo infallible, and its nuances of the most poetic order. The final allegro, it may be added, was as bright as sunrise birdsong. The program records that this was the first performance in Columbus of this opus, and we do not recall hearing before Ravel's "La Valse," though memory may err.

That really marvelous body of first violins gave an epochal command of unanimity, keen attunement, careful bowing, in the opening strains of the prelude to "Lohengrin," a work we have heard many times, but never played with quite the purity of beauty that it attained under the sedulous baton of Koussevitzky. The gradual crescendo was builded with a fine sense of form and a feeling for real symphonic architecture.

RAVEL AT HIS BEST

"LA VALSE," which Monteux introduced in Boston in one of the post-Muckian years (1922), belongs with the major achievements of Ravel, that little Napoleon of present-day French music. Styled a choreographic poem (for this adjective we stick to the old spelling of dance lore, though Bostonians, of course, use the lexicographers' preferred dropping of the second "o"), it invites to all sorts of interpretations. Opened by tympani and bassoons—the very dissonances of war—it proceeds to arpeggios in the violins and arabesques in the flutes; the rumbling military suggestion fighting for dominance a while and then succumbing to the persistent beauty of an almost Straussian waltz melody, nearly always with echoes of the storm and of unrest. The phrase of some critic, "We dance on a volcano," is a quite inspired description. The orchestra played this with great skill and with undeniable zest.

BEETHOVEN'S "SEVENTH"

AFTER the intermission, when the rigorous and sternly stylistic "Seventh" of Beethoven began, we began to have a feeling that so much color had been lavished on the first part of the program that the finale, with all regard to the mastery of Beethoven, was a bit too contrastful in its simplicity. Koussevitzky had wanted to do the "Eroica" in this place, but the club leaders had insisted on the "Seventh" as being the one now logically due. It was done in splendid fashion, with fine regard for traditions, with an exhibition again of what that noble choir of strings can do, in the allegretto, and with an especially crisp treatment of the third movement. The concert closed with a real demonstration of enthusiasm from the audience. An auspicious opening concert, if ever there was one.

SANE, YET INSPIRED

AS for Koussevitzky, who had been with us once before, he seems to us to parallel, in a general way, the attitude of Rachmaninoff in his own special field. His readings are of sanity and unostentation and yet marked by penetrative insight. Occasionally he will drop his beat for many measures at a time and again he is almost Creatore-ian in his solicitude for special expression in the individual choirs.

A great leader and a superb orchestra opens what we hope shall be for the Symphony club a most successful season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

Huge Audience Will Attend Music Debut

Bailey Hall was practically sold out today for the opening engagement of the University concert season tomorrow night—the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This organization of 110 members is generally recognized as one of the finest orchestras in the United States. It was established in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, with the plan of giving 24 subscription concerts on Saturday nights throughout the season.

The original orchestra had 67 pieces, and the first conductor was Georg Henschel. He was succeeded by Wilhelm Gericke, who soon made his orchestra the equal of any body of performers in Europe.

Among other conductors have been Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Dr. Karl Muck and Max Fiedler. The present conductor is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian musician of high repute.

Highly Perfected

The conductor is now always appointed for five years. Rehearsals of the group are held daily during the season. This, and the fact that the members play only at concert performance are considered the principal reasons for the high perfection that marks the playing of this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

* * *

COMING to Buffalo Nov. 30 with the full strength of the symphonic body, the Cleveland orchestra will give the second concert of the season in the Buffalo Musical foundation's series of four, which was opened so brilliantly last Monday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Cleveland orchestra, now established in its palatial new home, Severance hall, Cleveland, the last word in architectural beauty and musical equipment, is winning fresh laurels this season, traveling far afield, with the result that a protest has arisen from Cleveland music lovers, demanding more concerts in the home city.

This is the Cleveland orchestra's 14th season. Appreciation and support of this comparatively young orchestra, provided both at home and on tour have fostered its quick, but musically sound development. "The Cleveland orchestra exists," to quote from its articles of incorporation, "to give beautiful performances of great symphonic literature and to make proper presentation of the work of contemporary composers, thereby keeping alive the art of music."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 29 1931

Symphony Orchestra Here Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 112 players will arrive in Pittsburgh by special train tomorrow morning, and will give the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series in Syria Mosque tomorrow night. The program, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Two Nocturnes.......... Debussy
Nuages
Fetes
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem .... Ravel
Ein Heldenleben.......... Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

The French school will be represented at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight at Syria Mosque when Serge Koussevitzky gives Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." These pieces reveal this master as an impressionist painter. Ravel's "La Valse," a choreographic poem, and Handel's Concerto Grosso are also to be heard tonight. Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben (A Hero's Life), will conclude the program. This work calls for an unusually large orchestra, many special instruments of brass and percussion being employed in the famous battle episode. This work was first performed in the United States by Theodore Thomas in Chicago in 1900.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

Koussevitzky Honored.

The Detroit Bohemians, the city's club of professional musicians, held a luncheon and reception Wednesday noon at the Harmonie Club in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played at the Masonic Auditorium Wednesday night. The occasion was attended by 50 members and guests. George Miquelle, first cello of the Detroit Symphony and president of the Bohemians, presided, expressing a tribute to the guest of honor and presenting him. Dr. Koussevitzky spoke briefly, emphasizing the value of such an organization in discouraging professional conflict and advancing music generally.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

30 1931

Symphony Conductor Guest.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, 2065 Barton Pl., entertained informally Thursday at a supper party following the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Memorial Hall in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor. The orchestra opened the concert season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

Boston Symphony Here In Concert Tonight

The French school will be represented in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight in Syria Mosque, when Serge Koussevitzky gives Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" will be on the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ZIT'S

Boris Kreinin, 52, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Boston from injuries suffered when he was struck by a motor truck. He had been soloist and concertmaster in Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow and soloist and assistant conductor at the Opera Theatre in Petrograd.

LONDON MORN

POST, WEDNESDAY,
NOVEMBER 4, 1931.

IMPRESSIONS OF MUSIC IN U.S.—I.

Three Orchestras and their Conductors

VARYING METHODS

By BASIL MAINE

Organisation is the ruling passion of our time. The truth of this is manifest in every sphere of activity, in politics (of course), in religion (even), in sport, in commerce (for all its apparent chaos), in book-publishing, in play-production, in music-making, and so on. In the sphere of music-making the passion is revealed at its most intense degree in the quest for perfection in orchestral playing.

It is only of late that we in England have started out on this adventure. It was necessary for us to be visited by orchestras from Berlin, Vienna, and New York before we began to realise that orchestral playing was something more serious than a jolly game of sight-reading by a number of old hands who sometimes turned up on the night, and at other times sent deputies so that they could go and help in another little game in another parish hall.

Even then, after we had been shown how serious a matter an orchestral concert can be, there were many who were not inclined to forsake the happy-go-lucky concerts of the old kind for the intensive culture of the new. Many are still disinclined. They prefer to be ordinary listeners at amateurish concerts rather than eager analysts of music which has first of all been masticated for them by a dozen M.A.'s (Masters of Appreciation), and afterwards is played by a slick and shiny machine of an orchestra.

ORGANISATION AN AXIOM

But I must be careful not to embark here upon a thesis lest I find that I have no space in which to prove my point. (In any case, my real point has not yet emerged, has only been suggested! Another time, then.) My present purpose is to record recent experiences of music-making in a country where organisation is not so much a passion as an axiom.

Just over three weeks ago, through the courtesy of the various managers, I was the guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Philharmonic Symphony Society of New York, each in its own city and on successive days. Both in America and on my return to England I have been repeatedly asked to give my impressions of the three orchestras, to compare them, giving reasons, as the examination papers say, for my preference. And always I have answered that it is almost impossible to give preference to one orchestra above the other two.

For one thing, the three attainments are so alike in quality and degree that it would be necessary to indulge in technical hair-splitting in order to differentiate, an obnoxious and dull occupation both for writer and reader. For another thing, a final judgment based on a single programme by each orchestra, with each programme entirely different from the others, would be valueless, not to say unjust. Moreover, my arrival in America coincided with the opening of the concert season. The baseball teams had become fixed units; all summer long a rigid organisation had been working towards that end. But in October the orchestras had yet to play themselves in.

IN BOSTON

I forbear, therefore, to rush in where many a devil has dared to tread, and will concentrate upon mere impressions, heedless of Ernest Newman's recent anathematising of "personal reactions," I travelled from the Worcester (Mass.) Festival to Boston for the Symphony concert there. Koussevitzky conducted. Decidedly he has impressed his personality upon that orchestra and made it his own. The players understood him to a demisemiquaver, understood his conceptions in themselves and in every detail.

It seemed to me that this was the more remarkable seeing that Koussevitzky's beat sometimes becomes a fanciful flourish; he is then difficult to follow. Of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" (the second suite) he gave a brilliant performance. In this the climax was overwhelming, yet with no danger of the composite whole splitting up into confusion. The Boston players never give you noise. Each tone is telling.

I was agreeably surprised by Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms's Fourth Symphony—surprised, because I had harboured an altogether different notion of his attitude toward Brahms. It was enlightening to compare the phrasing in the Symphony and in César Franck's "Les Eolides." Not every conductor, not every great conductor, is always successful in appraising the subtle difference of quality between a typical phrase for strings in Brahms and in Franck.

The works in the programme compelled one to attend to the excellence of some of the units of this orchestra, the first flute, for example, the first horn, and the first clarinet who, I was told, recently went over from the Vienna Philharmonic. The glittering ensemble, however, in the Ravel suite permitted no dwelling upon the merits of individuals. This was a brief moment of transfiguration. I experienced nothing like it at any other concert in America.

PHILADELPHIA IMPRESSION

The Philadelphia Concert left as vivid an impression, but of another kind. In the first place, the programme was confined to music of the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Centuries. In the second place, Stokowski's attitude, whether towards music or orchestra or audience, is altogether unlike that of Koussevitzky. Many would defend the purist ideals of the Philadelphia conductor. Others, perhaps, would find them, and their various expressions, irritating.

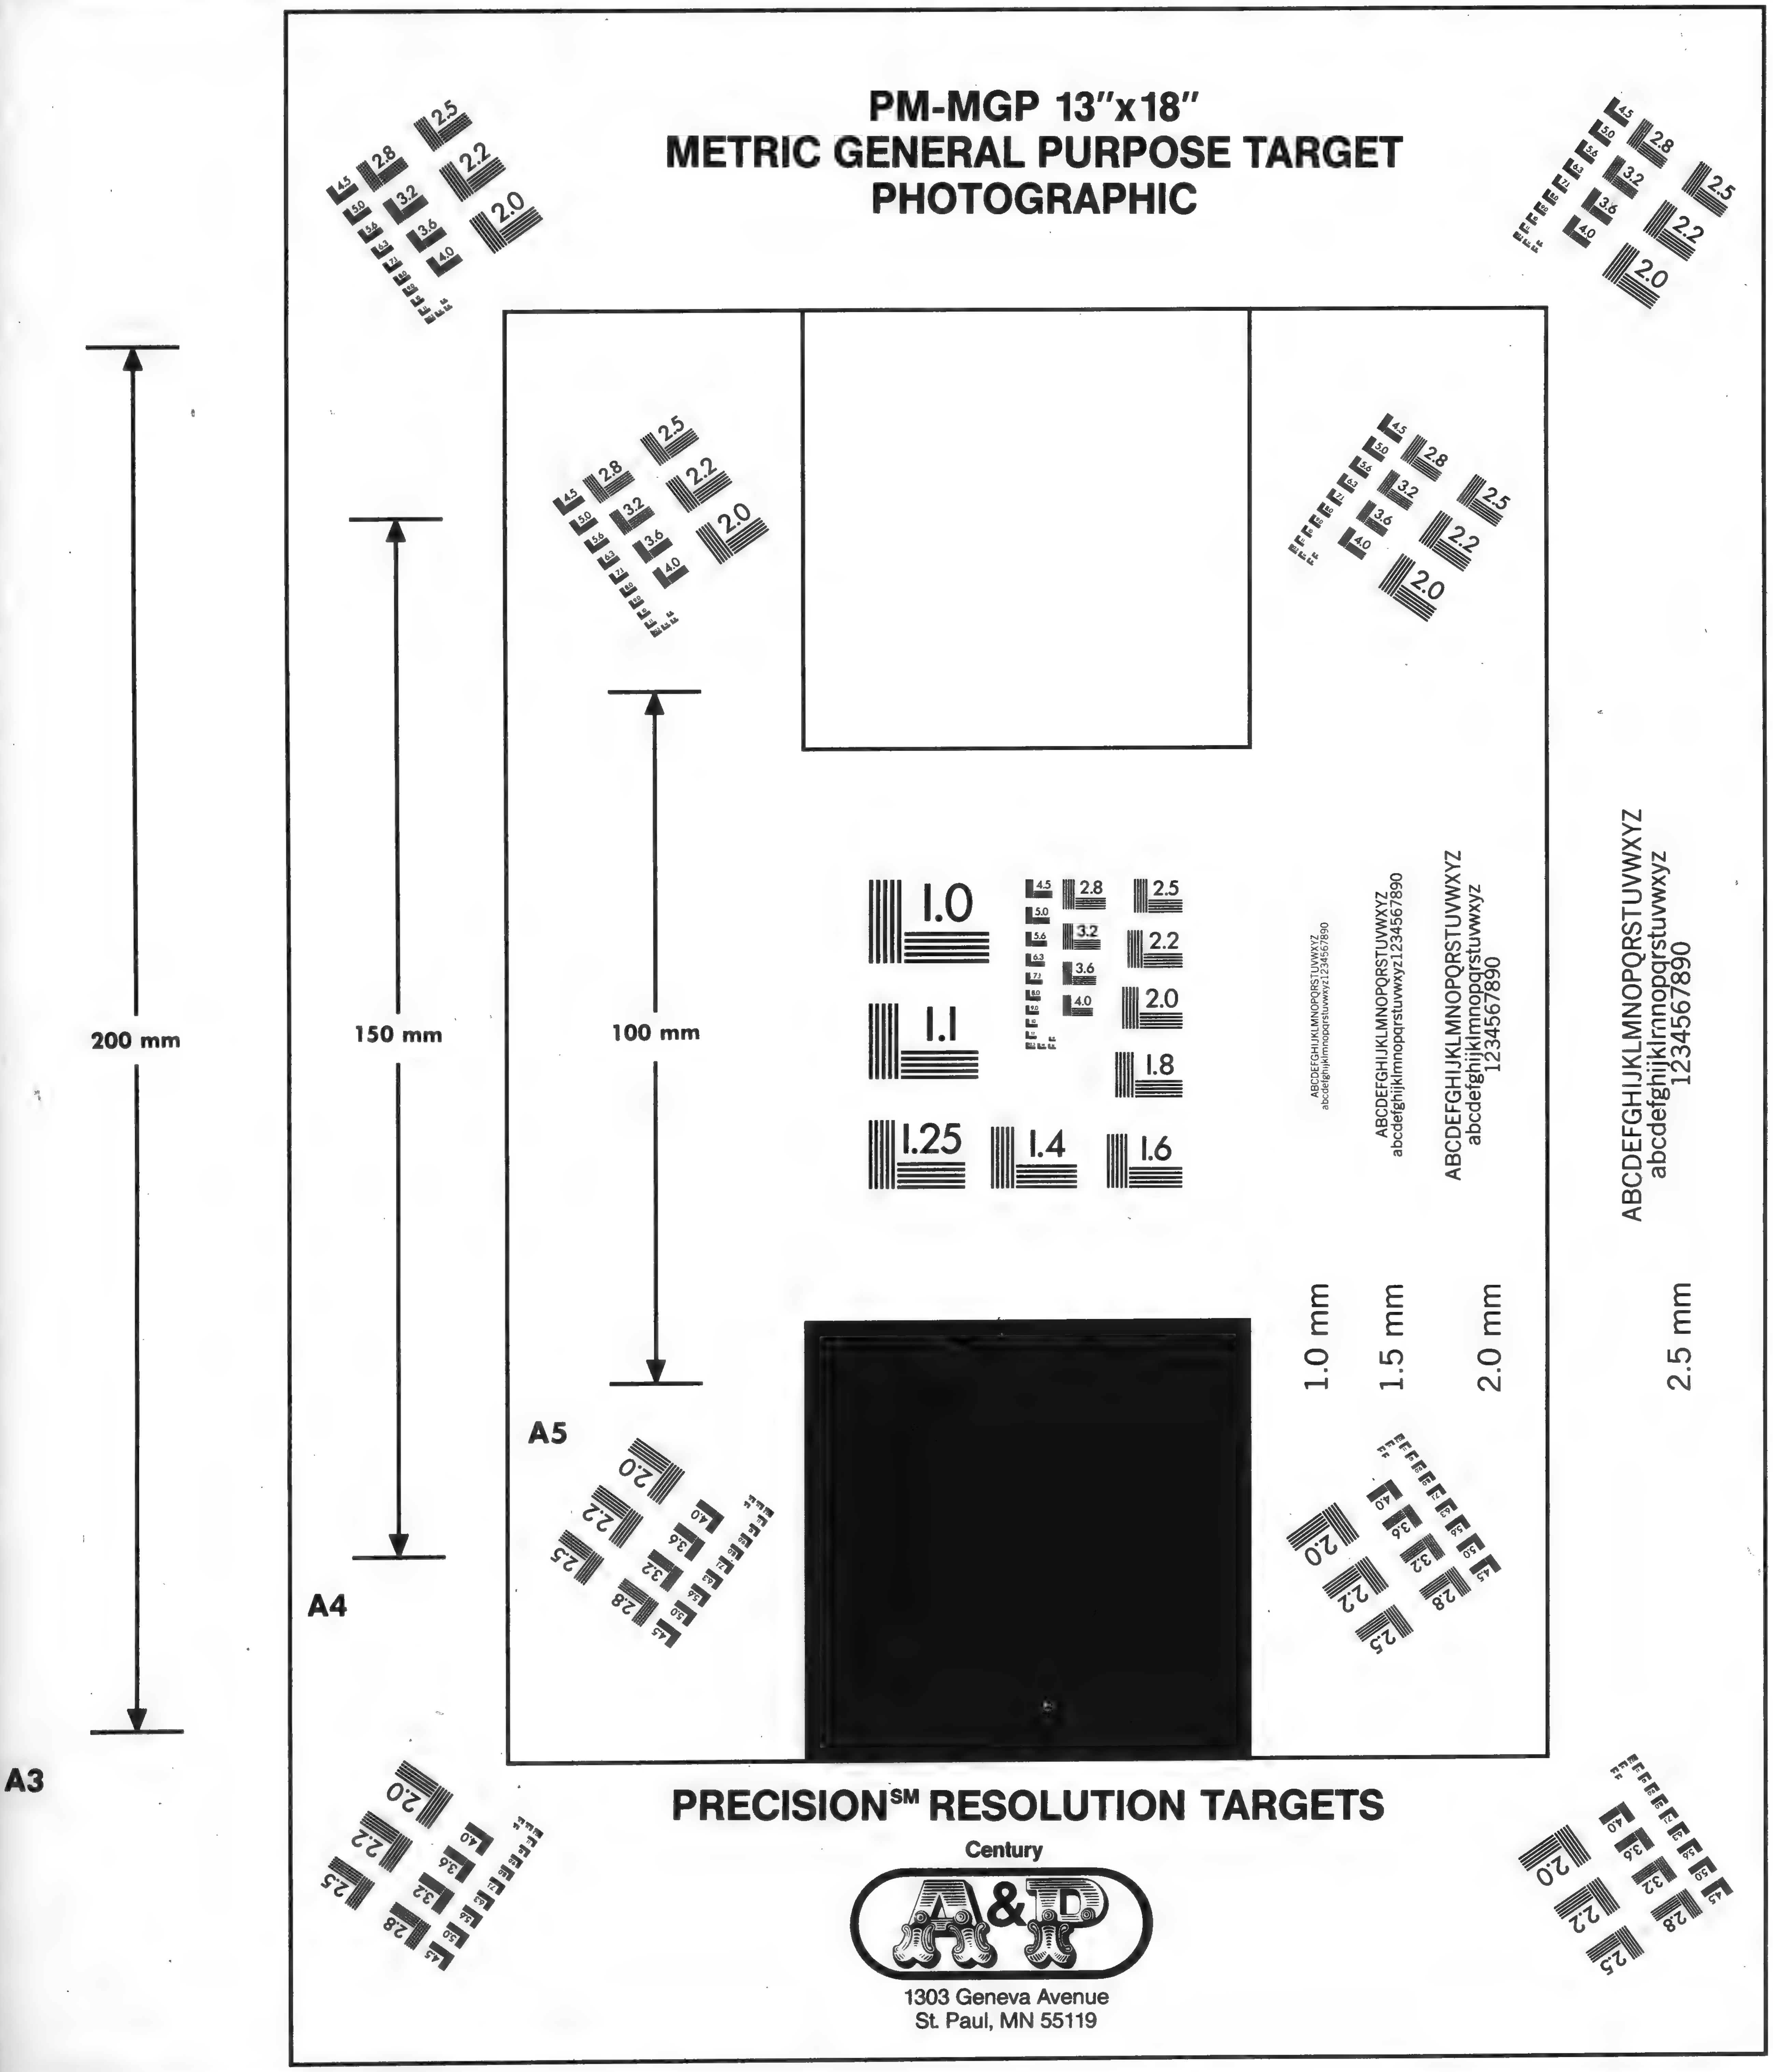
His habit, for instance, of beginning a work almost before he has reached his desk, and of playing through each half of the programme with no perceptible break between the works, may or may not be an eloquent plea for "music for music's sake." Certainly it is misleading for those who are beginning to form the habit of concert-attendance, especially when a suite of six movements and another of five, are presented so that the ordinary listener mistakes them for a single suite of eleven movements.

But whatever Stokowski does is allowed to pass—at present. And, in any case, it would be a mistake to allow these considerations to stand in the way of a full appreciation of the fine performances he directed in this uncompromising programme.

Erich Kleiber conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Concert. His straightforward methods revealed him to be a fine-thinking musician. He gave a reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which was persuasive because of its simplicity and utter sanity. There was no underlining (compare Fürtwangler's exaggeration of the violas' phrases in the second movement), no distortion, no undue emphasis. The last movement was one of the most natural performances I have ever heard. Which proved (to return to my original point) that even an organisation as complex as an orchestra, may still lead a healthy and natural life, must do so if it wishes to keep alive its audience.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

46

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 30 1931

Music

SYMPHONY WINS SIGNAL TRIUMPH

Boston Orchestra Opens Season Here to Plaudits

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Superlatives are inadequate in describing the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, last night at Syria Mosque, for in inaugurating the season this celebrated organization and its famous conductor scored a signal triumph in the rendition of a program that was as superbly constructed as its performance was memorable.

The spirit and ideals of that incomparable music patron, Henry Higginson, who has long since entered into the Nirvana of great art patrons, seemed projected through the medium of the orchestra, that his vision, loving interest, and determination brought into existence, and supported for many years.

Ushering in the program came the last of Handel's stupendous Concertos Grosso, the twelfth, for strings, and if there had been any doubt of the possibilities of greatness of effect in a composition of this type, that doubt was dispelled by a beauty of tonal accomplishment in its performance.

Rare Musicianship

For sheer loveliness of instrumental bel canto, the gorgeous Concertos Grosso of Bach and Handel—when played as the Boston Symphony and Koussevitsky presented them—are unsurpassed. The nobility of the first Largo, the vigor of the fugal Allegro, the finely restrained emotion in the Larghetto and in the ensuing connective Largo, was encompassed with rare musicianship and skill, while the concluding Allegro was climaxed with playing of majestic grandeur. Schools of composition may come and go but these regal works of the domain of music will ever stir the souls of concert goers, as the Hendel work did last night when at its conclusion a storm of applause attested to the universal appeal that it commands.

In exquisite contrast followed the Debussy Nuages (Clouds), and Fetes (Festivals), in both of which the orchestra, under the magic spell of Koussevitsky's conducting, wove timbres of poeatic mysticism in a manner that was enthralling. Never before have we heard these ingratiating orchestral pastelles of Debussy performed with such entrancing effect.

'La Valse' is Highlight

Ravel's remarkably orchestrated choreographic poem, "La Valse" was another highlight. This brilliant work, fashioned on the compelling rhythm of the inimitable Viennese Waltz, runs the gamut of emotion. Delectable in its grace, the mood of the waltz mounts gradually until it reaches a climax of passionate ardor that borders on barbaric fury. Hypnotic in effect it won well deserved approbation.

The grand final of this memorable concert offered Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life)—a composition that will forever remain a tonal monument to a glorious music era, and to a transcendent musician—Richard Strauss—who probably is the foremost living composer.

Performance Impressive

The united efforts of the orchestra and Koussevitsky were productive of an inspired and highly impressive performance. They gave of themselves unstintedly and imbued this notable work with unusual vitality. Koussevitsky was complete master of his orchestral forces. He is the personification of unaffected grace, imparting his interpretive will without ostentation and in a manner that is indicative of consummate learning and profound knowledge of his art.

Richard Burgin, the concert master, played the solo sections of the Strauss Tone Poem with extraordinary skill and impeccability of technic, surmounting the tremendous musical and virtuosic demands with ease and finesse. Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra were tended an ovation at the completion of the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

OCT 30 1931

Inner Soul of Wagner, Beethoven, Handel and Ravel, Is Evoked by Koussevitzky, Leading His Boston Orchestra

By H. E. CHERRINGTON.

FROM the hallowed precincts of its own Orchestra hall last night came to our own Memorial the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the inspired and inspiring leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky. The concert marked the opening of the eighth season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, and it signalized the beginning of another year's delight for a few thousands of people, including the present writer, in the hearing of the highest type of music that the world affords.

A half century and more of the Boston orchestra has naturally meant a wonderful development of the great band to which Colonel Higginson gave so much in the way, not only of support but of effective direction. The orchestra has now attained a stature that limns sharply against the horizon of our great musical attainments. Only three of four orchestras in the world can be compared with this, and only as many conductors, or a few more, have attained quite the stature of the almost worshipped Koussevitzky.

He comes before his audience, and at the head of his men, this calm, yet dynamic man, and very soon gives evidence that he is a master of music and a dominant leader of men.

GLORIES OF STRING CHOIR.

KOUSSEVITZKY, playing to a very large audience and one that did him every conceivable sort of honor—including the now somewhat perfunctory one of standing at the leader's entrance—was wise to open his program with the Handel Concerto Grosso for Strings, Opus 12, for he has a body of strings that we have seldom seen equaled, and we doubt if ever surpassed, among the bands which have come within our hearing. This fact was apparent all through this opening composition and especially in the second largo which was of opulent and rich-hued beauty; the tempo infallible, and its nuances of the most poetic order. The final allegro, it may be added, was as bright as sunrise birdsong. The program records that this was the first performance in Columbus of this opus, and we do not recall hearing before Ravel's "La Valse," though memory may err.

That really marvelous body of first violins gave an epochal command of unanimity, keen attunement, careful bowing, in the opening strains of the prelude to "Lohengrin," a work we have heard many times, but never played with quite the purity of beauty that it attained under the sedulous baton of Koussevitzky. The gradual crescendo was builded with a fine sense of form and a feeling for real symphonic architecture.

RAVEL AT HIS BEST

"LA VALSE." which Monteux introduced in Boston in one of the post-Muckian years (1922), belongs with the major achievements of Ravel, that little Napoleon of present-day French music. Styled a choreographic poem (for this adjective we stick to the old spelling of dance lore, though Bostonians, of course, use the lexicographers' preferred dropping of the second "o"), it invites to all sorts of interpretations. Opened by tympani and bassoons—the very dissonances of war—it proceeds to arpeggios in the violins and arabesques in the flutes; the rumbling military suggestion fighting for dominance a while and then succumbing to the persistent beauty of an almost Straussian waltz melody, nearly always with echoes of the storm and of unrest. The phrase of some critic, "We dance on a volcano," is a quite inspired description. The orchestra played this with great skill and with undeniable zest.

BEETHOVEN'S "SEVENTH"

AFTER the intermission, when the rigorous and sternly stylistic "Seventh" of Beethoven began, we began to have a feeling that so much color had been lavished on the first part of the program that the finale, with all regard to the mastery of Beethoven, was a bit too contrastful in its simplicity. Koussevitzky had wanted to do the "Eroica" in this place, but the club leaders had insisted on the "Seventh" as being the one now logically due. It was done in splendid fashion, with fine regard for traditions, with an exhibition again of what that noble choir of strings can do, in the allegretto, and with an especially crisp treatment of the third movement. The concert closed with a real demonstration of enthusiasm from the audience. An auspicious opening concert, if ever there was one.

SANE, YET INSPIRED

AS for Koussevitsky, who had been with us once before, he seems to us to parallel, in a general way, the attitude of Rachmaninoff in his own special field. His readings are of sanity and unostentation and yet marked by penetrative insight. Occasionally he will drop his beat for many measures at a time and again he is almost Creatore-ian in his solicitude for special expression in the individual choirs.

A great leader and a superb orchestra opens what we hope shall be for the Symphony club a most successful season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

OCT 3 1931

Huge Audience Will Attend Music Debut

Bailey Hall was practically sold out today for the opening engagement of the University concert season tomorrow night—the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This organization of 110 members is generally recognized as one of the finest orchestras in the United States. It was established in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, with the plan of giving 24 subscription concerts on Saturday nights throughout the season.

The original orchestra had 67 pieces, and the first conductor was Georg Henschel. He was succeeded by Wilhelm Gericke, who soon made his orchestra the equal of any body of performers in Europe.

Among other conductors have been Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Dr. Karl Muck and Max Fiedler. The present conductor is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian musician of high repute.

Highly Perfected

The conductor is now always appointed for five years. Rehearsals of the group are held daily during the season. This, and the fact that the members play only at concert performance are considered the principal reasons for the high perfection that marks the playing of this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 3 1931

* * *

COMING to Buffalo Nov. 30 with the full strength of the symphonic body, the Cleveland orchestra will give the second concert of the season in the Buffalo Musical foundation's series of four, which was opened so brilliantly last Monday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Cleveland orchestra, now established in its palatial new home, Severance hall, Cleveland, the last word in architectural beauty and musical equipment, is winning fresh laurels this season, traveling far afield, with the result that a protest has arisen from Cleveland music lovers, demanding more concerts in the home city.

This is the Cleveland orchestra's 14th season. Appreciation and support of this comparatively young orchestra, provided both at home and on tour have fostered its quick, but musically sound development. "The Cleveland orchestra exists," to quote from its articles of incorporation, "to give beautiful performances of great symphonic literature and to make proper presentation of the work of contemporary composers, thereby keeping alive the art of music."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 29 1931

Symphony Orchestra Here Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 112 players will arrive in Pittsburgh by special train tomorrow morning, and will give the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series in Syria Mosque tomorrow night. The program, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Two Nocturnes.......... Debussy
Nuages
Fetes
'La Valse," Choreographic Poem .... Ravel
Ein Heldenleben.......... Strauss

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 30 1931

ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

The French school will be represented at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight at Syria Mosque when Serge Koussevitzky gives Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." These pieces reveal this master as an impressionist painter. Ravel's "La Valse," a choreographic poem, and Handel's Concerto Grosso are also to be heard tonight. Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben (A Hero's Life), will conclude the program. This work calls for an unusually large orchestra, many special instruments of brass and percussion being employed in the famous battle episode. This work was first performed in the United States by Theodore Thomas in Chicago in 1900.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

Koussevitzky Honored.

The Detroit Bohemians, the city's club of professional musicians, held a luncheon and reception Wednesday noon at the Harmonie Club in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played at the Masonic Auditorium Wednesday night. The occasion was attended by 50 members and guests. George Miquelle, first cello of the Detroit Symphony and president of the Bohemians, presided, expressing a tribute to the guest of honor and presenting him. Dr. Koussevitzky spoke briefly, emphasizing the value of such an organization in discouraging professional conflict and advancing music generally.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 30 1931

Symphony Conductor Guest.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, 2065 Barton Pl., entertained informally Thursday at a supper party following the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Memorial Hall in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor. The orchestra opened the concert season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 30 1931

Boston Symphony Here In Concert Tonight

The French school will be represented in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight in Syria Mosque, when Serge Koussevitzky gives Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" will be on the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ZIT'S

Boris Kreinin, 52, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Boston from injuries suffered when he was struck by a motor truck. He had been soloist and concertmaster in Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow and soloist and assistant conductor at the Opera Theatre in Petrograd.

LONDON MORN

POST, WEDNESDAY,
NOVEMBER 4, 1931.

IMPRESSIONS OF MUSIC IN U.S.—I.

Three Orchestras and their Conductors

VARYING METHODS

By BASIL MAINE

Organisation is the ruling passion of our time. The truth of this is manifest in every sphere of activity, in politics (of course), in religion (even), in sport, in commerce (for all its apparent chaos), in book-publishing, in play-production, in music-making, and so on. In the sphere of music-making the passion is revealed at its most intense degree in the quest for perfection in orchestral playing.

It is only of late that we in England have started out on this adventure. It was necessary for us to be visited by orchestras from Berlin, Vienna, and New York before we began to realise that orchestral playing was something more serious than a jolly game of sight-reading by a number of old hands who sometimes turned up on the night, and at other times sent deputies so that they could go and help in another little game in another parish hall.

Even then, after we had been shown how serious a matter an orchestral concert can be, there were many who were not inclined to forsake the happy-go-lucky concerts of the old kind for the intensive culture of the new. Many are still disinclined. They prefer to be ordinary listeners at amateurish concerts rather than eager analysts of music which has first of all been masticated for them by a dozen M.A.'s (Masters of Appreciation), and afterwards is played by a slick and shiny machine of an orchestra.

ORGANISATION AN AXIOM

But I must be careful not to embark here upon a thesis lest I find that I have no space in which to prove my point. (In any case, my real point has not yet emerged, has only been suggested! Another time, then.) My present purpose is to record recent experiences of music-making in a country where organisation is not so much a passion as an axiom.

Just over three weeks ago, through the courtesy of the various managers, I was the guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Philharmonic Symphony Society of New York, each in its own city and on successive days. Both in America and on my return to England I have been repeatedly asked to give my impressions of the three orchestras, to compare them, giving reasons, as the examination papers say, for my preference. And always I have answered that it is almost impossible to give preference to one orchestra above the other two.

For one thing, the three attainments are so alike in quality and degree that it would be necessary to indulge in technical hair-splitting in order to differentiate, an obnoxious and dull occupation both for writer and reader. For another thing, a final judgment based on a single programme by each orchestra, with each programme entirely different from the others, would be valueless, not to say unjust. Moreover, my arrival in America coincided with the opening of the concert season. The baseball teams had become fixed units; all summer long a rigid organisation had been working towards that end. But in October the orchestras had yet to play themselves in.

IN BOSTON

I forbear, therefore, to rush in where many a devil has dared to tread, and will concentrate upon mere impressions, heedless of Ernest Newman's recent anathematising of "personal reactions," I travelled from the Worcester (Mass.) Festival to Boston for the Symphony concert there. Koussevitzky conducted. Decidedly he has impressed his personality upon that orchestra and made it his own. The players understood him to a demisemiquaver, understood his conceptions in themselves and in every detail.

It seemed to me that this was the more remarkable seeing that Koussevitzky's beat sometimes becomes a fanciful flourish; he is then difficult to follow. Of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" (the second suite) he gave a brilliant performance. In this th climax was overwhelming, yet with no danger of the composite whole splitting up into confusion. The Boston players never give you noise. Each tone is telling.

I was agreeably surprised by Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms's Fourth Symphony—surprised, because I had harboured an altogether different notion of his attitude toward Brahms. It was enlightening to compare the phrasing in the Symphony and in César Franck's "Les Eolides." Not every conductor, not every great conductor, is always successful in appraising the subtle difference of quality between a typical phrase for strings in Brahms and in Franck.

The works in the programme compelled one to attend to the excellence of some of the units of this orchestra, the first flute, for example, the first horn, and the first clarinet who, I was told, recently went over from the Vienna Philharmonic. The glittering ensemble, however, in the Ravel suite permitted no dwelling upon the merits of individuals. This was a brief moment of transfiguration. I experienced nothing like it at any other concert in America.

certos Grosso, the twelfth, for strings, and if there had been any doubt of the possibilities of greatness of effect in a composition of this type, that doubt was dispelled by a beauty of tonal accomplishment in its performance.

Rare Musicianship

For sheer loveliness of instrumental bel canto, the gorgeous Concertos Grosso of Bach and Handel—when played as the Boston Symphony and Koussevitsky presented them—are unsurpassed. The nobility of the first Largo, the vigor of the fugal Allegro, the finely restrained emotion in the Larghetto and in the ensuing connective Largo, was encompassed with rare musicianship and skill, while the concluding Allegro was climaxed with playing of majestic grandeur. Schools of composition may come and go but these regal works of the domain of music will ever stir the souls of concert goers, as the Hendel work did last night when at its conclusion a storm of applause attested to the universal appeal that it commands.

In exquisite contrast followed the Debussy Nuages (Clouds), and Fetes (Festivals), in both of which the orchestra, under the magic spell of Koussevitsky's conducting, wove timbres of poeatic mysticism in a manner that was enthralling. Never before have we heard these ingratiating orchestral pastelles of Debussy performed with such entrancing effect.

'La Valse' is Highlight

Ravel's remarkably orchestrated choreographic poem, "La Valse" was another highlight. This brilliant work, fashioned on the compelling rhythm of the inimitable Viennese Waltz, runs the gamut of emotion. Delectable in its grace, the mood of the waltz mounts gradually until it reaches a climax of passionate ardor that borders on barbaric fury. Hypnotic in effect it won well deserved approbation.

The grand final of this memorable concert offered Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life)—a composition that will forever remain a tonal monument to a glorious music era, and to a transcendent musician—Richard Strauss—who probably is the foremost living composer.

Performance Impressive

The united efforts of the orchestra and Koussevitsky were productive of an inspired and highly impressive performance. They gave of themselves unstintedly and imbued this notable work with unusual vitality. Koussevitsky was complete master of his orchestral forces. He is the personification of unaffected grace, imparting his interpretive will without ostentation and in a manner that is indicative of consummate learning and profound knowledge of his art.

Richard Burgin, the concert master, played the solo sections of the Strauss Tone Poem with extraordinary skill and impeccability of technic, surmounting the tremendous musical and virtuosic demands with ease and finesse. Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra were tended an ovation at the completion of the program.

---

including the now somewhat perfunctory one of standing at the leader's entrance—was wise to open his program with the Handel Concerto Grosso for Strings, Opus 12, for he has a body of strings that we have seldom seen equaled, and we doubt if ever surpassed, among the bands which have come within our hearing. This fact was apparent all through this opening composition and especially in the second largo which was of opulent and rich-hued beauty; the tempo infallible, and its nuances of the most poetic order. The final allegro, it may be added, was as bright as sunrise birdsong. The program records that this was the first performance in Columbus of this opus, and we do not recall hearing before Ravel's "La Valse," though memory may err.

That really marvelous body of first violins gave an epochal command of unanimity, keen attunement, careful bowing, in the opening strains of the prelude to "Lohengrin," a work we have heard many times, but never played with quite the purity of beauty that it attained under the sedulous baton of Koussevitzky. The gradual crescendo was builded with a fine sense of form and a feeling for real symphonic architecture.

RAVEL AT HIS BEST

"LA VALSE," which Monteux introduced in Boston in one of the post-Muckian years (1922), belongs with the major achievements of Ravel, that little Napoleon of present-day French music. Styled a choreographic poem (for this adjective we stick to the old spelling of dance lore, though Bostonians, of course, use the lexicographers' preferred dropping of the second "o"), it invites to all sorts of interpretations. Opened by tympani and bassoons—the very dissonances of war—it proceeds to arpeggios in the violins and arabesques in the flutes; the rumbling military suggestion fighting for dominance a while and then succumbing to the persistent beauty of an almost Straussian waltz melody, nearly always with echoes of the storm and of unrest. The phrase of some critic, "We dance on a volcano," is a quite inspired description. The orchestra played this with great skill and with undeniable zest.

BEETHOVEN'S "SEVENTH"

AFTER the intermission, when the rigorous and sternly stylistic "Seventh" of Beethoven began, we began to have a feeling that so much color had been lavished on the first part of the program that the finale, with all regard to the mastery of Beethoven, was a bit too contrastful in its simplicity. Koussevitzky had wanted to do the "Eroica" in this place, but the club leaders had insisted on the "Seventh" as being the one now logically due. It was done in splendid fashion, with fine regard for traditions, with an exhibition again of what that noble choir of strings can do, in the allegretto, and with an especially crisp treatment of the third movement. The concert closed with a real demonstration of enthusiasm from the audience. An auspicious opening concert, if ever there was one.

SANE, YET INSPIRED

AS for Koussevitsky, who had been with us once before, he seems to us to parallel, in a general way, the attitude of Rachmaninoff in his own special field. His readings are of sanity and unostentation and yet marked by penetrative insight. Occasionally he will drop his beat for many measures at a time and again he is almost Creatore-ian in his solicitude for special expression in the individual choirs.

A great leader and a superb orchestra opens what we hope shall be for the Symphony club a most successful season.

Dr. Karl Muck and Max Fiedler. The present conductor is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, a Russian musician of high repute.

Highly Perfected

The conductor is now always appointed for five years. Rehearsals of the group are held daily during the season. This, and the fact that the members play only at concert performance are considered the principal reasons for the high perfection that marks the playing of this orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

* * *

COMING to Buffalo Nov. 30 with the full strength of the symphonic body, the Cleveland orchestra will give the second concert of the season in the Buffalo Musical foundation's series of four, which was opened so brilliantly last Monday night by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Cleveland orchestra, now established in its palatial new home, Severance hall, Cleveland, the last word in architectural beauty and musical equipment, is winning fresh laurels this season, traveling far afield, with the result that a protest has arisen from Cleveland music lovers, demanding more concerts in the home city.

This is the Cleveland orchestra's 14th season. Appreciation and support of this comparatively young orchestra, provided both at home and on tour have fostered its quick, but musically sound development. "The Cleveland orchestra exists," to quote from its articles of incorporation, "to give beautiful performances of great symphonic literature and to make proper presentation of the work of contemporary composers, thereby keeping alive the art of music."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 29 193

Symphony Orchestra Here Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 112 players will arrive in Pittsburgh by special train tomorrow morning, and will give the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series in Syria Mosque tomorrow night. The program, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Two Nocturnes.......... Debussy
Nuages
Fetes
'La Valse," Choreographic Poem .... Ravel
Ein Heldenleben.......... Strauss

Koussevitzky Honored

The Detroit Bohemians, the city's club of professional musicians, held a luncheon and reception Wednesday noon at the Harmonie Club in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played at the Masonic Auditorium Wednesday night. The occasion was attended by 50 members and guests. George Miquelle, first cello of the Detroit Symphony and president of the Bohemians, presided, expressing a tribute to the guest of honor and presenting him. Dr. Koussevitzky spoke briefly, emphasizing the value of such an organization in discouraging professional conflict and advancing music generally.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

30 1931

Symphony Conductor Guest.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, 2065 Barton Pl., entertained informally Thursday at a supper party following the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Memorial Hall in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor. The orchestra opened the concert season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

Boston Symphony Here In Concert Tonight

The French school will be represented in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight in Syria Mosque, when Serge Koussevitzky gives Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals." Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" will be on the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ZIT'S

Boris Kreinin, 52, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in Boston from injuries suffered when he was struck by a motor truck. He had been soloist and concertmaster in Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in Moscow and soloist and assistant conductor at the Opera Theatre in Petrograd.

---

the quest for perfection in orchestral playing.

It is only of late that we in England have started out on this adventure. It was necessary for us to be visited by orchestras from Berlin, Vienna, and New York before we began to realise that orchestral playing was something more serious than a jolly game of sight-reading by a number of old hands who sometimes turned up on the night, and at other times sent deputies so that they could go and help in another little game in another parish hall.

Even then, after we had been shown how serious a matter an orchestral concert can be, there were many who were not inclined to forsake the happy-go-lucky concerts of the old kind for the intensive culture of the new. Many are still disinclined. They prefer to be ordinary listeners at amateurish concerts rather than eager analysts of music which has first of all been masticated for them by a dozen M.A.'s (Masters of Appreciation), and afterwards is played by a slick and shiny machine of an orchestra.

ORGANISATION AN AXIOM

But I must be careful not to embark here upon a thesis lest I find that I have no space in which to prove my point. (In any case, my real point has not yet emerged, has only been suggested! Another time, then.) My present purpose is to record recent experiences of music-making in a country where organisation is not so much a passion as an axiom.

Just over three weeks ago, through the courtesy of the various managers, I was the guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Philharmonic Symphony Society of New York, each in its own city and on successive days. Both in America and on my return to England I have been repeatedly asked to give my impressions of the three orchestras, to compare them, giving reasons, as the examination papers say, for my preference. And always I have answered that it is almost impossible to give preference to one orchestra above the other two.

For one thing, the three attainments are so alike in quality and degree that it would be necessary to indulge in technical hair-splitting in order to differentiate, an obnoxious and dull occupation both for writer and reader. For another thing, a final judgment based on a single programme by each orchestra, with each programme entirely different from the others, would be valueless, not to say unjust. Moreover, my arrival in America coincided with the opening of the concert season. The baseball teams had become fixed units; all summer long a rigid organisation had been working towards that end. But in October the orchestras had yet to play themselves in.

IN BOSTON

I forbear, therefore, to rush in where many a devil has dared to tread, and will concentrate upon mere impressions, heedless of Ernest Newman's recent anathematising of "personal reactions," I travelled from the Worcester (Mass.) Festival to Boston for the Symphony concert there. Koussevitzky conducted. Decidedly he has impressed his personality upon that orchestra and made it his own. The players understood him to a demisemiquaver, understood his conceptions in themselves and in every detail.

It seemed to me that this was the more remarkable seeing that Koussevitzky's beat sometimes becomes a fanciful flourish; he is then difficult to follow. Of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" (the second suite) he gave a brilliant performance. In this th climax was overwhelming, yet with no danger of the composite whole splitting up into confusion. The Boston players never give you noise. Each tone is telling.

I was agreeably surprised by Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms's Fourth Symphony—surprised, because I had harboured an altogether different notion of his attitude toward Brahms. It was enlightening to compare the phrasing in the Symphony and in César Franck's "Les Eolides." Not every conductor, not every great conductor, is always successful in appraising the subtle difference of quality between a typical phrase for strings in Brahms and in Franck.

The works in the programme compelled one to attend to the excellence of some of the units of this orchestra, the first flute, for example, the first horn, and the first clarinet who, I was told, recently went over from the Vienna Philharmonic. The glittering ensemble, however, in the Ravel suite permitted no dwelling upon the merits of individuals. This was a brief moment of transfiguration. I experienced nothing like it at any other concert in America.

PHILADELPHIA IMPRESSION

The Philadelphia Concert left as vivid an impression, but of another kind. In the first place, the programme was confined to music of the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Centuries. In the second place, Stokowski's attitude, whether towards music or orchestra or audience, is altogether unlike that of Koussevitzky. Many would defend the purist ideals of the Philadelphia conductor. Others, perhaps, would find them, and their various expressions, irritating.

His habit, for instance, of beginning a work almost before he has reached his desk, and of playing through each half of the programme with no perceptible break between the works, may or may not be an eloquent plea for "music for music's sake." Certainly it is misleading for those who are beginning to form the habit of concert-attendance, especially when a suite of six movements and another of five, are presented so that the ordinary listener mistakes them for a single suite of eleven movements.

But whatever Stokowski does is allowed to pass—at present. And, in any case, it would be a mistake to allow these considerations to stand in the way of a full appreciation of the fine performances he directed in this uncompromising programme.

Erich Kleiber conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Concert. His straightforward methods revealed him to be a fine-thinking musician. He gave a reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which was persuasive because of its simplicity and utter sanity. There was no underlining (compare Fürtwangler's exaggeration of the violas' phrases in the second movement), no distortion, no undue emphasis. The last movement was one of the most natural performances I have ever heard. Which proved (to return to my original point) that even an organisation as complex as an orchestra, may still lead a healthy and natural life, must do so if it wishes to keep alive its audience.

Midland Journey Trans. Oct 27

Buffalo on Monday, Ann Arbor and the University of Michigan yesterday. Detroit today, Columbus tomorrow, Pittsburgh on Friday, Ithaca and Cornell University on Saturday, are hearing the Symphony Orchestra this week in the course of its annual autumn journey Tel. CHelsea [illegible] last Sunday

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 31 1931

Symphonic Series Start At Mosque

Koussevitzky Brings Boston Orchestra, Fine Program.

By HARVEY GAUL.

Who cares whether banks fold up like autumn leaves, whether we're in a depression or not, the orchestra season has begun, and last night at the Mosque a large and representative audience was present to snap its fingers at the impending apple business.

And some of us sat spellbound when the brilliant Boston Symphony sung those pianissimo passages, and we were not breathless either from novelty of program (there was only one number new to these hilltops), but rather was it entirely due to Dr. Koussevitzky's reading and the supreme ability of the men.

That IS an orchestra, a truly noble organization, and having heard it last night one regrets that it has been two years since it was last here.

For effulgence of tone, great sumach-colored sonority, it is doubtful if you can surpass the Boston strings, and for brasses commend us to those gentlemen scattered along the back-drop—they were superb.

Handel to Strauss.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, No. 12, opened the program, and sometimes Handel is dry and perfunctory, but last night in the larghetto and in the second largo, one heard cantabile in apogee; Handel, writing slow movements only comparable to those to be followed later by Beethoven.

Lovely little dialogued phrases were in that concerto, and right here may we pay respects to the concert-meister for his playing in this work and later in the tone poem. Whoever he is he's an exceptional man.

One doubts if there is a finer French interpreter than Serge Koussevitzky. Certainly he has feeling for Debussy and as often as "Two Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fetes" have been played here, we don't remember finer mutations, nuances, half-whispers than Dr. Koussevitzky gave "Clouds." As for "Fetes," it went pounding along like a glorious French band—and if you have ever heard a French band come tramping up the boulevard you know exactly the flare-blare rhythm.

Then came Maurice Ravel's "Suicide in Costume," the impressionistic "La Valse," choregraphic poem, and the same being the birth of the waltz, the birth of all waltzes—and the period of gestation was terrific.

What shall be said for this? It was another "Bolero," this time a Viennese valze, rambling along to a smashing climax. It was devilishly clever in working out, highly spiced, ornamentated with all kinds of instrumental devices, and the whole working itself up into a white heat and boiling over; Waldteufel sung by 105 men, Johann Strauss as he has never been played—and what of it?

"Life of a Hero."

No symphony. Instead, Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," the same being his most impressive tone poem, "Life of a Hero."

Now we will probably run afoul of the people cursed with kultur rabies, and we will be branded an Anglophobe, but the scenario of "Ein Heldenleben" is positively childish. It is nothing but grandiose balderdash and proves the absolute futility of trying to set metaphysics to music. However, that's another story and takes some space to prove.

That Strauss gave the tone poem all of his craft we have heard many a time and oft, and that in its way it is a masterpiece, we all know. All solo bits were marvelously encompassed, and if you could stand the scenario, it was a glorious finale.

Let's have Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony back next year; they start the season in fitting fashion.

Their questionings were not without reason. Sibelius had been known chiefly as a pleasant "nationalistic" composer. That is to say, a composer adept at the handling of the folk-music of his country, or at writing in the manner of that folk music; a composer, who in the handling of such matter, found a balance pleasing to his public, nicely placed somewhere between innovating originality and pleasing conventionality. His First Symphony had disclosed him as a composer of unusual powers, qualified to justify his use of the largest and profoundest musical forms. In it his ideas and his technical resources were worthy of the symphonic mold. But the First Symphony was relatively conventional; seldom difficult to understand. The Second presented more difficulties to hearers. Sibelius was beginning to venture away from paths tried and proven. Call it a "transition work." The Third, in economy of means, in sparseness of texture, was so innovating that even the courageous Muck would not risk a performance. It remained for Koussevitzky to show Bostonians what a delightful work Sibelius had written almost a generation ahead of its time. In the Fourth much of this slightness of orchestral manner is retained; but Sibelius is beginning to reach out also into the harmonic innovations which the young century had introduced and established—whole-tone scales, polyharmonies, dissonant chord-combinations. Shorn of the essential sweetness with which Debussy had usually clothed such devices, this new manner must indeed have been bitter medicine in its own day. Will a generation more experienced in such matters find this Fourth as stimulating as it found the much questioned Third Symphony a few years ago?

A fairly recent writer upon Sibelius, Mr. Watson Lyle, in the "Musical Quarterly," has summarized the revived Symphony: "The first two movements of the Fourth Symphony are lyrical and imbued by a delicate poetic imagery that conveys to the ear an impression of the national characteristics of the composer's native land. Particularly in the second movement we seem to hear, afar, the fluting of shepherds and the calls of birds." (Mrs. Rosa Newmarch has said somewhere that the symphony must have been "composed in the midst of nature.") But to continue with Mr. Lyle: "The heavier manner of Sibelius, however, becomes again evident in the third [movement] and during part of the fourth, in which the emotion is blatantly rigorous: but nevertheless the work concludes with a resumption of the poetic mood that dominates the beginning."

In 1913 in the New York Sun Mr. Henderson printed a most excellent description of the work, more detailed than that of Mr. Lyle: "Sibelius has parted company with himself. In his first symphony he showed no great sympathy with the acidulated chords and the marrow-freezing melody which plays so large a part in the newest music. Now he has joined the futurists. He is as frankly dissonant as the worst of them. He has swallowed the whole tone scale, the disjointed sequences, the chord of the minor second, the flattened supertonic and all the Chinese horrors of the forbidden fifths.

"Yet the new symphony is a noteworthy composition. It has elemental imagination, courage of utterance, fearlessness of style. It is no mere jumble of surprises, but a consistently planned and masterfully executed piece. The themes are unusual, remote, solitary, but impressively thought; sometimes almost uncouth. The harmonies chafe and fret through many pages, and only occasionally do they fall into the restful cadences of the ancient day. The symphony is clearly written and its thought nicely balanced. Its chords are exquisitely distributed, its instrumentation is marvelously pure and transparent, and above all, the music has much to say. It is a truly characteristic delineation of moods and scenic backgrounds belonging to the wonderful northern land in which the composer lives. In the last movement the proclamation of the peasant nature is made with tremendous eloquence, yet the melody and harmonies almost raise the suspicion that Russia's Far Eastern Mongols have swept westward and invaded Finland. [Other commentators have also spoken of Oriental traits in this last movement.] The symphony is powerfully individual; it has the grip of large thoughts expressed in a vigorously personal idiom; it has nobility of style and it paints moods in deep-toned colors."

The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius runs in four movements. It is built upon a climactic plan, each movement being larger and more intense than the preceding. But each ends quietly and softly. Because of its highly original themes, its curiosities of harmony, structure and orchestration many writers have assumed a deeply hidden program. But no program has ever been avowed, nor, so far as present research goes, has one ever been written around the symphony by friendly scribes.

I. Tempo molto moderato, quasi adagio, 4-4. . . . This movement is only one hundred and fourteen measures long, yet it is a completely developed, though very free sonata-form. There are mystifying opening measures in double basses, violoncellos, bassoons, begun fortissimo. As these fade into the distance a solo-violoncello singe a darksome theme (A minor). Other 'cellos join in; the tune spreads through all the strings. At the climax rude brass chords, adagio, interrupt. Massed violins and violas enter with a short burst of melody (F-sharp minor), characterized by a huge leap and quick syncopations; this, the second principal theme of the movement, is less than two measures in length. The development commences shortly with a return to the original tempo. First the initial 'cello theme, later the syncopations of the second theme yield accompanimental lines in the strings against which novel melodic figures are outlined in the woodwinds. The initial development of the second theme enters in a solo 'cello, meanders, often in a single unaccompanied line, through several measures in higher strings. It soon becomes accompaniment to further woodwind figures. The development grows to its own climax, is interrupted by the rude brass chords which usher in the second theme (Adagio) and with it the recapitulation. The harmony at this point is a curious mixture of the dominant of F-sharp minor with the sub-dominant of A major. The music quickly subsides, and the first theme enters gently in A major, to conclude the movement.

II. Allegro molto vivace, 3-4. . . . An oboe sings a pastoral melody of exceeding simplicity. After some slight comment from strings, the strings themselves enter 2-4 with a passage of insistently repeated rhythm and largely in unaccompanied unisons. The answer is chiefly in long sustained woodwind chords, growing soon to sprightly flute-figures. The oboe-solo emerges this time with a counterpoint for 'cellos against its melody. All this soon gives way to another section, twice as slow as the preceding, in which clarinents and oboes announce a new theme that is the basis for the final climax of the movement. After which, sudden, abrupt, pianissimo ending.

III. Il tempo largo, 4-4. . . . There are two musical ideas in this movement—the fanciful one for flutes and clarinets at the beginning, another, more "cantabile," which is first announced by a quartet of horns, but which in more developed form ranges later from the lowest notes of the 'cellos into their more songful register. From the alternation and opposition of these two ideas arises the whole scheme of this movement. Singular and interesting is the growth of the second or lyric theme. It makes no less than five appearances, each more fully formed, more intense, than the preceding. Between the five appearances one finds chiefly recurrences of the flute-figures. After the last appearance, once more a sudden pianissimo close.

IV, Allegro, 2-2. . . . As already said, the largest and most amply developed of the four movements, the one in which barbaric, Oriental splendors have been discovered by more than one writer. Strings begin with a theme that is at once repeated. The repetition is interrupted, however, by an incisive phrase in violas, a motiv with the pungency, the conciseness, the pregnant power of Wagner in such inventions. This phrase recurs often, in various guises, as a sort of motto for the movement. The interrupted repetition is concluded by a new phrase in the violins which is also much repeated as answer in the diversified working of the thematic material, phase after phase.

The principal contrasting matter begins with a choral-like music in wind instruments over a persistent bass in strings. It leads into long-sustained chords for the winds and pages of repeated scale-figures in the strings. Above all this rises the motto-motiv, much broadened or "augmented," at first in the woodwinds; then, a little later, and still more broadly, by a trumpet. It is now answered by a sounding bell motiv. A recapitulation brings all this musical material to a climax, then subsides through delicately scored wood-wind figures to one more pianissimo ending in the strings.

A. H. M.

A Notable Program

For the fifth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, the last before conductor and orchestra make their first journey to New York, Dr. Koussevitzky sets a notably interesting program, viz.:

Five Picture-Studies (Arranged for Orchestra by Respighi)	Rakhmaninov
Tone-Poem, "The Tragedy of Salome"	Schmitt
Concerto in D major for Violin with Orchestra (Violinist: A. Busch)	Brahms
Carnival Scene, "Casanova in Venice,"	Pick-Mangiagalli

Respighi's twice deferred transcriptions of Rakhmaninov's piano-pieces and Pick-Mangiagalli's "Carnival Scene," with an intriguing subtitle, will be played for the first times anywhere. . . . Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" is his longest-lived piece. It has kept place in orchestral concerts and as background to a danced drama through nearly twenty years. Dr. Muck first brought it to the Symphony Concerts; he and other conductors repeated it more than once. The music is graphic, sombre, ominous, distinctly different from Strauss's treatment of the same theme. Schmitt for his part, works independently of Wilde's play.

Adolph Busch, the distinguished Prussian violinist, will make his first appearances in America at these concerts. Son of a violin-maker in Westphalia, pupil of Willy Hess, (some time Cencertmaster at Symphony Hall) he rose rapidly in his calling until he is now a renowned fiddler in Europe, head of the violin-school at the Berlin Conservatory as well. Incidentally, he is teacher of Yehudi Menuhin and brother of Fritz Busch, the director and chief conductor of the State Opera at Dresden. He courts the classics; cultivates "musicallity" and purity of style. Brahms's Concerto should disclose him admirably.

TRANS. His Autumn Nov. 6 47

(New York Times)

Jan Sibelius

Whose Fourth Symphony Is Revived Today at the Symphony Concerts. From a Drawing Made in His Middle Sixties.

Concert-Chronicle

Strauss in Cambridge

BEETHOVEN and Strauss filled the evening at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening. Those who attend symphony concerts at the university had long desired one of the larger Straussian works for their concerts. They had it last evening in the composer's "Ein Heldenleben." Strauss in answer to requests; Beethoven for a soloist, since at this concert Miss Eleanor Packard, 1930 winner of the Mason & Hamlin prize at the New England Conservatory, made her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her choice for performance fell upon Beethoven's Concerto No. 3, in C minor. By way of prelude to it Dr. Koussevitzky included the overture to "Coriolanus."

How would "Heldenleben" sound in Sanders Theater? Would its huge sonorities seem too overpowering under the tremendous overhanging sounding board which the gallery provides? Or because of the close proximity of orchestra to audience? The answer is easy. The "overpowering" qualities did not exceed those of the recent performances at Symphony Hall. Nearness to the orchestra brought only an increase in clarity. Not at farther range has one heard so perfectly the many various strands of that cackling, snarling, snapping cacophony which is the music of the hero's adversaries. And in the tumultuous battlefield music strings shone through equally. Sanders Theater favors large music as well as small.

But Dr. Koussevitzky's way with this music as much as Strauss's science of orchestration and genius for orchestration, makes such clearness possible. Only the important things in the score may stand out and they must be played with such vitality as to hold their own against all comers. Backgrounds are kept down to where the hearer is scarcely conscious of them. Such balancing, such proportioning, the huge sound-box which is Sanders can hardly do other than enhance.

Over and above the purely orchestral side, too, the conductor's way with this music is such as to put Strauss in the best possible light. One who had never heard or read the "program" could only listen to such a performance and carry away the idea of a tremendously virile, extraordinarily well formed piece of music The fashioning and proportioning and developing of the several themes would seem to such an one to make this piece a marvel of purely self-contained music. The balancing of the several divisions, the addition of the wondrously effective contemplative coda or epilogue would only increase the impression—if increase remained possible. But give to such an one the labels which have come to be associated with the several themes—the hero, his critics or detractors, the helpmeet—and of the several divisions—the battle-field, the hero at peace, for example—and this whole work takes on new significance. Thus performed and thus conceived, this music is illumined by its program, but is never dependent upon it. To be able to project such a program which only throws light upon a great music is after all one of the supreme Straussian achievements. To fully realize this in performance makes such performance unsurpassable.

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

Midland Journey

Trans, Oct 27

Buffalo on Monday, Ann Arbor and the University of Michigan yesterday, Detroit today, Columbus tomorrow, Pittsburgh on Friday, Ithaca and Cornell University on Saturday, are hearing the Symphony Orchestra this week in the course of its annual autumn journey westward. It left Boston last Sunday evening, to return next Sunday morning For the most part Dr. Koussevitzky assembled the programs from standard repertory pieces—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (Ann Arbor and Columbus); Chaikovsky's Fourth (Buffalo); Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor (everywhere except Ithaca); the Prelude to "Lohengrin" (Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Columbus) and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" (Ithaca) from Wagner; Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fêtes" (Detroit and Pittsburgh); "The Waltz" (Detroit, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Ithaca) and the Second Suite out of "Daphnis and Chloë" (Buffalo and Ann Arbor) from Ravel. Out of recent concerts at home come only Brahms's Fourth Symphony (Ithaca) and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" (Detroit and Pittsburgh).

Centenary Again

On the night of March 31, 1732, Josef Haydn was born in a village of Upper Austria. In every capital of music preparations are afoot to mark the coming bicentenary, especially in Vienna where Haydn dwelt and worked through many years. There even two or three of his operas will be resurrected. Here in Boston at an appropriate time, Dr. Koussevitzky will fill all, or the larger part, of a pair of Symphony Concerts with Haydn's music, choral excerpts from the seldom heard "Seasons" included. What the Handel and Haydn Society will propose in honor of the composer from whom it takes part of its name, does not yet appear. Possibly it will find something fresher than one more repetition of "The Creation." And it would be amusing were the operatic youngsters at the Conservatory to try their voices in one of Haydn's gayer little operas, say "The Apothecary." Mr. Goodrich, directing and producing it, could also do a good job. It is years since Boston has heard one of them.

Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the much debated Ninth Symphony of Mahler at the first of the supplementary Symphony Concerts on Monday evening of next week. He will join to it Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser" so reassembling one of the best-liked programs of the year.

Respighi's arrangement for orchestra of five of Rakhmaninov's "Picture-Studies," announced for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday, is again withdrawn for further rehearsal. An ancient Suite for Strings by Corelli will replace it.

Nov. 3

An Overlooked Symphony Now To Be Revived

Trans.—Nov. 5

Dr. Koussevitzky Turns Back To Sibelius's Fourth, Unheard Since 1917

AGAIN the concerts of the week-end at Symphony Hall are to give proof that Dr. Koussevitzky is as diligent in searching out old works that are too seldom played as in the introduction of new pieces. The work that is to be revived on Friday and Saturday is the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, Opus 63, in A minor. It is dedicated to Eero Järnefelt. It was first heard in Europe at Helsingfors in 1911 under Kajanus; in America at New York under Damrosch, March 2, 1913. Dr. Muck played it in Boston Oct. 24, 1913; repeated it in the spring of the same season; took it up again in 1917. In the intervening fourteen years it has been a silent voice on the shelves of the library at Symphony Hall—to await the searching Koussevitzky.

This Fourth Symphony was a hard nut to crack in those days of nineteen-thirteen. The majority of the reviewers spoke of baffling qualities, austerities, hardnesses; but for the most part took good care not to condemn it. The championing minority seemed, with few exceptions, as uncertain about what they were defending, as the majority were uncertain about what they were questioning; both fell back, some of them, upon the established reputation of Sibelius as guarantee of the worth of the new symphony; or discovered elemental qualities underneath an idiom which strained attention and shocked sensibility.

Their questionings were not without reason. Sibelius had been known chiefly as a pleasant "nationalistic" composer. That is to say, a composer adept at the handling of the folk-music of his country, or at writing in the manner of that folk music; a composer, who in the handling of such matter, found a balance pleasing to his public, nicely placed somewhere between innovating originality and pleasing conventionality. His First Symphony had disclosed him as a composer of unusual powers, qualified to justify his use of the largest and profoundest musical forms. In it his ideas and his technical resources were worthy of the symphonic mold. But the First Symphony was relatively conventional; seldom difficult to understand. The Second presented more difficulties to hearers. Sibelius was beginning to venture away from paths tried and proven. Call it a "transition work." The Third, in economy of means, in sparseness of texture, was so innovating that even the courageous Muck would not risk a performance. It remained for Koussevitzky to show Bostonians what a delightful work Sibelius had written almost a generation ahead of its time. In the Fourth much of this slightness of orchestral manner is retained; but Sibelius is beginning to reach out also into the harmonic innovations which the young century had introduced and established—whole-tone scales, polyharmonies, dissonant chord-combinations. Shorn of the essential sweetness with which Debussy had usually clothed such devices, this new manner must indeed have been bitter medicine in its own day. Will a generation more experienced in such matters find this Fourth as stimulating as it found the much questioned Third Symphony a few years ago?

A fairly recent writer upon Sibelius, Mr. Watson Lyle, in the "Musical Quarterly," has summarized the revived Symphony: "The first two movements of the Fourth Symphony are lyrical and imbued by a delicate poetic imagery that conveys to the ear an impression of the national characteristics of the composer's native land. Particularly in the second movement we seem to hear, afar, the fluting of shepherds and the calls of birds." (Mrs. Rosa Newmarch has said somewhere that the symphony must have been "composed in the midst of nature.") But to continue with Mr. Lyle: "The heavier manner of Sibelius, however, becomes again evident in the third [movement] and during part of the fourth, in which the emotion is blatantly rigorous: but nevertheless the work concludes with a resumption of the poetic mood that dominates the beginning."

In 1913 in the New York Sun Mr. Henderson printed a most excellent description of the work, more detailed than that of Mr. Lyle: "Sibelius has parted company with himself. In his first symphony he showed no great sympathy with the acidulated chords and the marrow-freezing melody which plays so large a part in the newest music. Now he has joined the futurists. He is as frankly dissonant as the worst of them. He has swallowed the whole tone scale, the disjointed sequences, the chord of the minor second, the flattened supertonic and all the Chinese horrors of the forbidden fifths.

"Yet the new symphony is a noteworthy composition. It has elemental imagination, courage of utterance, fearlessness of style. It is no mere jumble of surprises, but a consistently planned and masterfully executed piece. The themes are unusual, remote, solitary, but impressively thought; sometimes almost uncouth. The harmonies chafe and fret through many pages, and only occasionally do they fall into the restful cadences of the ancient day. The symphony is clearly written and its thought nicely balanced. Its chords are exquisitely distributed, its instrumentation is marvelously pure and transparent, and above all, the music has much to say. It is a truly characteristic delineation of moods and scenic backgrounds belonging to the wonderful northern land in which the composer lives. In the last movement the proclamation of the peasant nature is made with tremendous eloquence, yet the melody and harmonies almost raise the suspicion that Russia's Far Eastern Mongols have swept westward and invaded Finland. [Other commentators have also spoken of Oriental traits in this last movement.] The symphony is powerfully individual; it has the grip of large thoughts expressed in a vigorously personal idiom; it has nobility of style and it paints moods in deep-toned colors."

The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius runs in four movements. It is built upon a climactic plan, each movement being larger and more intense than the preceding. But each ends quietly and softly. Because of its highly original themes, its curiosities of harmony, structure and orchestration many writers have assumed a deeply hidden program. But no program has ever been avowed, nor, so far as present research goes, has one ever been written around the symphony by friendly scribes.

I. Tempo molto moderato, quasi adagio, 4-4. . . . This movement is only one hundred and fourteen measures long, yet it is a completely developed, though very free sonata-form. There are mystifying opening measures in double basses, violoncellos, bassoons, begun fortissimo. As these fade into the distance a solo-violoncello singe a darksome theme (A minor). Other 'cellos join in; the tune spreads through all the strings. At the climax rude brass chords, adagio, interrupt. Massed violins and violas enter with a short burst of melody (F-sharp minor), characterized by a huge leap and quick syncopations; this, the second principal theme of the movement, is less than two measures in length. The development commences shortly with a return to the original tempo. First the initial 'cello theme, later the syncopations of the second theme yield accompanimental lines in the strings against which novel melodic figures are outlined in the woodwinds. The initial development of the second theme enters in a solo 'cello, meanders, often in a single unaccompanied line, through several measures in higher strings. It soon becomes accompaniment to further woodwind figures. The development grows to its own climax, is interrupted by the rude brass chords which usher in the second theme (Adagio) and with it the recapitulation. The harmony at this point is a curious mixture of the dominant of F-sharp minor with the sub-dominant of A major. The music quickly subsides, and the first theme enters gently in A major, to conclude the movement.

II. Allegro molto vivace, 3-4. . . . An oboe sings a pastoral melody of exceeding simplicity. After some slight comment from strings, the strings themselves enter 2-4 with a passage of insistently repeated rhythm and largely in unaccompanied unisons. The answer is chiefly in long sustained woodwind chords, growing soon to sprightly flute-figures. The oboe-solo emerges this time with a counterpoint for 'cellos against its melody. All this soon gives way to another section, twice as slow as the preceding, in which clarinents and oboes announce a new theme that is the basis for the final climax of the movement. After which, sudden, abrupt, pianissimo ending.

III. Il tempo largo, 4-4. . . . There are two musical ideas in this movement—the fanciful one for flutes and clarinets at the beginning, another, more "cantabile," which is first announced by a quartet of horns, but which in more developed form ranges later from the lowest notes of the 'cellos into their more songful register. From the alternation and opposition of these two ideas arises the whole scheme of this movement. Singular and interesting is the growth of the second or lyric theme. It makes no less than five appearances, each more fully formed, more intense, than the preceding. Between the five appearances one finds chiefly recurrences of the flute-figures. After the last appearance, once more a sudden pianissimo close.

IV, Allegro, 2-2. . . . As already said, the largest and most amply developed of the four movements, the one in which barbaric, Oriental splendors have been discovered by more than one writer. Strings begin with a theme that is at once repeated. The repetition is interrupted, however, by an incisive phrase in violas, a motiv with the pungency, the conciseness, the pregnant power of Wagner in such inventions. This phrase recurs often, in various guises, as a sort of motto for the movement. The interrupted repetition is concluded by a new phrase in the violins which is also much repeated as answer in the diversified working of the thematic material, phase after phase.

The principal contrasting matter begins with a choral-like music in wind instruments over a persistent bass in strings. It leads into long-sustained chords for the winds and pages of repeated scale-figures in the strings. Above all this rises the motto-motiv, much broadened or "augmented," at first in the woodwinds; then, a little later, and still more broadly, by a trumpet. It is now answered by a sounding bell motiv. A recapitulation brings all this musical material to a climax, then subsides through delicately scored wood-wind figures to one more pianissimo ending in the strings.

A. H. M.

A Notable Program

For the fifth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, the last before conductor and orchestra make their first journey to New York, Dr. Koussevitzky sets a notably interesting program, viz.:

Five Picture-Studies..............Rakhmaninov
(Arranged for Orchestra by Respighi)
Tone-Poem, "The Tragedy of Salome"..Schmitt
Concerto in D major for Violin with Orchestra ....Brahms
(Violinist: A. Busch)
Carnival Scene, "Casanova in Venice," Pick-Mangiagalli

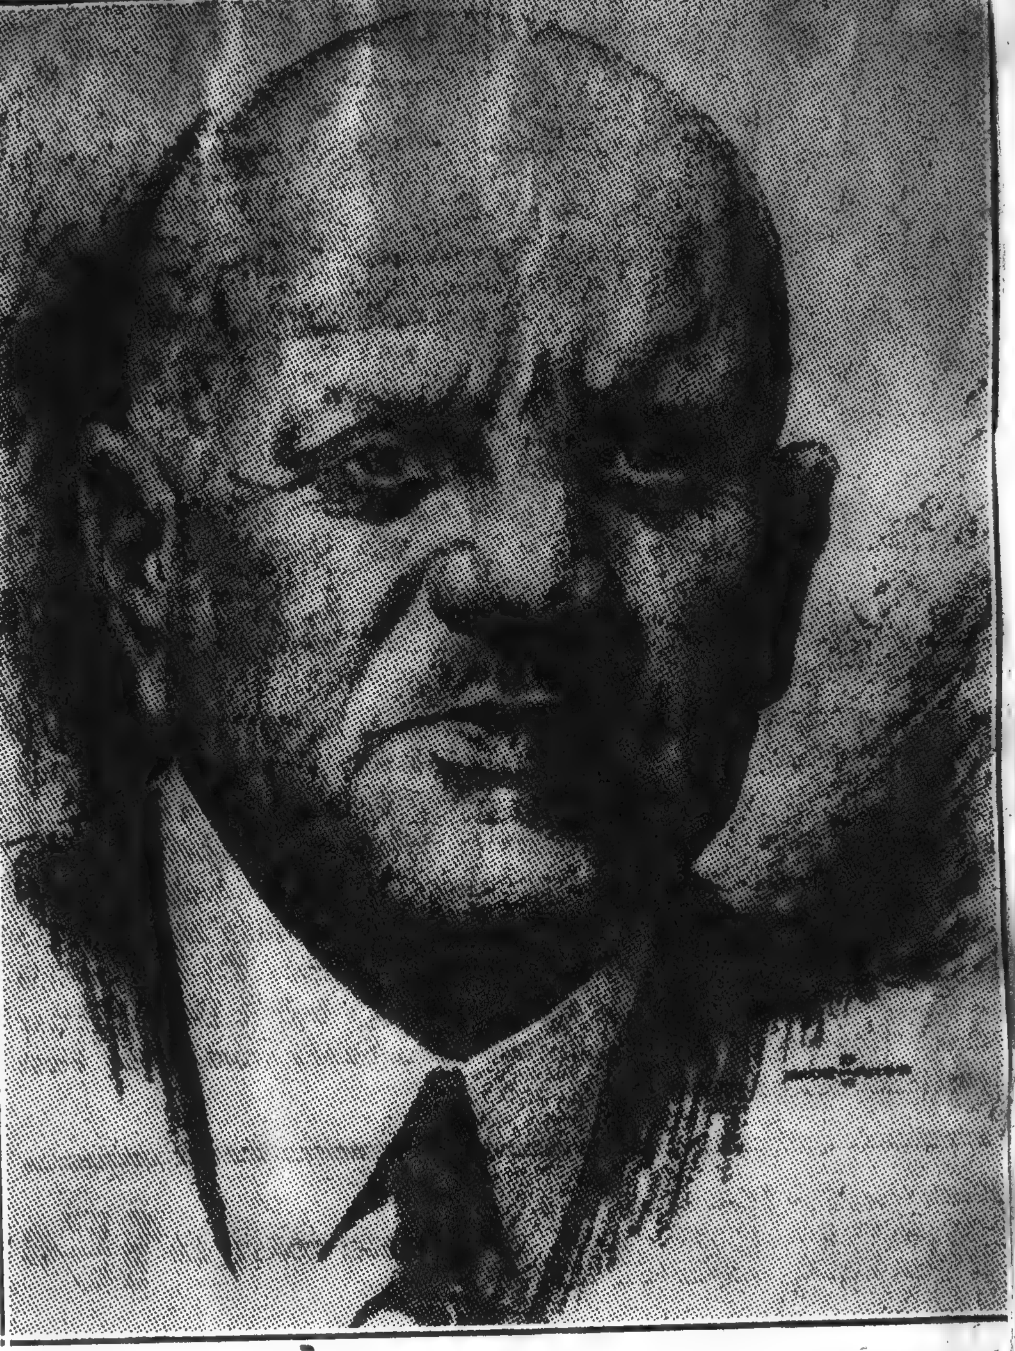
Respighi's twice deferred transcriptions of Rakhmaninov's piano-pieces and Pick-Mangiagalli's "Carnival Scene," with an intriguing subtitle, will be played for the first times anywhere. . . . Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" is his longest-lived piece. It has kept place in orchestral concerts and as background to a danced drama through nearly twenty years. Dr. Muck first brought it to the Symphony Concerts; he and other conductors repeated it more than once. The music is graphic, sombre, ominous, distinctly different from Strauss's treatment of the same theme. Schmitt for his part, works independently of Wilde's play.

Adolph Busch, the distinguished Prussian violinist, will make his first appearances in America at these concerts. Son of a violin-maker in Westphalia, pupil of Willy Hess, (some time Cencertmaster at Symphony Hall) he rose rapidly in his calling until he is now a renowned fiddler in Europe, head of the violin-school at the Berlin Conservatory as well. Incidentally, he is teacher of Yehudi Menuhin and brother of Fritz Busch, the director and chief conductor of the State Opera at Dresden. He courts the classics; cultivates "musicallity" and purity of style. Brahms's Concerto should disclose him admirably.

His Autumn

TRANS. Nov. 6



(New York Times)

Jan Sibelius

Whose Fourth Symphony Is Revived Today at the Symphony Concerts. From a Drawing Made in His Middle Sixties.

Concert-Chronicle

Strauss in Cambridge

BEETHOVEN and Strauss filled the evening at Sanders Theater in Cambridge last evening. Those who attend symphony concerts at the university had long desired one of the larger Straussian works for their concerts. They had it last evening in the composer's "Ein Heldenleben." Strauss in answer to requests; Beethoven for a soloist, since at this concert Miss Eleanor Packard, 1930 winner of the Mason & Hamlin prize at the New England Conservatory, made her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her choice for performance fell upon Beethoven's Concerto No. 3, in C minor. By way of prelude to it Dr. Koussevitzky included the overture to "Coriolanus."

How would "Heldenleben" sound in Sanders Theater? Would its huge sonorities seem too overpowering under the tremendous overhanging sounding board which the gallery provides? Or because of the close proximity of orchestra to audience? The answer is easy. The "overpowering" qualities did not exceed those of the recent performances at Symphony Hall. Nearness to the orchestra brought only an increase in clarity. Not at farther range has one heard so perfectly the many various strands of that cackling, snarling, snapping cacophony which is the music of the hero's adversaries. And in the tumultuous battlefield music strings shone through equally. Sanders Theater favors large music as well as small.

But Dr. Koussevitzky's way with this music as much as Strauss's science of orchestration and genius for orchestration, makes such clearness possible. Only the important things in the score may stand out and they must be played with such vitality as to hold their own against all comers. Backgrounds are kept down to where the hearer is scarcely conscious of them. Such balancing, such proportioning, the huge sound-box which is Sanders can hardly do other than enhance.

Over and above the purely orchestral side, too, the conductor's way with this music is such as to put Strauss in the best possible light. One who had never heard or read the "program" could only listen to such a performance and carry away the idea of a tremendously virile, extraordinarily well formed piece of music The fashioning and proportioning and developing of the several themes would seem to such an one to make this piece a marvel of purely self-contained music. The balancing of the several divisions, the addition of the wondrously effective contemplative coda or epilogue would only increase the impression—if increase remained possible. But give to such an one the labels which have come to be associated with the several themes—the hero, his critics or detractors, the helpmeet—and of the several divisions—the battle-field, the hero at peace, for example—and this whole work takes on new significance. Thus performed and thus conceived, this music is illumined by its program, but is never dependent upon it. To be able to project such a program which only throws light upon a great music is after all one of the supreme Straussian achievements. To fully realize this in performance makes such performance unsurpassable.

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

Miss Packard's playing of Beethoven's concerto created no little interest. Miss Packard is musical; this fact stood out pre-eminently. She has brains and knows how to use them; this was no less patent. Her technical equipment is considerable. All the passage work of the concerto came with great ease and fluency. A soft, pearly brilliance shone through it. Many a felicitous turn graced it. One thought repeatedly that one would like to hear her play Mozart in this manner. Wisely Miss Packard chose not to emulate or imitate this or that famous old master with interpretation profound or heroic or perhaps even epic. Wisely she chose, rather, through this concerto to reveal her graceful, fresh, youthful self. And the charm of an evident sincerity sealed the other admirable qualities. A fuller maturity is bound to come with the advancing years. In kind, Dr. Koussevitzky wrought his orchestral portions. And the unities as well as the niceties of performance were observed.

To the Coriolanus overture Dr. Koussevitzky gave profound tragic import. It seemed to one hearer at least that a performance that cut more deeply could hardly occur. A. H. M.

Ourselves and Others

For the Symphony Concerts today and tomorrow, Dr. Koussevitzky's program stands:

Suite for Orchestra....................Corelli
Symphony, No. 4, in A minor.........Sibelius
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"
Rimsky-Korsakov

On the same days the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Ormandy conducting, will be heard in:

Symphony, No. 7, in A major.......Beethoven
Nocturne and Scherzo from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"........Mendelssohn
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"..................Debussy
Suite from the Ballet, "The Fire-Bird," Stravinsky

In Chicago Mr. Stock and his orchestra are setting forth this program, seemingly to anticipate the bi-centenary next spring of the birth of Haydn:

Symphony in A major..................Haydn
Sinfonia Concertante (Op. 84) for Violin, Violoncello, Oboe and Bassoon........Haydn Symphony, No. 2, in E minor.....Rakhmaninov

Incidents and Prospects

Devoted Bostonian Mahlerites ask this department to convey to Dr. Koussevitzky their prayer that in the third performance of the composer's Ninth Symphony, next Monday evening, he will restore the measures with the songful theme that, in the other two, he excised toward the end of the third movement. They believe them essential to Mahler's

---

SIBELIUS' FOURTH BY SYMPHONY

Post Sat Nov 7

Work Given a Revealing Performance by Dr. Koussevitzky

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The high level of achievement reached in the first three Friday matinees of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained in the fourth, which befell yesterday. As noteworthy as the performances of Brahms' and Mahler's symphonies and of Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" was that yesterday of the Fourth of Sibelius.

UNHEARD FOR 14 YEARS

Not since 1917 had Sibelius' repressed, intensely personal music been heard in Symphony Hall, and the intervening years had softened and clarified much that seemed then harsh or obscure. The composer's ventures into bitonality, as in the last movement were A major and E-flat are heard simultaneously, are barely noticeable to a generation inured to Stravinsky and Honegger, while his growing tendency to withdraw into himself, begun in the transitional Third Symphony, is so much more marked in the Sixth and Seventh that by comparison the Fourth seems almost frank and outspoken.

With the concert-going public, as a whole, this Fourth Symphony may never be as popular as the First and Second or even the Fifth, in which Sibelius partially reverts to his earlier manner. But for the true Sibelius enthusiast, sympathetic to its moody, fitful utterances, its marvellously sensitive and individual instrumentation, its flashes of beauty that fade as quickly as they come, its half-choked voicing of an emotion too deep for words—or tones, the Fourth Symphony is music to be treasured in the heart, to be held as a precious possession.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who from a semi-indifference towards it has grown into a deep and penetrating understanding of Sibelius' music, brought the Fourth yesterday to a performance that seemed nothing short of revelation. And if the sombre, almost blackly melancholy ending is scarcely calculated to provoke enthusiasm, at least the audience was far from indifferent.

As foil before and after to Sibelius' reticences and intensities, Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday offered, respectively, the charming Suite by Corelli as arranged by Pinelli, heard here once before, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," always one of the conductor's and orchestra's outstanding triumphs.

48

Grave Music In As Grave Performance

TRANS! — NOV. 7

Sibelius's Fourth Symphony After Many Years, Other Numbers

STRAUSS has long been quoted as saying that the conductor, not the orchestra, is the essential factor in the performance of music. The quality of the leader—he seems also to imply—determines the quality of his forces. What was the occasion of Strauss's remark no one, nowadays, seems to remember. There was, however, reason to recall it at the Symphony Concerts of yesterday afternoon. As a revised program ran, the first number was a Suite of Corelli, transcribed for orchestra from one of that ancient's Sonatas for Three Voices. As guest-conductor, ten months ago, Mr. Fernandez-Arbos of Madrid brought it to Symphony Hall. As one memory recalls it and the response of audience and reviewers, it then made little impression. Nor was the performance, from the guest and the orchestra, at all remarkable. Evidently Dr. Koussevitzky noted the piece; judged it an addition to his scanty seventeenth-century repertory; now took it in hand. A rapt audience listened; a virtuoso-orchestra played at the top of its bent; a conductor who has proved his sympathetic sensibility to these ancients was leader in the deed.

Consequently a transformed and freshly vitalized music. The Saraband with which the Suite begins, diffused a grave and simple beauty touching to every ear. The flow of the stream, the texture of the orchestral tone, were smoothness itself. There were adroit shadings, melting euphonies. Yet the quiet dignity, the measured feeling, the pervading easefulness, remained. Comparatively, Corelli's canvas is narrow, his means slender, his procedures economical. The more unmistakable are his riches of musical mind and spirit. . . . The final Badinérie was played with no less limpid tone, with light-rhythmed tossing of phrase after phrase from group to group, with deft handling that out of an ancient game made present grace. The intervening Giguc was one hundredth proof of the ability of these old masters to transfigure the dance-tunes out of which they made their Suites. The dance itself is often no more comely than a peasant girl in workaday calico. It emerges from their company a court-lady dressed in the silks and ribbons of their fancy. Again light hands upon phrase and rhythm, unspecked, unroughened transparency of tone. The Suite that had seemed a routined music in one performance became an enchanting experience in another. Once more Strauss was right.

Conductor, orchestra and audience then passed to Sibelius's Fourth Symphony. It had not been played "at these concerts" through fourteen years, since the time of Dr. Muck who added it to the repertory, repeating it more than once. Though Sibelius is almost a cult at Symphony Hall, and deservedly, Dr. Koussevitzky, like Mr. Monteux before him, long overlooked it. The first audiences hereabouts—to say nothing of reviewers—recoiled at what in those days passed for Sibelius's appalling "modernisms." Yet in brief interval, as the measure of time goes, they have so worked themselves into the facture of contemporary music, and into the ears of those who hear it, that yesterday nearly every one seemed to take them for granted. That is to say attention was close; silence tense—even between movements there was little talk; the response of understanding and emotion as well as the response of applause.

Let the ultra-conservatives look to their prejudices. "Modernisms" that enriched music, that have proved new means to individual and significant expression, have already passed into the common stock of composer, performer, hearer. The composer utilizes them at need, often enhancingly; the performer takes them in his stride; the listener hears them almost as naturally as he hears strokes that the ultra-conservatives of Vienna counted "hideous" in Beethoven's day. This absorbing process has so been unobtrusive, continuous and permeating that it were hard to believe it accomplished until one undergoes such an enlightening experience as that of yesterday. A Symphony of Sibelius that only fourteen years ago was repellent for "modernisms," is now heard—and with no repetition meanwhile—for its intrinsic quality.

Of that quality it is difficult to write and convey clear impression. Here is music stripped to its bone and sinew, or as someone has better put it, to its very quiddity. At Sibelius's will, the symphonic form sloughs away excrescences; renounces devices that, for him, have no being save as accepted orthodoxies. He strips it bare; but keeps it large and sweeping; unifies it with a coherence and a logic of his own; determines shapes and procedures by what he would express. The themes that germinate the music are so terse that they are better called "motivs." They are less themes in the conventional sense of "musical ideas" to be "worked," than kernels of the thought, the mood, the emotion that Sibelius would publish. He begins the unfolding; of a sudden one gives place to another, usually to return again when this second, and perhaps a third has had brief room and moment. Yet the music sounds nowhere disjointed or scrappy; remains steadfast and continuous expression of an inner will and purpose, inventing and conducting it.

This Symphony of Sibelius is wrought in long thin lines of counterpoint. They are not imbedded in harmonies; so luxuriously upholstered. Rather the harmonies drift beside them, hang tenuously about them; are spindrift given off by the ebb and flow beneath. Of harmonic and instrumental color there is little or none. A few flares, like the thrust of the trumpet through the tonal fabric, and all else is half-tint in middle gray. Now and again it lights; the ear prompts the eye; and we listeners look with Sibelius across the vast spaces of an empty world. As swiftly darkness descends; then silence; the silence of man's solitude. . . .

Sibelius's orchestra is small. Less than three lines in the program-book enumerated it. Often the instruments are used singly, with imaginative sense of their individuality. Recall the pungent oboe, the thin-voiced flute, the cleaving trumpet, the sombring violoncello. There are instrumental procedures that Sibelius is beginning to make his own or that, for the while, serve his purpose—those whirring backgrounds against which a single instrument lifts its voice, into which it is finally caught; those phantom processions of figures, assembled, in motion, only to be dissolved. . . . There are confused tonalities, bare chord against bare chord, rhythms less shapen than hewed.

Sibelius does not use these means, follow these methods, for their own sake. Nor by them, as so much, and highly individualized, technique, prevail upon his audience. They do but serve and assure his ends, which are profound personal and musical expression. No austerer Symphony comes to mind. Musical sound, though it proceed from a platform of players to a hall filled with people, weaves an atmosphere of solitude and of silence. The struggling motivs, the drifting harmonies, the restless figures, evoke an image of man wandering, phantom-like, this still emptiness; enduring an oppression through which he cannot pierce; neither can he thrust it away. In the end he also vanishes, and there is only void.

The tragedy of man forever and a day; the insoluble enigma of our living and our dying. Sibelius has written them in this Fourth Symphony for himself; but written them so potently that they lay deep hold upon us through a brief half hour. Then back to the routines that are our poultices. Yet some of us go by this music haunted. . . . Away with the silly folk who fancy it has something to do with the Finnish landscape. In it Sibelius is solitary, but for us Northerners, universal genius.

The conductor in this music yesterday was Serge Koussevitzky. There are some to say that he is sentimentalist prone to the softer rather than the austerer beauty. Others to say that he is melodramatist, who must cry up and clatter out whatever is before him. He would not be the many-sided conductor that he is, had he not his vein of sentiment for such music as taps it, his dramatizing impulse when the composer gives the word. Yet he now accomplished a performance of this Fourth Symphony of Sibelius that for penetration and transmission, subtlety and clarity, characterization and atmosphere; for austere evocation, for tragic significance, Dr. Muck in his great days did not surpass.

To the power of Sibelius was joined the complementary power of Koussevitzky. Sibelius, composing, would have his Symphony the unified expression of his purpose—substance, form, means and method. Koussevitzky in his turn unified the performance. Not once, in an half hour of transport, came thought of music and proclamation as separate entities. A virtuoso-orchestra was the conductor's and the composer's instrument—one of those virtuoso "American" orchestras at which some Europeans affect to sneer as only highly organized and assiduously perfected machines. Yet man for man it answered to Sibelius and to Koussevitzky. By genius it also was touched.

To conclude, this orchestra and this conductor passed to the sensuous, luscious, luxuriant, "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakov. Surface excels substance; opulence exceeds depth. The glamor of legend, of time and place and adventure out of The Arabian Nights follows upon tragedy. Baghdad stirs again. Sinbad sails the seas. The Kalandar tells a tale that the bassoon would make humorous; the young prince and the young princess in the garden speak the livelong day of love; yet there are pauses of silence. All here is not pang but pleasure. This world is full-peopled, containing neither tragedy nor enigma. Rimsky-Korsakov's music may be shallow, as some learned doctors say. Here and there it may be over-written, as it seemed to some at the end of a long concert. Yet for the most part it accomplishes its purpose, works its illusion, which are the ends of creation in the arts. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were as ornate and fleshly with it as they had been bare and austere with Sibelius's Symphony. For most of us, the common sensual man—and woman—drank it in. H. T. P.

HERALD NOV. 7

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the fourth concert o the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterda afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Lorelli, suite arranged by Pinell from movements in opus 5; Sibelius Symphony No. 4 A minor; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Scheherazade."

The fourth symphony is strangely different in character from those that precede and follow it. Was Sibelius experimenting, endeavoring to strike out a new path? Was he dissatisfied with the result? When it was performed in New York 18 years ago, Mr. Henderson, the most sympathetic of those reviewing the symphony thought that Sibelius had "parted company with himself and joined the futurists." One of the critics went so far as to describe the work as "inconsequential as the ravings of a drunken man." This was an absurd opinion, for, whatever may be said of the symphony, it is not "inconsequential"; it was planned deliberately; one might say, from the lack of emotional quality, planned in cold blood.

Of course Mrs. Newmarch and others who have written much about Sibelius, see him, working in a "hoary forest," or by a rushing rapid, with wild winds tossing his hair. Would not Sibelius have written the symphony in the same manner if he had been on a Scottish moor or in the Black Forest? Did he not write what was clamoring within him to be out, irrespective of land, sea, climate? There are some who find "Finland" stamped on every page of his "absolute" music; they attribute the sternness, the melancholy to the "bleak" landscape, sea-gulls screaming over the gray wastes; but travellers in Finland have assured us that they have seen there delightful, smiling landscapes. Is it not reasonable to suppose that this symphony is the expression chiefly of the mood in which Sibelius happened to be at the time? And that mood, one of artistic curiosity—the effort was to leave the orthodox highway—to work only on music without associations; the expression of his own mood at the time of writing.

Perhaps there was an argument in his mind. Perhaps he had been hearing "Parsifal," for there are times in the symphony when one is reminded of Amfortas with his complaining voice. Not that Sibelius was obliged to borrow phrases; but the mood of the composer and that of the wounded knigh are at times alike. There is also the suggestion of similar harmonic and orchestral, but not melodic expression.

The thematic material is for the mos part cool, contemplative, often fragmentary, or purposely incomplete. Th melancholy that drips from the page is almost without relief. Nor does on find the symphony of "baffling simplicity," as a London reviewer found ten years ago. The "simplicity" wa carefully contrived. There is little rea beauty, frank or subtle—there is litt that impresses by loftiness of though or nobility of expression. There is prevailing sobriety. Sibelius might say "That is the way I felt when I wrote i I could not write otherwise any mor than I could then feel differently." it not a significant fact that Sibeliu soon left this path that he had foun

The performance brought out th peculiar characteristics of the musi Dr Koussevitzky did not attempt divert or improve on what seems to l the composer's intentions. Such is th force of Dr. Koussevitzky's own mus cal nature that he could not help gi ing to some pages a vitality that w lacking, no doubt deliberately, b mistakenly lacking in the compose thoughts.

Happy the man that hears "Scherazade" for the first time! He is once ravished by the orientalism; what Jean Marnold called the benzo of Arabia and the pastilles of t harem; by the brilliant instrument tion, the constant picturesqueness.

With repeated hearings one begins be a little weary of the repetition similar effects, although there a graceful melodies, ingenious transfo mations, fancy in plenty. The pe formance yesterday was a gorgeous o And what now stands out in bold r lief? The sea music in the first movement; the bassoon tune at the beginning of the "Kalandar prince's story," though that solo might yesterday have been freer, more ad libitum in the telling; the second theme in the "Young prince and the young princess," where solo and accompaniment are entrancing.

Yet some might have found more beauty that was pure; gaiety that was more ingenuous in Corelli's concerto, performed to the evident pleasure of the audience. For it the conductor and the orchestra are masterly interpreters of the moderns. Dr. Koussevitzky has a body of strings that can fully set forth the glory of the ancients. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise: Respighi's orchestral arrangement of Five Picture Studies for piano by Rachmaninoff; Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome"; Brahms's violin concerto (Adolf Busch, violinist); Pick-Mangiagalli's "Carnival Scene" from "Casanova in Venice."

MUSIC

GLOBE SAT NOV 7

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky has postponed the first performance of Respighi's new arrangement for orchestra of piano pieces by Rachmaninoff until next week's Symphony concert. He substituted at the beginning of yesterday's program the suite of arrangements from Corelli which Mr Arbos introduced here last year as guest conductor. Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, unheard since the days of Dr Muck, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade" were the other numbers, as originally planned.

Sibelius's A minor Symphony made a profound impression when heard here in 1914 and 1917. Ever since, one has hoped it would be played again. It had seemed as genuinely original a work as has ever been written. Yesterday it still seemed original and distinctive music, stirring the imagination, touching the heart, despite its monotonous insistence on a single mood through the first three movements. No orchestral work is more unified imaginatively than this brooding, melancholy plaint of an isolated soul in an alien world. It sounds like an improvisation overheard, as though to an unsuspected listener a great musician were pouring out his inmost heart.

What once seemed the audacities of the harmony and instrumentation no longer startle, but the music is free from all hint of the commonplace, of the banal. After hearing all of Sibelius' symphonies, save his latest, the eighth, one feels that this Fourth, in A minor, is the finest and the most characteristic of the man. Dr Koussevitzky gave an imaginative and symphatic reading of this unfamiliar masterpiece.

It is hard to believe that the same Sibelius who wrote "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste" write this A minor symphony. But one mustn't judge composers, even the greatest, by those of their works which get into the permanent repertory of the Pops.

Corelli's suite, which is perhaps almost as much the work of the arranger for orchestra, Pinelli, as of the great 17th century violinist, begins with a beautiful sarabande, and includes an ingratiating gigue and badinerie. To Dr Koussevitzky it offered an opportunity to display the luscious tone, the deft technique of the orchestra. His interpretation stressed pretty but obvious "effects," rather at the expense of the music.

"Scheherezade" has in the past 20 years passed from the status of a modern and rather startling piece to that of a highly popular classic. Its orientalism, never genuine, now seems too conscious an artifice. Its endless repetitions of luscious melodies and vigorous rhythms pall a bit on the listener. Only the remarkably brilliant scoring for orchestra now commands unreserved admiration.

To the generation now nearing middle age this suite of Rimsky Korsakov once seemed what the "Petruchka" of his pupil Stravinsky probably now seems to those in their 'teens and 30s, one of the most brilliant and daring of modern compositions. One is willing to venture that the brilliance of Stravinsky will take longer to wear thin than has that of his teacher. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a remarkably eloquent performance of "Scheherezade," which was justly applauded.

Next week's program includes Respighi's arrangement of five of Rachmaninoff's "Etudes Tableaux," Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome;" the Brahms violin concerto, and Pick-Mangiagalli's "Casanova in Venice." The soloist will be the distinguished German violinist Adolf Busch, teacher of Yehudi Menuhin, who will play for the first time in the United States.

P. R.

Strauss: Quietest of Conductors

uick Glance at Him and His "Domestica" as London Lately Heard Them

THE conducting of Richard Strauss in London has made one or two of us think hard about the modern uses of interpretation. After Strauss d finished his reading of Mozart's E t Symphony, a critic of music said to e "He's like a human—and not very uman—metronome; he simply sets the mpo." "Simply" was very good—as hough it were the easiest thing in the orld to find the exact tempo of a composition! Most of us know very well that here is only one English conductor at resent alive who can instinctively set a ork going at the right movement onwards, from the very first pulse. All the thers most times have to "change gear" t some place or other before a performance is halfway through. preliminary hythmical miscalculations have to be corrected, and, as a consequence, there s a hiatus somewhere Strauss certainly does little else, when e conducts, but keep the tempo going. He does not pretend that he is actually playing all the instruments himself; he does not insult the intelligence of his players by suggesting to them that without his guidance they would lose themselves or would not come in with their parts at the right place, or, generally, would prove themselves a lot of musically ignorant infants. He beats out the pulses with his right arm, and with his left he turns over the pages of a score which he obviously doesn't have to read very closely.

From the spectator's point of view Strauss is a dull conductor. It is very easy to insinuate, so to say, something of his apparent unconcern into one's æsthetic reception of the actual music. The eye sees a cool, white-haired, and very formal German gentleman stiffly and simply attending to the job of the evening. No wonder that many folk, critics included, are unable to listen to a work under Strauss without allowing what they hear to be influenced by the "ordinariness" of what they see. The truth is that under Strauss the orchestra played with a beauty of style, a purity of instrumental texture, beyond anything they have achieved on any other occasion this year.

How interesting it is that Strauss, the most downright of writers of program music, should, as a conductor, avoid all attempts to read into music any extra-musical significance whatever. But has Strauss ever really composed—that is, composed worthily—a bar of music that did not wholly occupy the musician in him and needed no literary or poetic clue or justification at all? His worst works are his most illustrative ones: "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote" would be none the worse if the battle section of the one and the bleating sheep and windmills of the other had been left out. Strauss's masterpiece, "Der Rosenkavalier," is his most lyrical work. Was not his genius switched off its true rails when it fell under the post-Lisztian lure toward the symphonic poem?

Strauss's earliest works—the Violin Sonata particularly—tell of a self-sufficient musical nature. His finest songs were born in moments of lyrism. And the abiding qualities of his best symphonic poems are not tone painting, but tone weaving governed by strict musical needs. "Don Juan" is Strauss's best symphonic poem, and "Till Eulenspiegel" the next best, because we can enjoy them both qua music long after we have outgrown their literary associations. But lacking the support of a program, parts of the scores of "Heldenleben," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "Don Quixote," can scarcely live independent life for a moment.

The performance of the "Domestic" Symphony, under Strauss, confirmed for me this unfamiliar notion of the composer as first and foremost a musician, and only secondarily a programmist. The born psychologist or dramatist of music—such as a Wagner or Verdi—must command far more than Strauss's power to create vivid themes which at once tell their tales and have their peculiar physiognomies. In all Strauss there are not more than half a dozen really graphic themes. And they can be boiled down to (1) the "Don Juan" upward urge; (2) the "Heldenleben" or "Don Quixote" apotheosis, and (3) the Viennese waltz lilt and flavor. (Strauss actually let Zarathustra dance to the "whipped cream" measure!) The "Domestic" Symphony shows Strauss at his worst as a creator of convincing representative themes. But it shows him at his greatest as a weaver of a gorgeous texture which compels a pleasure genuinely and wholly musical. The family album portraiture of the work—the doting parents and their Glaxo baby—is of no consequence; the autobiographical interest was obviously a private conceit of Strauss, a huge Teutonic apostrophe of the beauties of blameless domesticity. The nursery themes are either banal or naive, expressive of childishness, not childhood, while the father and mother look on all the infant's unparalleled excellencies and drop waterfalls of bathos, generally reminding us of Mrs. Kenwigs and her "Too beautiful—too beautiful!"

The astonishing thing is that the "Domestic" Symphony compels us to listen despite all these crashing puerilities—simply because out of the most unpromising material Strauss has woven a superb tissue which it is glorious for a great orchestra to seize upon and unfold for us. At times the work becomes the very gold of orchestration. And there is no superfluous touch anywhere, not a hint of a reckless splashing about of the orchestral color-box.

Under Strauss's conducting the score was, in the most satisfying sense of the term, symphonic. We quickly had to forget the quality of the stuff which was being spun for us on the Straussian loom; we could only marvel at the witchery of the spinner. The "Domestic" Symphony is not program music. At any rate, it is worthless in so far as it is imitative. Where it possesses value is in its true symphonic processes, its wonderful facture. It does not make noises like the Strauss household or like any habitation of childhood. It makes a noise like music—and like nothing else. Here, indeed, Strauss is almost triumphant as an imitative writer. So very like music does the "Domestic" Symphony sound that, despite the meretricious thematic material of it, you might easily be persuaded into believing that the whole work really and truly is music.

Continued on Page Eight

Strauss

Continued from Page Six

There is a story that Strauss once picked up a fork and let it fall back to the dinner table gently. "Until I can make a noise in music that exactly expresses a fork being laid on a table—just like that—until then I shall consider myself a failure as a composer!" But how much cleverer to make a noise like a symphony! . . . !

N. C.

[Reprinted from the Manchester Guardian]

---

nov. 1

Boston Symphony

Monitor Nov. 7

Pursuing his exploratory policy, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky revived for the fourth program of the Boston Symphony season the Fourth Symphony, in A minor, of Jan Sibelius. Seldom has he rendered a more unselfish service to art. For this symphony, although definitely of the composer's mature period, offers even less reward to a conductor than the Third, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to Boston three years ago after predecessors had passed it by. And indeed, so far at least as the first of this pair of concerts (Nov. 6) was concerned, he had to rest content with the applause of his artistic conscience; for the audience, attentive but baffled, was no more than polite in its response

Nor does the audien necessarily deserve to be reproved for that. Patrons of symphony concerts quite naturally expect a major piece to come to a rousing conclusion. A symphony in four movements, each ending in a pianissimo, is disconcerting. We hope that Dr. Koussevitzky, having had the courage to resuscitate this symphony, which had been dormant in Boston for 14 years, will have the perseverance to repeat it. It is extremely probable that its virtues will impress themselves more readily upon the audience at a second hearing. No one today can be disturbed by the dissonances which distressed those who listened to this symphony in the 'teens of this century. It is rather its starkness, its terseness, its compactness, to which the hearer of today must become accustomed. Those who accepted the Sibelius Third surely will not in the end reject this Fourth, which is after all thoroughly characteristic and vital in its restrained expressiveness.

The concert was opened with a Corelli Suite first heard in Boston from Mr. Arbós. And Dr. Koussevitzky no doubt was consoled for the popular coolness to the symphony by the warmth which his publication of Rimsky-Korsakoff's sure-fire "Schéhérazade" Suite kindled in the listeners.

L. A. S.

Nov 11 CONCERT NOTES Her

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts this week will be as follows: Rachmaninoff-Respighi, Five Picture Studies (first performance), Florent Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome." Brahms, violin concerto (Adolf Busch, violinist—his first appearance in Boston). Pick-Mangiagalli, Scene Carnavalesque (first time in the United States).

Rachmaninoff wrote two sets of "Picture Studies"; each set containing nine studies, He gave them no titles. Respighi, or the publisher, was more fanciful. The five chosen for orchestration are now called: The Sea and Gulls, The Fair, Funeral March, Red Riding Hood and the Wolf, March. Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" was inspired by Robert d'Humieres's poem, not by Wilde's tragedy. The ballet—a "mute drama"—from which this suite is derived, was produced at Paris in 1907 when Loie Fuller took the part of Salome, and Lou Van Tel (Lou Tellegen as the actor is known in this country), John the Baptist. Loie Fuller danced the dance of pearls, of the peacock, of serpents of steel, silver and the dance of fear. The orchestra was enlarged for the rewritten score when the suite was first performed at a Colonne concert, Paris, in 1911. There have been theatre performances — Mmes. Trouhanowa, Karsavina, Rubinstein in turn taking the part of Salome. The ballet is now in the repertory of the Paris Opera. When Dr. Muck brought out the suite in November, 1913, the Boston Symphony orchestra was assisted by members of the Musical Art Club for the voice parts.

Mr. Busch, who will play the concerto by Brahms, was born at Siegen, Westphalia, in 1891. He has a high reputation in Europe as a violinist; also as a composer and teacher.

The "Carnaval Scene" by Pick-Mangiagalli, is from that composer's "Casanova in Venice." Casanova, that entertaining gambler, swindler, formidable amorist, spy, literary man, had so many adventures in Venice that there is much material for librettist and dramatist.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of the first concert in New York, Nov. 19, will comprise Mahler's Symphony No. 9, two Nocturnes by Debussy, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2. Saturday's program, Nov. 21: Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12. Morris's Piano Concerto (Mr. Morris, pianist), and Strauss's "Heldenleben."

FIRST MONDAY OF SYMPHON

Mahler's Ninth Prove Own Greatness

Post Nov 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the opening concert of the Mo day evening Symphony series, whic took place last evening, Dr. Koussevi zky repeated the programme of the se ond pair of regular Symphony concert Mahler's Ninth Symphony, then new t Boston, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," an that composer's Overture to "Tann hauser."

A third hearing of Mahler's Symphon confirmed, if such confirmation wer necessary, the original impression of it greatness and its beauty. Were ther not "The Song of the Earth" and othe works to do such service, this monu mental Ninth Symphony alone woul suffice to give the lie to the oft-repeate allegation that Mahler's vaulting ambi tion as symphonist out-ran his creativ powers and also to the other equall baseless legend that he was an un original composer. The blend of sweet ness and melancholy that informs s much of the first movement of thi Symphony, as it does page after page of the "Song of the Earth" and the "Kindertotenlieder," is Mahler's alone, and not only the mood but its musical expression. If the voices of Beethoven and of Schubert are heard in the second movement it is through the voice of Mahler, which subtly changes them into something which is his own. The ironic Burleske that is the third movement is in a vein peculiar to Mahler. Perhaps Anton Bruckner, but surely no other, could have conceived and executed the final Adagio. Yet the sad loveliness which pervades it is again of Mahler and of no other.

This Symphony which, even with Dr. Koussevitzky's cut, takes over an hour in performance, may have proved a bit of a dose for some in last evening's audience. The applause which greeted it was neither so spontaneous nor so fervent as that accorded it by two previous audiences. Nevertheless, it sufficed to return Dr. Koussevitzky twice to the stage, and to cause him to summon the valiant orchestra to its feet. For a third time, with the conductor to guide and inspire, these players had brought the Symphony to notable performance, and the recognition accorded them was well deserved.

BER 7, 1931 GLOBE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky has postponed the first performance of Respighi's new arrangement for orchestra of piano pieces by Rachmaninoff until next week's Symphony concert. He substituted at the beginning of yesterday's program the suite of arrangements from Corelli which Mr Arbos introduced here last year as guest conductor. Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, unheard since the days of Dr Muck, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade" were the other numbers, as originally planned.

Sibelius's A minor Symphony made a profound impression when heard here in 1914 and 1917. Ever since, one has hoped it would be played again. It had seemed as genuinely original a work as has ever been written. Yesterday it still seemed original and distinctive music, stirring the imagination, touching the heart, despite its monotonous insistence on a single mood through the first three movements. No orchestral work is more unified imaginatively than this brooding, melancholy plaint of an isolated soul in an alien world. It sounds like an improvisation overheard, as though to an unsuspected listener a great musician were pouring out his inmost heart.

What once seemed the audacities of the harmony and instrumentation no longer startle, but the music is free from all hint of the commonplace, of the banal. After hearing all of Sibelius' symphonies, save his latest, the eighth, one feels that this Fourth, in A minor, is the finest and the most characteristic of the man. Dr Koussevitzky gave an imaginative and sympathetic reading of this unfamiliar masterpiece.

It is hard to believe that the same Sibelius who wrote "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste" write this A minor symphony. But one mustn't judge composers, even the greatest, by those of their works which get into the permanent repertory of the Pops.

Corelli's suite, which is perhaps almost as much the work of the arranger for orchestra, Pinelli, as of the great 17th century violinist, begins with a beautiful sarabande, and includes an ingratiating gigue and badinerie. To Dr Koussevitzky it offered an opportunity to display the luscious tone, the deft technique of the orchestra. His interpretation stressed pretty but obvious "effects," rather at the expense of the music.

"Scheherezade" has in the past 20 years passed from the status of a modern and rather startling piece to that of a highly popular classic. Its orientalism, never genuine, now seems too conscious an artifice. Its endless repetitions of luscious melodies and vigorous rhythms pall a bit on the listener. Only the remarkably brilliant scoring for orchestra now commands unreserved admiration.

To the generation now nearing middle age this suite of Rimsky Korsakov once seemed what the "Petruchka" of his pupil Stravinsky probably now seems to those in their 'teens and 30s, one of the most brilliant and daring of modern compositions. One is willing to venture that the brilliance of Stravinsky will take longer to wear thin than has that of his teacher. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a remarkably eloquent performance of "Scheherezade," which was justly applauded.

Next week's program includes Respighi's arrangement of five of Rachmaninoff's "Etudes Tableaux," Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome;" the Brahms violin concerto, and Pick-Mangiagalli's "Casanova in Venice." The soloist will be the distinguished German violinist Adolf Busch, teacher of Yehudi Menuhin, who will play for the first time in the United States.

P. R.

49

Herald Nov 10

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave last night the first of this season's series of Monday evening concerts. An interested audience filled Symphony hall to hear Mahler's ninth symphony—to which in a recent Friday and Saturday program Dr. Koussevitzky had given its first American performance. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and his overture to "Tannhaeuser" rounded out the program.

One may suspect that the applause which followed the performance of the symphony was a reward for the valiant efforts of the orchestra, and its conductor rather more than an indication of pleasure derived from the work performed. For this is not as a whole ingratiating music, despite the moments of high beauty that shine here and here amid its tortured and forbidding progress. Its curiously fragmentary thematic material, the sense of dry, morose, and painfully laborious absorption that underlies the manner in which it is developed, the harsh counterpoints, pungent, acidulous orchestration, arouse fascinated interest but hardly unmitigated delight. A strange frustrated talent emerges from this score; it was not genius, yet it was too intense and prodigious in its travail to be dismissed as mediocrity. Its fragments of demoniac irony, of clumsy, bucolic jollity, of high and serene beauty, its powerful and individual orchestration, could not fail, however, to impress those who heard the symphony. The performance was of very high quality.

The "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner's charming tribute to his wife and his pathetic testament of faith in his infant son's high destiny, flowed gently and soothingly, shedding gratefully—if a little repetitiously—its mood of tender reminiscence and hope. The "Tannhaeuser" overture, most effectively performed, brought the concert to its end amid enthusiastic applause for both orchestra and conductor.

S. S.

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Globe Nov 10

Dr Koussevitzky selected, for the first concert of the Monday evening series the program which he played on Oct 16 and 17 — Mahler's Ninth Symphony, which at that time was performed for the first time in America; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

A second hearing of the symphony within so brief a space of time was especially gratifying, for the work had made a deep impression. Last evening, as before, one pondered the question of why 20 years had elapsed between its first performance in Vienna and its first sounding in this country.

It is difficult to find any trace of bombast in this symphony. Massive and ponderous it is, to be sure, and extremely long in the telling, but a spirit of intense, almost frenzied, feeling permeates it. Without benefit of "program" or program notes, it has twice impressed one listener as being enveloped in an atmosphere of fear and thought of death. Only the second movement is free from it. In the rondo this thought becomes ironic and mocks the ultimate end. If, at the end, serenity prevails, the poignancy of the beginning of the adagio should not be overlooked.

Mahler's skill in developing rather slight thematic material and in scoring is highly apparent in this Ninth Symphony. And in the second movement the musical edifice he rears on a foundation of a thumping, simple-as-simple-can-be, rustic dance tune is amazing. Singularly, his instrumentation invariably is well balanced and clear.

There is scarcely a measure not replete with emotional intensity. Even the conclusion of the adagio, with its barely whispering strings, one senses it. Yet banality or hysteria are never suggested. It is to be hoped that this symphony will appear often in the Symphony repertory. Dr Koussevitzky has brought much unfamiliar music to Boston; this is of the most importance.

The "Siegfried Idyl" was played beautifully—revealing fully the richness of the Boston Symphony's string section. Can there be anywhere a group of strings to surpass these? It seems unlikely.

As he did a few weeks ago, Dr Koussevitzky made the "Tannhauser" overture thrilling, eloquent and compelling beyond words. It may be open to question whether the demoniacal blaring of brass at the conclusion is in the spirit which Wagner intended. Whether or not, it was almost frightening.

The second concert of this series will be given Dec 14.

Strauss: Quietest of Conductors

Quick Glance at Him and His "Domestica" as London Lately Heard Them

THE conducting of Richard Strauss in London has made one or two of us think hard about the modern abuses of interpretation. After Strauss had finished his reading of Mozart's E flat Symphony, a critic of music said to me "He's like a human—and not very human—metronome; he simply sets the tempo." "Simply" was very good—as though it were the easiest thing in the world to find the exact tempo of a composition! Most of us know very well that there is only one English conductor at present alive who can instinctively set a work going at the right movement onwards, from the very first pulse. All the others most times have to "change gear" at some place or other before a performance is halfway through, preliminary rhythmical miscalculations have to be corrected, and, as a consequence, there is a hiatus somewhere Strauss certainly does little else, when he conducts, but keep the tempo going. He does not pretend that he is actually playing all the instruments himself; he does not insult the intelligence of his players by suggesting to them that without his guidance they would lose themselves or would not come in with their parts at the right place, or, generally, would prove themselves a lot of musically ignorant infants. He beats out the pulses with his right arm, and with his left he turns over the pages of a score which he obviously doesn't have to read very closely.

From the spectator's point of view Strauss is a dull conductor. It is very easy to insinuate, so to say, something of his apparent unconcern into one's esthetic reception of the actual music. The eye sees a cool, white-haired, and very formal German gentleman stiffly and simply attending to the job of the evening. No wonder that many folk, critics included, are unable to listen to a work under Strauss without allowing what they hear to be influenced by the "ordinariness" of what they see. The truth is that under Strauss the orchestra played with a beauty of style, a purity of instrumental texture, beyond anything they have achieved on any other occasion this year.

How interesting it is that Strauss, the most downright of writers of program music, should, as a conductor, avoid all attempts to read into music any extra-musical significance whatever. But has Strauss ever really composed—that is, composed worthily—a bar of music that did not wholly occupy the musician in him and needed no literary or poetic clue or justification at all? His worst works are his most illustrative ones: "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote" would be none the worse if the battle section of the one and the bleating sheep and windmills of the other had been left out. Strauss's masterpiece, "Der Rosenkavalier," is his most lyrical work. Was not his genius switched off its true rails when it fell under the post-Lisztian lure toward the symphonic poem?

Strauss's earliest works—the Violin Sonata particularly—tell of a self-sufficient musical nature. His finest songs were born in moments of lyrism. And the abiding qualities of his best symphonic poems are not tone painting, but tone weaving governed by strict musical needs. "Don Juan" is Strauss's best symphonic poem, and "Till Eulenspiegel" the next best, because we can enjoy them both qua music long after we have outgrown their literary associations. But lacking the support of a program, parts of the scores of "Heldenleben," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "Don Quixote," can scarcely live independent life for a moment.

The performance of the "Domestic" Symphony, under Strauss, confirmed for me this unfamiliar notion of the composer as first and foremost a musician, and only secondarily a programmist. The born psychologist or dramatist of music—such as a Wagner or Verdi—must command far more than Strauss's power to create vivid themes which at once tell their tales and have their peculiar physiognomies. In all Strauss there are not more than half a dozen really graphic themes. And they can be boiled down to (1) the "Don Juan" upward urge; (2) the "Heldenleben" or "Don Quixote" apotheosis, and (3) the Viennese waltz lilt and flavor. (Strauss actually let Zarathustra dance to the "whipped cream" measure!) The "Domestic" Symphony shows Strauss at his worst as a creator of convincing representative themes. But it shows him at his greatest as a weaver of a gorgeous texture which compels a pleasure genuinely and wholly musical. The family album portraiture of the work—the doting parents and their Glaxo baby—is of no consequence; the autobiographical interest was obviously a private conceit of Strauss, a huge Teutonic apostrophe of the beauties of blameless domesticity. The nursery themes are either banal or naive, expressive of childishness, not childhood, while the father and mother look on all the infant's unparalleled excellencies and drop waterfalls of bathos, generally reminding us of Mrs. Kenwigs and her "Too beautiful—too beautiful!"

The astonishing thing is that the "Domestic" Symphony compels us to listen despite all these crashing puerilities—simply because out of the most unpromising material Strauss has woven a superb tissue which it is glorious for a great orchestra to seize upon and unfold for us. At times the work becomes the very gold of orchestration. And there is no superfluous touch anywhere, not a hint of a reckless splashing about of the orchestral color-box.

Under Strauss's conducting the score was, in the most satisfying sense of the term, symphonic. We quickly had to forget the quality of the stuff which was being spun for us on the Straussian loom; we could only marvel at the witchery of the spinner. The "Domestic" Symphony is not program music. At any rate, it is worthless in so far as it is imitative. Where it possesses value is in its true symphonic processes, its wonderful facture. It does not make noises like the Strauss household or like any habitation of childhood. It makes a noise like music—and like nothing else. Here, indeed, Strauss is almost triumphant as an imitative writer. So very like music does the "Domestic" Symphony sound that, despite the meretricious thematic material of it, you might easily be persuaded into believing that the whole work really and truly is music.

Continued on Page Eight

Strauss

Continued from Page Six

There is a story that Strauss once picked up a fork and let it fall back to the dinner table gently. "Until I can make a noise in music that exactly expresses a fork being laid on a table—just like that—until then I shall consider myself a failure as a composer!" But how much cleverer to make a noise like a symphony! . . . !

N. C.

[Reprinted from the Manchester Guardian]

Nov. [illegible]

Boston Symphony

Monitor Nov. 7

Pursuing his exploratory policy, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky revived for the fourth program of the Boston Symphony season the Fourth Symphony, in A minor, of Jan Sibelius. Seldom has he rendered a more unselfish service to art. For this symphony, although definitely of the composer's mature period, offers even less reward to a conductor than the Third, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to Boston three years ago after predecessors had passed it by. And indeed, so far at least as the first of this pair of concerts (Nov. 6) was concerned, he had to rest content with the applause of his artistic conscience; for the audience, attentive but baffled, was no more than polite in its response

Nor does the audien necessarily deserve to be reproved for that. Patrons of symphony concerts quite naturally expect a major piece to come to a rousing conclusion. A symphony in four movements, each ending in a pianissimo, is disconcerting. We hope that Dr. Koussevitzky, having had the courage to resuscitate this symphony, which had been dormant in Boston for 14 years, will have the perseverance to repeat it. It is extremely probable that its virtues will impress themselves more readily upon the audience at a second hearing. No one today can be disturbed by the dissonances which distressed those who listened to this symphony in the 'teens of this century. It is rather its starkness, its terseness, its compactness, to which the hearer of today must become accustomed. Those who accepted the Sibelius Third surely will not in the end reject this Fourth, which, is after all thoroughly characteristic and vital in its restrained expressiveness.

The concert was opened with a Corelli Suite first heard in Boston from Mr. Arbós. And Dr. Koussevitzky no doubt was consoled for the popular coolness to the symphony by the warmth which his publication of Rimsky-Korsakoff's sure-fire "Schéhérazade" Suite kindled in the listeners.

L. A. S.

Nov 11 CONCERT NOTES Her

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts this week will be as follows: Rachmaninoff-Respighi, Five Picture Studies (first performance). Florent Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome." Brahms, violin concerto (Adolf Busch, violinist—his first appearance in Boston). Pick-Mangiagalli, Scene Carnavalesque (first time in the United States).

Rachmaninoff wrote two sets of "Picture Studies"; each set containing nine studies. He gave them no titles. Respighi, or the publisher, was more fanciful. The five chosen for orchestration are now called: The Sea and Gulls, The Fair, Funeral March, Red Riding Hood and the Wolf, March. Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" was inspired by Robert d'Humieres's poem, not by Wilde's tragedy. The ballet—a "mute drama"—from which this suite is derived, was produced at Paris in 1907 when Loie Fuller took the part of Salome, and Lou Van Tel (Lou Tellegen as the actor is known in this country), John the Baptist. Loie Fuller danced the dance of pearls, of the peacock, of serpents of steel, silver and the dance of fear. The orchestra was enlarged for the rewritten score when the suite was first performed at a Colonne concert, Paris, in 1911. There have been theatre performances — Mmes. Trouhanowa, Karsavina, Rubinstein in turn taking the part of Salome. The ballet is now in the repertory of the Paris Opera. When Dr. Muck brought out the suite in November, 1913, the Boston Symphony orchestra was assisted by members of the Musical Art Club for the voice parts.

Mr. Busch, who will play the concerto by Brahms, was born at Siegen, Westphalia, in 1891. He has a high reputation in Europe as a violinist; also as a composer and teacher.

The "Carnaval Scene" by Pick-Mangiagalli, is from that composer's "Casanova in Venice." Casanova, that entertaining gambler, swindler, formidable amorist, spy, literary man, had so many adventures in Venice that there is much material for librettist and dramatist.

The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of the first concert in New York, Nov. 19, will comprise Mahler's Symphony No. 9, two Nocturnes by Debussy, Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2. Saturday's program, Nov. 21: Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 12. Morris's Piano Concerto (Mr. Morris, pianist), and Strauss's "Heldenleben."

FIRST MONDAY OF SYMPHONY

Mahler's Ninth Proves Own Greatness

Post — Nov 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For the opening concert of the Monday evening Symphony series, which took place last evening, Dr. Koussevitzky repeated the programme of the second pair of regular Symphony concerts: Mahler's Ninth Symphony, then new to Boston, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and that composer's Overture to "Tannhauser."

A third hearing of Mahler's Symphony confirmed, if such confirmation were necessary, the original impression of its greatness and its beauty. Were there not "The Song of the Earth" and other works to do such service, this monumental Ninth Symphony alone would suffice to give the lie to the oft-repeated allegation that Mahler's vaulting ambition as symphonist out-ran his creative powers and also to the other equally baseless legend that he was an unoriginal composer. The blend of sweetness and melancholy that informs so much of the first movement of this Symphony, as it does page after page of the "Song of the Earth" and the "Kindertotenlieder," is Mahler's alone, and not only the mood but its musical expression. If the voices of Beethoven and of Schubert are heard in the second movement it is through the voice of Mahler, which subtly changes them into something which is his own. The ironic Burleske that is the third movement is in a vein peculiar to Mahler. Perhaps Anton Bruckner, but surely no other, could have conceived and executed the final Adagio. Yet the sad loveliness which pervades it is again of Mahler and of no other.

This Symphony which, even with Dr. Koussevitzky's cut, takes over an hour in performance, may have proved a bit of a dose for some in last evening's audience. The applause which greeted it was neither so spontaneous nor so fervent as that accorded it by two previous audiences. Nevertheless, it sufficed to return Dr. Koussevitzky twice to the stage, and to cause him to summon the valiant orchestra to its feet. For a third time, with the conductor to guide and inspire, these players had brought the Symphony to notable performance, and the recognition accorded them was well deserved.

BER 7, 1931 GLOBE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky has postponed the first performance of Respighi's new arrangement for orchestra of piano pieces by Rachmaninoff until next week's Symphony concert. He substituted at the beginning of yesterday's program the suite of arrangements from Corelli which Mr Arbos introduced here last year as guest conductor. Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, unheard since the days of Dr Muck, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherezade" were the other numbers, as originally planned.

Sibelius's A minor Symphony made a profound impression when heard here in 1914 and 1917. Ever since, one has hoped it would be played again. It had seemed as genuinely original a work as has ever been written. Yesterday it still seemed original and distinctive music, stirring the imagination, touching the heart, despite its monotonous insistence on a single mood through the first three movements. No orchestral work is more unified imaginatively than this brooding, melancholy plaint of an isolated soul in an alien world. It sounds like an improvisation overheard, as though to an unsuspected listener a great musician were pouring out his inmost heart.

What once seemed the audacities of the harmony and instrumentation no longer startle, but the music is free from all hint of the commonplace, of the banal. After hearing all of Sibelius' symphonies, save his latest, the eighth, feels that this Fourth, in A minor, e finest and the most characterof the man. Dr Koussevitzky an imaginative and symphatic ing of this unfamiliar masterpiece. is hard to believe that the same ius who wrote "Finlandia" and e Triste" write this A minor hony. But one mustn't judge coms, even the greatest, by those of works which get into the permaepertory of the Pops.

lli's suite, which is perhaps als much the work of the arranger chestra, Pinelli, as of the great entury violinist, begins with a ful sarabande, and includes an ating gigue and badinerie. To ussevitzky it offered an opportu- display the luscious tone, the chnique of the orchestra. His etation stressed pretty but obviffects," rather at the expense music.

eherezade" has in the past 20 passed from the status of a and rather startling piece to a highly popular classic. Its lism, never genuine, now seems scious an artifice. Its endless ons of luscious melodies and s rhythms pall a bit on the r. Only the remarkably brilcoring for orchestra now comunreserved admiration.

the generation now nearing age this suite of Rimsky Koronce seemed what the "Pet" of his pupil Stravinsky probow seems to those in their 'teens s, one of the most brilliant and of modern compositions. One ling to venture that the brilof Stravinsky will take longer ar thin than has that of his r. Dr Koussevitzky and the ora gave a remarkably eloquent mance of "Scheherezade," which ustly applauded.

t week's program includes Rei's arrangement of five of Rachnoff's "Etudes Tableaux," Florent itt's "Tragedy of Salome;" the ms violin concerto, and Pickgiagalli's "Casanova in Venice." soloist will be the distinguished man violinist Adolf Busch, teacher Yehudi Menuhin, who will play for first time in the United States.

P. R.

49

Herald Nov 10

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave last night the first of this season's series of Monday evening concerts. An interested audience filled Symphony hall to hear Mahler's ninth symphony—to which in a recent Friday and Saturday program Dr. Koussevitzky had given its first American performance. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and his overture to "Tannhaeuser" rounded out the program.

One may suspect that the applause which followed the performance of the symphony was a reward for the valiant efforts of the orchestra and its conductor rather more than an indication of pleasure derived from the work performed. For this is not as a whole ingratiating music, despite the moments of high beauty that shine here and here amid its tortured and forbidding progress. Its curiously fragmentary thematic material, the sense of dry, morose, and painfully laborious absorption that underlies the manner in which it is developed, the harsh counterpoints, pungent, acidulous orchestration, arouse fascinated interest but hardly unmitigated delight. A strange frustrated talent emerges from this score; it was not genius, yet it was too intense and prodigious in its travail to be dismissed as mediocrity. Its fragments of demoniac irony, of clumsy, bucolic jollity, of high and serene beauty, its powerful and individual orchestration, could not fail, however, to impress those who heard the symphony. The performance was of very high quality.

The "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner's charming tribute to his wife and his pathetic testament of faith in his infant son's high destiny, flowed gently and soothingly, shedding gratefully—if a little repetitiously—its mood of tender reminiscence and hope. The "Tannhaeuser" overture, most effectively performed, brought the concert to its end amid enthusiastic applause for both orchestra and conductor.

S. S.

SYMPHONY HALL

ston Symphony Orchestra

Globe Nov 10

Koussevitzky selected, for the concert of the Monday evening s the program which he played Oct 16 and 17 — Mahler's Ninth phony, which at that time was formed for the first time in Am- nd Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and overture to "Tannhauser."

second hearing of the symphony hin so brief a space of time was ecially gratifying, for the work had de a deep impression. Last evening, as before, one pondered the question of why 20 years had elapsed between its first performance in Vienna and its first sounding in this country.

It is difficult to find any trace of bombast in this symphony. Massive and ponderous it is, to be sure, and extremely long in the telling, but a spirit of intense, almost frenzied, feeling permeates it. Without benefit of "program" or program notes, it has twice impressed one listener as being enveloped in an atmosphere of fear and thought of death. Only the second movement is free from it. In the rondo this thought becomes ironic and mocks the ultimate end. If, at the end, serenity prevails, the poignancy of the beginning of the adagio should not be overlooked.

Mahler's skill in developing rather slight thematic material and in scoring is highly apparent in this Ninth Symphony. And in the second movement the musical edifice he rears on a foundation of a thumping, simple-as-simple-can-be, rustic dance tune is amazing. Singularly, his instrumentation invariably is well balanced and clear.

There is scarcely a measure not replete with emotional intensity. Even in the conclusion of the adagio, with its barely whispering strings, one senses it. Yet banality or hysteria are never suggested. It is to be hoped that this symphony will appear often in the Symphony repertory. Dr Koussevitzky has brought much unfamiliar music to Boston; this is of the most importance.

The "Siegfried Idyl" was played beautifully—revealing fully the richness of the Boston Symphony's string section. Can there be anywhere a group of strings to surpass these? It seems unlikely.

As he did a few weeks ago, Dr Koussevitzky made the "Tannhauser" overture thrilling, eloquent and compelling beyond words. It may be open to question whether the demoniacal blaring of brass at the conclusion is in the spirit which Wagner intended. Whether or not, it was almost frightening.

The second concert of this series will be given Dec 14.

Monumental Work by Sibelius Revived by Koussevitzky

50

American

By MOSES SMITH

Nov 17

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony in A minor is revived at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky. The symphony is preceded by a suite from the music of Corelli, arranged by Pinelli, and followed by the brilliant "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The Sibelius Symphony has not been played in Boston since 1917, when Karl Muck was conductor. We are told that after eight performances of the work during his regime Dr. Muck confessed himself as much in the dark about the quality and content of the score as when he first set eyes on it. Obviously much water has flowed under the bridge of music since then, for though the work was by no means crystal clear yesterday it was quickly apparent that a genius had written this symphony, a man of great strength and eloquence of a harsh, rude, unsweet kind.

There are acrid dissonances in this score. But we have to thank the modernists for so accustoming our ears to this sort of thing during the past decade that it does not immediately prejudice the critical ear. As in almost all of his later work for orchestra Sibelius is here economical of resource unsparing in tonal logic, uncompromisingly direct. And he is undeniably gloomy, aggressively bitter. Each of the four movements develops a climax, but subsides into nothingness, as if, to quote Olin Downes, the fury of this man, shaking his fist, is helpless.

Hearing the symphony for the first time, we thought the performance by the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky excellent, realizing the intentions of the composer. While part of the audience at the matinee concert applauded the work appreciatively, many were apathetic. The majority of the listeners were more responsive to the trifling, though gay, Corelli suite and the obvious (because hackneyed) orchestral virtuosity of Rimsky.

This is not intended as a sneer at Rimsky-Korsakov, by any means, but as a commentary on the behavior of smug listeners. Without doubt the audiences of 30 odd years ago, when the "Scheherazade" was first played here, were offended by its daring orchestration and probably called the whole thing ugly noise. Now it is in the opposite danger of being over-popular, of having its musicale material worn to shreds. The performance of yesterday, by the way, lacked little or none of the brilliance the work usually receives under Mr. Koussevitzky, but the orchestral attack was occasionally ragged, and the instruments were not always in tune.

THE COLUMBUS CITIZEN

OCT. 22, 1931

SELECT "LA VALSE"

Boston Symphony's Recording Is Record-of-the-Month.

The November record-of-the-month, as selected from its recent recordings by the Victor company, is Ravel's "La Valse" played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Columbus musicians will note with interest that that composition described as a choreographic poem, is listed by Dr. Koussevitzky for his program at Memorial Hall, Oct. 29.

The Boston Orchestra concert is the first in the series sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The orchestras from Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland are to follow in the course of the season.

Seats are available at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

4

The Ohio State Journal
Published Every Morning in the Year by
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL CO

THURSDAY OCTOBER 22, 1931.

A Musical Treat.

LOVERS of music in Columbus and central Ohio have reason to rejoice over the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Oct. 29, when it will open a season of symphonic concerts arranged by the Central Ohio Symphony Club. For years the Boston orchestra has been acclaimed the greatest of its kind. It has been fortunate in having an abundance of wealthy friends, who pour millions into the treasury to maintain and improve it and the greatest living conductors have been employed to direct its programs. It was born under a lucky star and its career has been marked by steady progress in the direction of musical idealism. Its appearance in any city is a musical event of the first importance, and Columbus is fortunate in securing it for the first of the five programs of the season. For the present year its programs have been chosen by its patrons, a referendum request having been distributed last spring. Columbus will hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most popular offerings, and excerpts from the masterful Wagner, always welcomed by music lovers.

THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Sunday, October 25, 1931.

Upholstering Of Memorial Hall Seats Inspected

AN inspection of the upholstering that is to be used in covering seats at Memorial hall, to make them more comfortable, and which are to be ready for use Oct. 29, when the Boston Symphony orchestra appears here, was made last week by Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, 2065 Barton Place; Mrs. Charles P. Outhwaite of Morse road, and Mrs B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 South Columbia avenue, at the American Pad & Textile Co., in Greenfield, Ohio.

Padding for the seats is being secured from the above-mentioned concern in Greenfield, and the Columbus Coated Fabrics Co. has charge of the upholstering, which will require two miles of imitation leather. Mr. E L. McClain, president of the American Pad & Textile Co., made a special price concession to the Columbus persons making arrangements for the work on the chairs.

A tour of inspection of the $6,000,000 school in Greenfield, endowed by Mr McClain, was also made by the Columbus women. The school, one of the show places in the state, has an attendance of 2000 pupils daily.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Long Island City, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

OCT 22 1931

Radio Fulfils Last Wish of Great Inventor; Boston Symphony Unit to Play 'Eroica'

By TURNER DIALLE.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tonight.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 o'clock tonight.

A short time before his death, Edison informed the Etude magazine:

"If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emporer, the outraged composer struck Bonoparte's name from the symphony.

Toscha Seidel, violinst, accompained by the Columbia Concert Orchestra, will include the Prize Song from Wagner's only opera comedy, "Die Meistersinger," in his all Wagnerian concert over WABC from 9 to 9:30 tonight.

This aria is one of Seidel's favorites and he has played it many times on his tours throughout the world and during performances before rulers.

"Great Britain's Choice" will be the topic of the talk by James G. McDonald of the Foreign Policy Association over WEAF at 7:15 tonight.

Edwin C. Hill, "The Man in the Front Row," will deliver the second of his talks in which he uses episodes from his journalistic experence to clarify the significance of events of the day, over WABC from 10 to 10:30 tonight.

Angelo Patri, noted authority on methods of child training, will discuss "Laziness" when he is heard over WABC from 8:45 to 9 o'clock tonight. Neither punishment nor rewards will cure laziness, because laziness is but a symptom of trouble, Patri says. To cure laziness the cause must be found, he adds, and the surest preventative is good health.

"Candle Shadows," a new program will be presented over WLWL every Thursday evening beginning tonight at 7:15.

THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL, COLUMBUS.

OCTOBER 27, 1931

ted han Coy of the a, which l Thurs-ing conmphony

. Serge played und apr, Micl.
s will leaving

Columbus Thursday night will go to Pittsburgh and Ithaca, N. Y., before returning to Boston.

Single admission tickets for the concert will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANSING, MICH.
CAPITAL NEWS

9

OCT 27 1931

Boston Symphony

~~ANN ARBOR~~ (UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, will be featured by the 111-piece orchestra.

The Columbus Citizen

(A SCRIPPS-HOWARD NEWSPAPER)

Owned and published daily (except Sunday) by The Citizen Publishing Co., 31 N. Third Street

Phone ADams 3121.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1931.

Pretty Soft Now

AN item in The Citizen conveys the cheering information that 3000 seats in Memorial Hall are being equipped with comfortable pads and will be ready for the Oct. 29 concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the Central Ohio Symphony Club.

Everyone who has suffered on those seats in their original, unpadded condition will thrill to this news. One variety of hard times, thank goodness, is going—we hope forever.

WHISTON
PRESS CLIPPING SERVICE
ALBANY-BUFFALO NEWYORK

BUFFALO [illegible] EVENING NEWS
Tuesday, October 27, 1931

Symphony Superb

Boston Orchestra Opens Foundation Series Here

By EDWARD DURNEY

The return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a season's absence, made for an auspicious beginning of the Buffalo Musical Foundation's Symphony series, Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall. The superb Boston organization always a welcome guest here, was doubly so on the present occasion, and a huge audience received with open arms the distinguished conductor and his glorious company.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program ranging from Handel to Ravel, and with his accustomed master touch and electrifying spirit he led his players to signal achievement. The Koussevitzky art happily combines subtlety and vitality, grace and rugged energy, brilliance and profundity; and his sensitive instrument ever reflects the guiding hand of genius.

It is a far cry from the stately, formal measures of Handel to the complexities of Tchaikovsky and the freedom of Ravel, yet how justly did Koussevitzky publish the message of each composer! And how memorable are the thrilling climaxes he achieved in the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Ravel suite and the evening's symphony!

The Handel "Concerto Grosso," No 12, for string orchestra, the first item of the evening's fare, benefitted by the clearest possible utterance of strings in musical converse. Every figure was traced in proper relief and the style of the whole was impeccable.

The familiar "Lohengrin" excerpt shone anew at the Koussevitzky touch and perhaps the bit of faulty utterance of violins at the beginning and end may be condoned as mere evidence that after all the Boston Symphony orchestra is made up of human beings.

Nothing was lovlier than the Ravel the Suite No. 2 from the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet. Here is a choice example of the Ravel creature genius—orchestration of light and shade, breathing the fragrance of the wood caressing as a gentle breeze, displaying a color range from the most delicate tints to riotous hues and ever pulsating with life. And in performance the composer was highly favored. It would be difficult to imagine a more glowing, more worthy performance of the work than that afforded by the Boston forces.

The evening's symphony was Tchaikovsky's fourth, distinguished among the Russian's symphonic works though surpassed in beauty and appeal by his fifth and sixth. This F Minor opus presents a plenitude of material, even an abundance of beauty, but its atmosphere often is feverish and its more turbulent pages offer the listening ear something of a task. The delicate Scherzo with its prolonged pizzicato never fails to exert charm and the Finale in its spirit and brilliance is redeeming.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky was one of clarifing qualities, brilliant, stimulating, always musicianly. And memory harked back to an admirable performance of the same work by the Boston orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux, several seasons ago.

Needless to say the evening's effort met with enthusiastic response on the part of the listeners, and that honors were shared by leader and led.

The Buffalo Musical foundation, of which Marion De Forest is local manager, will present three more orchestral concerts in the present series.

Those Noticed in Audience at Symphony Concert Here

A large and enthusiastic audience was present, among them Mr. and Mrs. Frederick B. Cooley and Miss Katrina Cooley, the latter wearing a white fur coat over a white frock. Mrs. Hans Schmidt and her daughter, Mrs. Gustav F. Watters were present, the latter in a black chiffon gown with deep yoke of beige chiffon and lace. Mr. and Mrs. Norman P. Clement attended, the latter in a cherry red velvet coat with fur collar; Mr. and Mrs. Roland L. O'Brian, the latter in red. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, the latter in black with long mink coat.

Others attending were Mrs. George Bleistein, Mrs. Clinton R. Wyckoff, Mrs. William Warren Smith, Mrs. Wesley P. Montgomery, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Mrs. Daniel W. Streeter, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Alden Rogers, Dr. and Mrs. Francescus Visser't Hooft, Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mrs. Archibald M. Hazard, Dr. Samuel Van Vranken Holmes, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mrs. Charles A. White, Mr. and Mrs. Ashford G. P. Murch, Mrs. William T. Jebb and Dr. and Mrs. Irving M. Snow.

Monumental Work by Sibelius Revived by Koussevitzky

American

By MOSES SMITH Nov 17

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony in A minor is revived at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky. The symphony is preceded by a suite from the music of Corelli, arranged by Pinelli, and followed by the brilliant "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The Sibelius Symphony has not been played in Boston since 1917, when Karl Muck was conductor. We are told that after eight performances of the work during his regime Dr. Muck confessed himself as much in the dark about the quality and content of the score as when he first set eyes on it. Obviously much water has flowed under the bridge of music since then, for though the work was by no means crystal clear yesterday it was quickly apparent that a genius had written this symphony, a man of great strength and eloquence of a harsh, rude, unsweet kind.

There are acrid dissonances in this score. But we have to thank the modernists for so accustoming our ears to this sort of thing during the past decade that it does not immediately prejudice the critical ear. As in almost all of his later work for orchestra Sibelius is here economical of resource unsparing in tonal logic, uncompromisingly direct. And he is undeniably gloomy, aggressively bitter. Each of the four movements develops a climax, but subsides into nothingness, as if, to quote Olin Downes, the fury of this man, shaking his fist, is helpless.

Hearing the symphony for the first time, we thought the performance by the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky excellent, realizing the intentions of the composer. While part of the audience at the matinee concert applauded the work appreciatively, many were apathetic. The majority of the listeners were more responsive to the trifling, though gay, Corelli suite and the obvious (because hackneyed) orchestral virtuosity of Rimsky.

This is not intended as a sneer at Rimsky-Korsakov, by any means, but as a commentary on the behavior of smug listeners. Without doubt the audiences of 30 odd years ago, when the "Scheherazade" was first played here, were offended by its daring orchestration and probably called the whole thing ugly noise. Now it is in the opposite danger of being over-popular, of having its musicale material worn to shreds. The performance of yesterday, by the way, lacked little or none of the brilliance the work usually receives under Mr. Koussevitzky, but the orchestral attack was occasionally ragged, and the instruments were not always in tune.

THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Sunday, October 25, 1931.

Upholstering Of Memorial Hall Seats Inspected

AN inspection of the upholstering that is to be used in covering seats at Memorial hall, to make them more comfortable, and which are to be ready for use Oct. 29, when the Boston Symphony orchestra appears here, was made last week by Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, 2065 Barton Place; Mrs. Charles P. Outhwaite of Morse road, and Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 South Columbia avenue, at the American Pad & Textile Co., in Greenfield, Ohio.

Padding for the seats is being secured from the above-mentioned concern in Greenfield, and the Columbus Coated Fabrics Co. has charge of the upholstering, which will require two miles of imitation leather. Mr. E. L. McClain, president of the American Pad & Textile Co., made a special price concession to the Columbus persons making arrangements for the work on the chairs.

A tour of inspection of the $6,000,000 school in Greenfield, endowed by Mr. McClain, was also made by the Columbus women. The school, one of the show places in the state, has an attendance of 2000 pupils daily.

+ + +

WHISTON

PRESS CLIPPING SERVICE

ALBANY-BUFFALO NEWYORK

BUFFALO (N.Y.) EVENING NEWS

Tuesday, October 27, 1931

Symphony Superb

Boston Orchestra Opens Foundation Series Here

By EDWARD DURNEY

The return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a season's absence, made for an auspicious beginning of the Buffalo Musical Foundation's Symphony series, Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall. The superb Boston organization always a welcome guest here, was doubly so on the present occasion, and a huge audience received with open arms the distinguished conductor and his glorious company.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program ranging from Handel to Ravel, and with his accustomed master touch and electrifying spirit he led his players to signal achievement. The Koussevitzky art happily combines subtlety and vitality,.grace and rugged energy, brilliance and profundity; and his sensitive instrument ever reflects the guiding hand of genius.

It is a far cry from the stately, formal measures of Handel to the complexities of Tchaikovsky and the freedom of Ravel, yet how justly did Koussevitzky publish the message of each composer! And how memorable are the thrilling climaxes he achieved in the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Ravel suite and the evening's symphony!

The Handel "Concerto Grosso," No. 12, for string orchestra, the first item of the evening's fare, benefitted by the clearest possible utterance of strings in musical converse. Every figure was traced in proper relief and the style of the whole was impeccable.

The familiar "Lohengrin" excerpt shone anew at the Koussevitzky touch. and perhaps the bit of faulty utterance of violins at the beginning and end may be condoned as mere evidence that after all the Boston Symphony orchestra is made up of human beings.

Nothing was lovlier than the Ravel, the Suite No. 2 from the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet. Here is a choice example of the Ravel creature genius—orchestration of light and shade, breathing the fragrance of the wood, caressing as a gentle breeze, displaying a color range from the most delicate tints to riotous hues and ever pulsating with life. And in performance the composer was highly favored. It would be difficult to imagine a more glowing, more worthy performance of the work than that afforded by the Boston forces.

The evening's symphony was Tchaikovsky's fourth, distinguished among the Russian's symphonic works though surpassed in beauty and appeal by his fifth and sixth. This F Minor opus presents a plenitude of material, even an abundance of beauty, but its atmosphere often is feverish and its more turbulent pages offer the listening ear something of a task. The delicate Scherzo with its prolonged pizzicato never fails to exert charm and the Finale in its spirit and brilliance is redeeming.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky was one of clarifying qualities, brilliant, stimulating, always musicianly. And memory harked back to an admirable performance of the same work by the Boston orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux, several seasons ago.

Needless to say the evening's effort met with enthusiastic response on the part of the listeners, and that honors were shared by leader and led.

The Buffalo Musical foundation, of which Marion De Forest is local manager, will present three more orchestral concerts in the present series.

Those Noticed in Audience at Symphony Concert Here

A large and enthusiastic audience was present, among them Mr. and Mrs. Frederick B. Cooley and Miss Katrina Cooley, the latter wearing a white fur coat over a white frock. Mrs. Hans Schmidt and her daughter, Mrs. Gustav F. Watters were present, the latter in a black chiffon gown with deep yoke of beige chiffon and lace. Mr. and Mrs. Norman P. Clement attended, the latter in a cherry red velvet coat with fur collar; Mr. and Mrs. Roland L. O'Brian, the latter in red. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, the latter in black with long mink coat.

Others attending were Mrs. George Bleistein, Mrs. Clinton R. Wyckoff, Mrs. William Warren Smith, Mrs. Wesley P. Montgomery, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Mrs. Daniel W. Streeter, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Alden Rogers, Dr. and Mrs. Francescus Visser't Hooft, Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mrs. Archibald M. Hazard, Dr. Samuel Van Vranken Holmes, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mrs. Charles A. White, Mr. and Mrs. Ashford G. P. Murch, Mrs. William T. Jebb and Dr. and Mrs. Irving M. Snow.

THE COLUMBUS CITIZEN

OCT. 22. 1931

SELECT "LA VALSE"

Boston Symphony's Recording Is Record-of-the-Month.

The November record-of-the-month, as selected from its recent recordings by the Victor company, is Ravel's "La Valse" played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Columbus musicians will note with interest that that composition, described as a choreographic poem, is listed by Dr. Koussevitzky for his program at Memorial Hall, Oct. 29.

The Boston Orchestra concert is the first in the series sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The orchestras from Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland are to follow in the course of the season.

Seats are available at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Long Island City, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

OCT 22 1931

Radio Fulfils Last Wish of Great Inventor; Boston Symphony Unit to Play 'Eroica'

By TURNER DIALLE.

Thomas A. Edison's last wish in music will be realized in a nation-wide radio requiem for the great inventor tonight.

His favorite symphony, the "Eroica" by Beethoven, will comprise a memorial concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard over combined networks of the National Broadcasting Company from 4 to 5 o'clock tonight.

A short time before his death, Edison informed the Etude magazine:

"If I had but twenty-four hours to live, and could hear great music, I would choose Beethoven's 'Eroica'." His answer was in response to a questionnaire sent to several distinguished Americans.

The first movement of the work depicts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emporer, the outraged composer struck Bonoparte's name from the symphony.

Toscha Seidel, violinst, accompained by the Columbia Concert Orchestra, will include the Prize Song from Wagner's only opera comedy, "Die Meistersinger," in his all Wagnerian concert over WABC from 9 to 9:30 tonight.

This aria is one of Seidel's favorites and he has played it many times on his tours throughout the world and during performances before rulers.

"Great Britain's Choice" will be the topic of the talk by James G. McDonald of the Foreign Policy Association over WEAF at 7:15 tonight.

Edwin C. Hill, "The Man in the Front Row," will deliver the second of his talks in which he uses episodes from his journalistic experence to clarify the significance of events of the day, over WABC from 10 to 10:30 tonight.

Angelo Patri, noted authority on methods of child training, will discuss "Laziness" when he is heard over WABC from 8:45 to 9 o'clock tonight. Neither punishment nor rewards will cure laziness, because laziness is but a symptom of trouble, Patri says. To cure laziness the cause must be found, he adds, and the surest preventative is good health.

"Candle Shadows," a new program will be presented over WLWL every Thursday evening beginning tonight at 7:15.

THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL, COLUMBUS,

OCTOBER 27, 1931

ted han Coy of the a, which Thurs-ng conmphony

, Serge played nd apr, Mich.
s will leaving

Columbus Thursday night will go to Pittsburgh and Ithaca, N. Y., before returning to Boston.

Single admission tickets for the concert will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANSING, MICH.
CAPITAL NEWS

9

OCT 27 1931

Boston Symphony

ANN ARBOR (UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, will be featured by the 111-piece orchestra.

4

The Ohio State Journal
Published Every Morning in the Year by
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL CO

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931.

A Musical Treat.

LOVERS of music in Columbus and central Ohio have reason to rejoice over the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Oct. 29, when it will open a season of symphonic concerts arranged by the Central Ohio Symphony Club. For years the Boston orchestra has been acclaimed the greatest of its kind. It has been fortunate in having an abundance of wealthy friends, who pour millions into the treasury to maintain and improve it and the greatest living conductors have been employed to direct its programs. It was born under a lucky star and its career has been marked by steady progress in the direction of musical idealism. Its appearance in any city is a musical event of the first importance, and Columbus is fortunate in securing it for the first of the five programs of the season. For the present year its programs have been chosen by its patrons, a referendum request having been distributed last spring. Columbus will hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most popular offerings, and excerpts from the masterful Wagner, always welcomed by music lovers.

The Columbus Citizen
(A SCRIPPS-HOWARD NEWSPAPER)
Owned and published daily (except Sunday) by The Citizen Publishing Co., 34 N. Third Street.
Phone ADams 3121.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1931.

Pretty Soft Now

AN item in The Citizen conveys the cheering information that 3000 seats in Memorial Hall are being equipped with comfortable pads and will be ready for the Oct. 29 concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the Central Ohio Symphony Club.

Everyone who has suffered on those seats in their original, unpadded condition will thrill to this news. One variety of hard times, thank goodness, is going—we hope forever.

Monumental Work by Sibelius Revived by Koussevitzky

American

By MOSES SMITH Nov 17

Sibelius' Fourth Symphony in A minor is revived at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky. The symphony is preceded by a suite from the music of Corelli, arranged by Pinelli, and followed by the brilliant "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The Sibelius Symphony has not been played in Boston since 1917, when Karl Muck was conductor. We are told that after eight performances of the work during his regime Dr. Muck confessed himself as much in the dark about the quality and content of the score as when he first set eyes on it. Obviously much water has flowed under the bridge of music since then, for though the work was by no means crystal clear yesterday it was quickly apparent that a genius had written this symphony, a man of great strength and eloquence of a harsh, rude, unsweet kind.

There are acrid dissonances in this score. But we have to thank the modernists for so accustoming our ears to this sort of thing during the past decade that it does not immediately prejudice the critical ear. As in almost all of his later work for orchestra Sibelius is here economical of resource unsparing in tonal logic, uncompromisingly direct. And he is undeniably gloomy, aggressively bitter. Each of the four movements develops a climax, but subsides into nothingness, as if, to quote Olin Downes, the fury of this man, shaking his fist, is helpless.

Hearing the symphony for the first time, we thought the performance by the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky excellent, realizing the intentions of the composer. While part of the audience at the matinee concert applauded the work appreciatively, many were apathetic. The majority of the listeners were more responsive to the trifling, though gay, Corelli suite and the obvious (because hackneyed) orchestral virtuosity of Rimsky.

This is not intended as a sneer at Rimsky-Korsakov, by any means, but as a commentary on the behavior of smug listeners. Without doubt the audiences of 30 odd years ago, when the "Scheherazade" was first played here, were offended by its daring orchestration and probably called the whole thing ugly noise. Now it is in the opposite danger of being over-popular, of having its musicale material worn to shreds. The performance of yesterday, by the way, lacked little or none of the brilliance the work usually receives under Mr. Koussevitzky, but the orchestral attack was occasionally ragged, and the instruments were not always in tune.

THE COLUMBUS CITIZEN

OCT. 22, 1931

SELECT "LA VALSE"

Boston Symphony's Recording Is Record-of-the-Month.

The November record-of-the-month, as selected from its recent recordings by the Victor company, is Ravel's "La Valse" played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Columbus musicians will note with interest that that composition, described as a choreographic poem, is listed by Dr. Koussevitzky for his program at Memorial Hall, Oct. 29.

The Boston Orchestra concert is the first in the series sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The orchestras from Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland are to follow in the course of the season.

Seats are available at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

4

The Ohio State Journal
Published Every Morning in the Year by
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL CO

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1931.

A Musical Treat.

LOVERS of music in Columbus and central Ohio have reason to rejoice over the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on Oct. 29, when it will open a season of symphonic concerts arranged by the Central Ohio Symphony Club. For years the Boston orchestra has been acclaimed the greatest of its kind. It has been fortunate in having an abundance of wealthy friends, who pour millions into the treasury to maintain and improve it and the greatest living conductors have been employed to direct its programs. It was born under a lucky star and its career has been marked by steady progress in the direction of musical idealism. Its appearance in any city is a musical event of the first importance, and Columbus is fortunate in securing it for the first of the five programs of the season. For the present year its programs have been chosen by its patrons, a referendum request having been distributed last spring. Columbus will hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, one of the most popular offerings, and excerpts from the masterful Wagner, always welcomed by music lovers.

THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Sunday, October 25, 1931.

Upholstering Of Memorial Hall Seats Inspected

AN inspection of the upholstering that is to be used in covering seats at Memorial hall, to make them more comfortable, and which are to be ready for use Oct. 29, when the Boston Symphony orchestra appears here, was made last week by Mrs. Frederick A. Miller, 2065 Barton Place; Mrs. Charles P. Outhwaite of Morse road, and Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 South Columbia avenue, at the American Pad & Textile Co., in Greenfield, Ohio.

Padding for the seats is being secured from the above-mentioned concern in Greenfield, and the Columbus Coated Fabrics Co. has charge of the upholstering, which will require two miles of imitation leather. Mr. E. L. McClain, president of the American Pad & Textile Co., made a special price concession to the Columbus persons making arrangements for the work on the chairs.

A tour of inspection of the $6,000,000 school in Greenfield, endowed by Mr. McClain, was also made by the Columbus women. The school, one of the show places in the state, has an attendance of 2000 pupils daily.

+ + +

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Long Island City, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

OCT 22 1931

Radio

Thoma wide radi
His f memorial combined o'clock to A sho
"If I
I would a questio
The firs

SMITH SPEAKER SUPPORTS GORD RACE IN ASTOI

Harrington Takes Stump Republican Candidate Alderman.

picts the struggle and nobility of an heroic life; its second portrays death and the funeral march. The composition originally was dedicated by Beethoven to Napoleon, whom he regarded as Europe's liberator. When the Little Corporal proclaimed himself Emporer, the outraged composer struck Bonoparte's name from the symphony.

Toscha Seidel, violinst, accompained by the Columbia Concert Orchestra, will include the Prize Song from Wagner's only opera comedy, "Die Meistersinger," in his all Wagnerian concert over WABC from 9 to 9:30 tonight.

This aria is one of Seidel's favorites and he has played it many times on his tours throughout the world and during performances before rulers.

"Great Britain's Choice" will be the topic of the talk by James G. McDonald of the Foreign Policy Association over WEAF at 7:15 tonight.

Edwin C. Hill, "The Man in the Front Row," will deliver the second of his talks in which he uses episodes from his journalistic experence to clarify the significance of events of the day, over WABC from 10 to 10:30 tonight.

Angelo Patri, noted authority on methods of child training, will discuss "Laziness" when he is heard over WABC from 8:45 to 9 o'clock tonight. Neither punishment nor rewards will cure laziness, because laziness is but a symptom of trouble, Patri says. To cure laziness the cause must be found, he adds, and the surest preventative is good health.

"Candle Shadows," a new program will be presented over WLWL every Thursday evening beginning tonight at 7:15.

The Columbus Citizen
(A SCRIPPS-HOWARD NEWSPAPER)
Owned and published daily (except Sunday) by The Citizen Publishing Co., 34 N. Third Street.
Phone ADams 3121.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1931.

Pretty Soft Now

AN item in The Citizen conveys the cheering information that 3000 seats in Memorial Hall are being equipped with comfortable pads and will be ready for the Oct. 29 concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the Central Ohio Symphony Club.

Everyone who has suffered on those seats in their original, unpadded condition will thrill to this news. One variety of hard times, thank goodness, is going—we hope forever.

THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL, COLUMBUS,

OCTOBER 27, 1931

Tour Is Limited

Only five cities other than Columbus are on the itinerary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will come to Memorial Hall Thursday night to play the opening concert in the series of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

The orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, played Monday night in Buffalo and appears Tuesday in Ann Arbor, Mich. Wednesday the musicians will spend in Detroit and after leaving Columbus Thursday night will go to Pittsburgh and Ithaca, N. Y., before returning to Boston.

Single admission tickets for the concert will be on sale Wednesday and Thursday at the downtown box office in the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third Sts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LANSING, MICH.
CAPITAL NEWS

⑨

OCT 27 1931

Boston Symphony

ANN ARBOR (UP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play here tonight for the first time in 15 years. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, will be featured by the 111-piece orchestra.

WHISTON
PRESS CLIPPING SERVICE
ALBANY-BUFFALO NEWYORK

BUFFALO (N.Y.) EVENING NEWS
Tuesday, October 27, 1931

Symphony Superb

Boston Orchestra Opens Foundation Series Here

By EDWARD DURNEY

The return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, after a season's absence, made for an auspicious beginning of the Buffalo Musical Foundation's Symphony series, Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall. The superb Boston organization always a welcome guest here, was doubly so on the present occasion, and a huge audience received with open arms the distinguished conductor and his glorious company.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program ranging from Handel to Ravel, and with his accustomed master touch and electrifying spirit he led his players to signal achievement. The Koussevitzky art happily combines subtlety and vitality, grace and rugged energy, brilliance and profundity; and his sensitive instrument ever reflects the guiding hand of genius.

It is a far cry from the stately, formal measures of Handel to the complexities of Tchaikovsky and the freedom of Ravel, yet how justly did Koussevitzky publish the message of each composer! And how memorable are the thrilling climaxes he achieved in the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Ravel suite and the evening's symphony!

The Handel "Concerto Grosso," No. 12, for string orchestra, the first item of the evening's fare, benefitted by the clearest possible utterance of strings in musical converse. Every figure was traced in proper relief and the style of the whole was impeccable.

The familiar "Lohengrin" excerpt shone anew at the Koussevitzky touch, and perhaps the bit of faulty utterance of violins at the beginning and end may be condoned as mere evidence that after all the Boston Symphony orchestra is made up of human beings.

Nothing was lovlier than the Ravel, the Suite No. 2 from the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet. Here is a choice example of the Ravel creature genius—orchestration of light and shade, breathing the fragrance of the wood, caressing as a gentle breeze, displaying a color range from the most delicate tints to riotous hues and ever pulsating with life. And in performance the composer was highly favored. It would be difficult to imagine a more glowing, more worthy performance of the work than that afforded by the Boston forces.

The evening's symphony was Tchaikovsky's fourth, distinguished among the Russian's symphonic works though surpassed in beauty and appeal by his fifth and sixth. This F Minor opus presents a plenitude of material, even an abundance of beauty, but its atmosphere often is feverish and its more turbulent pages offer the listening ear something of a task. The delicate Scherzo with its prolonged pizzicato never fails to exert charm and the Finale in its spirit and brilliance is redeeming.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Tchaikovsky was one of clarifying qualities, brilliant, stimulating, always musicianly. And memory harked back to an admirable performance of the same work by the Boston orchestra under the baton of Pierre Monteux, several seasons ago.

Needless to say the evening's effort met with enthusiastic response on the part of the listeners, and that honors were shared by leader and led.

The Buffalo Musical foundation, of which Marion De Forest is local manager, will present three more orchestral concerts in the present series.

Those Noticed in Audience at Symphony Concert Here

A large and enthusiastic audience was present, among them Mr. and Mrs. Frederick B. Cooley and Miss Katrina Cooley, the latter wearing a white fur coat over a white frock. Mrs. Hans Schmidt and her daughter, Mrs. Gustav F. Watters were present, the latter in a black chiffon gown with deep yoke of beige chiffon and lace. Mr. and Mrs. Norman P. Clement attended, the latter in a cherry red velvet coat with fur collar; Mr. and Mrs. Roland L. O'Brian, the latter in red. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, the latter in black with long mink coat.

Others attending were Mrs. George Bleistein, Mrs. Clinton R. Wyckoff, Mrs. William Warren Smith, Mrs. Wesley P. Montgomery, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Mrs. Daniel W. Streeter, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Walker, Mr. and Mrs. Alden Rogers, Dr. and Mrs. Francescus Visser't Hooft, Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mrs. Archibald M. Hazard, Dr. Samuel Van Vranken Holmes, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mrs. Charles A. White, Mr. and Mrs. Ashford G. P. Murch, Mrs. William T. Jebb and Dr. and Mrs. Irving M. Snow.

Columbus Evening Dispatch
OHIO'S GREATEST HOME DAILY
 COMPLETE EDITION THURSDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1931. THIRTY-TWO PAGES.

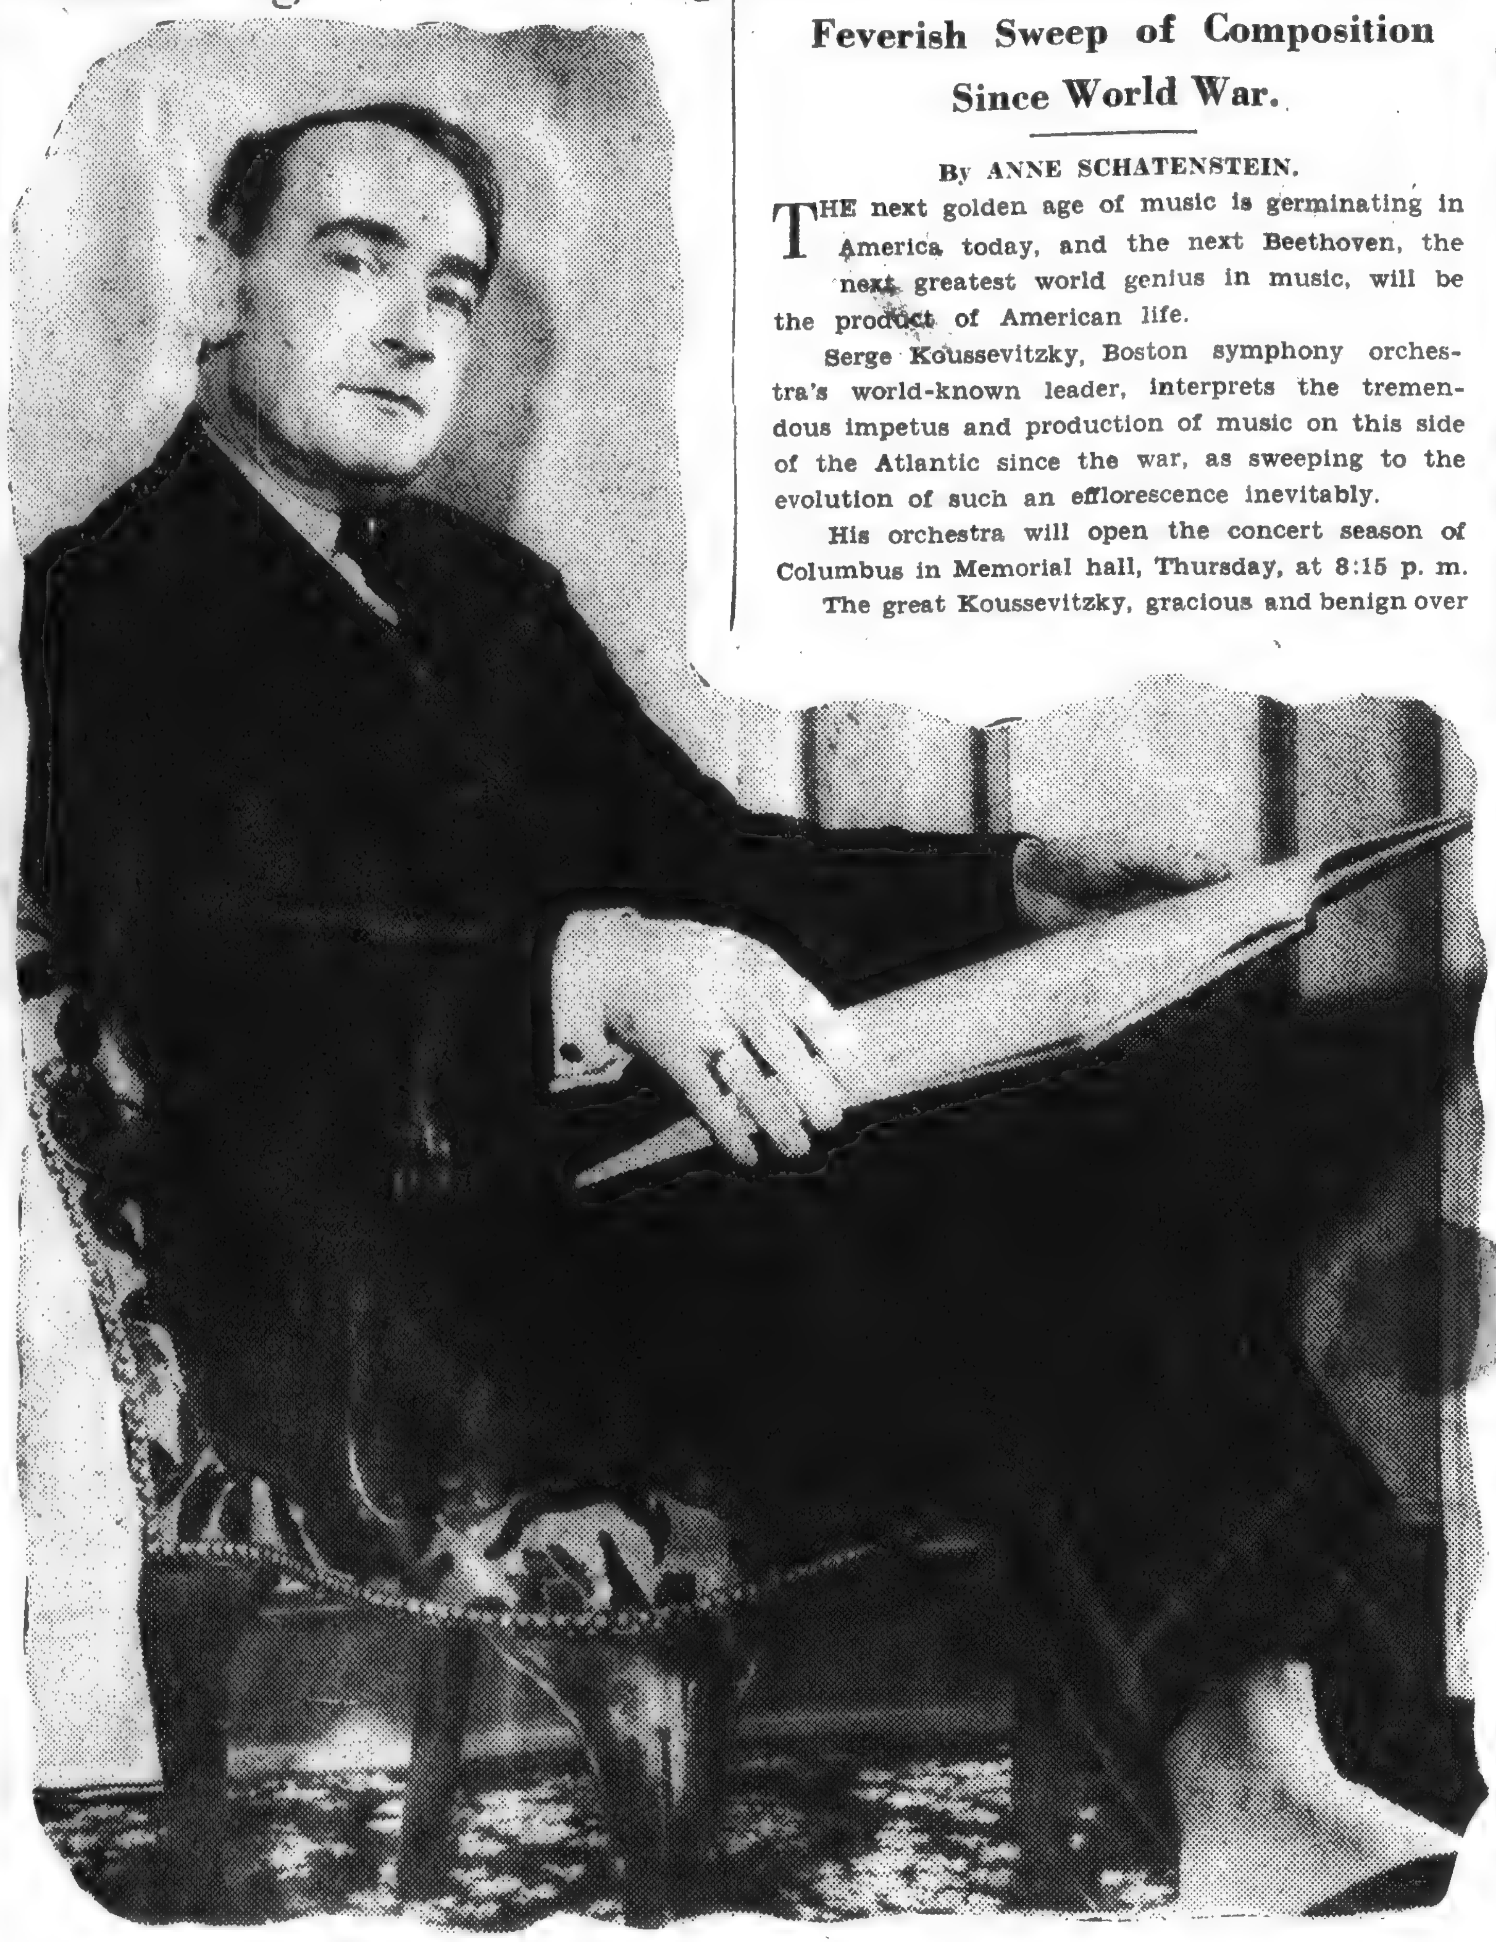
Next Beethoven May Be America

◆ ◆ ◆ ◆ ◆

"Golden Age" Germinating

Famous Symphony Leader Sees This In, Feverish Sweep of Composition Since World War.

By ANNE SCHATENSTEIN.



Serge Koussevitzky.

THE next golden age of music is germinating in America today, and the next Beethoven, the next greatest world genius in music, will be the product of American life.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony orchestra's world-known leader, interprets the tremendous impetus and production of music on this side of the Atlantic since the war, as sweeping to the evolution of such an efflorescence inevitably.

His orchestra will open the concert season of Columbus in Memorial hall, Thursday, at 8:15 p. m.

The great Koussevitzky, gracious and benign over a fire of fervor which gleams through his eyes,, talked the future of music in America with a glo wof pride for its promise in his Deshler Wallick hatel suite Thursday morning.

"Maybe somewhere on a farm, in a flat anywhere in America, there grows this great genius now. Maybe he do not come for 10 years, 20 or 30. But come he must."

✤ ✤ ✤

THE famous orchestra leader still has troubles with English as a medium of expression.

"M-m-m-m- what is the word?" he struggles impatiently.

"Verstehen Sie Deutsch vielleicht?"

Ah and then he broke into a great articulateness!

He described the great quantity of composition now being produced in this country, arising out of this peculiar environment. This is really a worthy preparation for the genius who is to come, he thinks.

"Maybe it will not be a boy. It may be a little girl and that the next genius will be a woman.

✤ ✤ ✤

"NO, in the past women have not produced the great geniuses of the world. But what do you expect? Intellectual progress for the woman has been so much later.

"Yes, in America it is possible that a woman should be the genius. Her education and her whole position would make it possible. For a European woman it would be so difficult. Her development—think of it—it is only begun yesterday."

As Koussevitzky sees it, the new form which the genius of the future will evolve will not arise from folklore.

"IT will be a transcendental music," he pronounced. "It will be a suitable medium for expression of the times, but it will come from the old through an evolution. Yes, it must be something new.

"For a great artist the general life is only a pretext for his expression, it is only the soil where his art takes root."

He drew a parallel between the present age and that which immediately preceded Beethoven, whose seventh symphony he will play before the Memorial hall audience, Thursday night.

✤ ✤ ✤

THE predecessors of Beethoven, Haydn, Handel, Bach, made possible a Beethoven, he explained. This great composer brought the symphony to its matured form: He was the father of the sonata.

So composers today in America are laying the way for tomorrow's genius, according to Koussevitzky.

The music he is directing at one particular moment is always his favorite music, he described.

"How could it be otherwise?"

To him to be a great interpreter—to be a great leader, is to be a great—"ah what you call it—yes—an eclectic!"

WITH that much said the great leader felt he said enough.

"I must leave you now—thank you until tonight."

He opens his eighth season in this country at the head of the Boston symphony orchestra. Before that he toured the world. Koussevitzky was born in Moscow and educated in Russia, Germany and France.

E OHIO STATE JOURNAL, COLUMBUS, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1931.

Serge Koussevitzky Leads His Orchestra to Success

By KARL B. PAULY.

The music season in Columbus opened auspiciously Thursday night with the first of the concerts in the series to be presented by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. Too much cannot be said of the excellence of the program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of world-famed Serge Koussevitsky.

Gratifying, too, was the four-fifths house, in view of Depression's sweep and winter's threshold. And there were other sources of comfort, not of the spirit, which will be spoken of later.

Two years ago Dr. Koussevitsky was introduced to Columbus audiences. Since then his return has been looked forward to as an event without peer and Thursday night was the realization.

His dignity, combined with a fine sensitiveness, permeates the orchestra into its every corner, 110-strong though it be. Whatever it is playing, the organization, like its leader, possesses this notable sensitive dignity—whether it be Beethoven or Ravel, or as two years ago, Brahms or Prokofieff. Dr. Kousevitsky now fans the great orchestra into flame with quick sweeps of his arms; now directs it merely with the nod of his head; now holds it between his finger tips. Always, there is this fine dignity.

Thursday night's program was chiefly notable for the playing of Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra in B minor, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. It was the first time in Columbus for the Handel number and the first time in six years for the seventh symphony.

Ravel's "La Valse," which is but 10 years old, was a novelty in more respects than one, and proved most curiously intriguing. Handel, striving for all the effects, may have sighed for lack of a cannon, but certainly Ravel had a battery of them at his disposal, and did not fail to use them even to puncture a waltz.

As always, the "Lohengrin" prelude was magnificently moving and under Dr. Koussevitsky seemed even a little more spiritually stirring than heretofore.

The Handel concerto grosso gave the program an opening that was scarcely short of sublime. The dialog between the group of solo instruments and the orchestra of 70 stringed instruments moved with impeccable tonal purity through its various moods, some distinctly reminiscent of the composer's "Messiah," others festive and little short of gay.

The manner of presentation in the "Lohengrin" prelude was, indeed, like a mysterious initiation—a preparation for the sight of unaccustomed things. Into such a tonal setting might well have descended, without being profaned, the Holy Grail of the Lohengrin legend.

One who thinks of Ravel, invariably thinks of his "Bolero." And those who demand the composer in his most indigenous territory, were not disappointed by "La Valse." Dr. Koussevitsky never fails to give the double basses their proper accent, and these with all the tympani and percussions, thrown against a background of hurrying, swirling, swaying strings and brasses, were called into full play by the master and his artists in this number.

Sounds hard to distinguish were kept darting from this corner and that as if to ask the question: "Who am I; guess what I'm doing?" Through it all were depicted the dancers—a great room filled with them—ecstacies, fortissimos; beauty and laughter, yet always a lurking rumble as of a volcano, or a thunder as of war.

The final number on the program—the Beethoven symphony, represented a triumph for Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony Club, who so earnestly urged its presentation that Dr. Koussevitsky yielded and placed it on the program.

So magnificent was its presentation by the Boston orchestra, so poignantly touching was the rendition of the second movement, so tremendously swaying the manner in which the last movement was offered, that description is beggared. Like other rare moments in the history of Columbus concerts, it must be classed as an "experience," rather than as a mere number on a program.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio is to be congratulated.

And not only should it be congratulated for the concert and the new series which it has opened, but also, and most distinctly, must it be thanked for the improvement in the Memorial Hall seats. Rebuilt, padded, and covered in green, they afford more comfort in one evening than ever experienced in all Memorial Hall's history before, and besides they are an aesthetic addition.

The refinished seats are a permanent gift of the Symphony Club to Memorial Hall and cost of the work was defrayed by a fund started by Mrs. F. A. Miller, associate president.

Dr. Koussevitsky may continue to remember Columbus as "the place where there's a high stage" but out-of-town guests will no longer remember Memorial Hall as the place with "those awful seats."

The next concert in the Symphony Club's series will be that of the Detroit Symphony orchestra on Dec. 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

OCT 29 1931

Explanatory Lecture To Be Given Friday On Campus Concert

An explanatory lecture on the Boston Symphony program to be given tomorrow by Prof. Paul J. Weaver, head of the Cornell Music Department, has been changed in time from 4 p. m. to 8:15 in the evening.

The talk will be given at the Music Building in Wait Avenue, and all persons interested in the compositions to be played by the famous orchestra in Bailey Hall Saturday night are invited to listen.

Special traffic arrangements were announced today to facilitate handling the concert crowd Saturday night. Tower Road will be used as the main approach to the building, and Reservoir Avenue will be employed only as an exit.

More parking space than hitherto will be provided, nearer to the auditorium. Additional areas will be available both east and west of Bailey Hall, towards the College of Home Economics and Rockefeller Hall.

The 110-piece orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the winter music season at Cornell with the following program: Brahms' Fourth Symphony; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse;" Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes;" and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

Mrs. Daniel J. Campau left for Pasadena, Calif., where she now resides, after a visit of several weeks at the Whittier.

* * *

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening caused a flurry of excitement among music lovers. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the concert at Masonic Auditorium. A group seated together included: Mrs. Fred T. Murphy, Mrs. Harriet N. Atterbury, Mrs. Richard P. Joy and Mrs. Henry E. Bodman. Others were Miss Anna Fletcher, John T. Nichols, Miss Helene Nichols, Mrs. Benjamin S. Warren, Mrs. John S. Newberry, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. O'Brien, Mrs. Gail Stephens, Miss Mary Ledyard, Miss Elizabeth Frederick, John Antisdel, Edward Kemp, Mrs. Harry J. Warner, Miss Christine Symington, Miss Helen Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Siewert, Mr. and Mrs. Maurice O. Smith, Miss Mary Josephine Petzold, Dan Buell II, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew D. Hotchkiss, Mrs. Arthur McGraw and Dr. and Mrs. Hugh Stalker.

52

Friday, October 30, 1931. THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Inner Soul of Wagner, Beethoven, Handel and Ravel, Is Evoked by Koussevitzky, Leading His Boston Orchestra

By H. E. CHERRINGTON.

FROM the hallowed precincts of its own Orchestra hall last night came to our own Memorial the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the inspired and inspiring leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky. The concert marked the opening of the eighth season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, and it signalized the beginning of another year's delight for a few thousands of people, including the present writer, in the hearing of the highest type of music that the world affords.

A half century and more of the Boston orchestra has naturally meant a wonderful development of the great band to which Colonel Higginson gave so much in the way, not only of support but of effective direction. The orchestra has now attained a stature that limns sharply against the horizon of our great musical attainments. Only three of four orchestras in the world can be compared with this, and only as many conductors, or a few more, have attained quite the stature of the almost worshipped Koussevitzky.

He comes before his audience, and at the head of his men, this calm, yet dynamic man, and very soon gives evidence that he is a master of music and a dominant leader of men.

GLORIES OF STRING CHOIR.

KOUSSEVITZKY, playing to a very large audience and one that did him every conceivable sort of honor—including the now somewhat perfunctory one of standing at the leader's entrance—was wise to open his program with the Handel Concerto Grosso for Strings, Opus 12, for he has a body of strings that we have seldom seen equaled, and we doubt if ever surpassed, among the bands which have come within our hearing. This fact was apparent all through this opening composition and especially in the second largo which was of opulent and rich-hued beauty; the tempo infallible, and its nuances of the most poetic order. The final allegro, it may be added, was as bright as sunrise birdsong. The program records that this was the first performance in Columbus of this opus, and we do not recall hearing before Ravel's "La Valse," though memory may err.

That really marvelous body of first violins gave an epochal command of unanimity, keen attunement, careful bowing, in the opening strains of the prelude to "Lohengrin," a work we have heard many times, but never played with quite the purity of beauty that it attained under the sedulous baton of Koussevitzky. The gradual crescendo was builded with a fine sense of form and a feeling for real symphonic architecture.

RAVEL AT HIS BEST

"LA VALSE," which Monteux introduced in Boston in one of the post-Muckian years (1922), belongs with the major achievements of Ravel, that little Napoleon of present-day French music. Styled a choreographic poem (for this adjective we stick to the old spelling of dance lore, though Bostonians, of course, use the lexicographers' preferred dropping of the second "o"), it invites to all sorts of interpretations. Opened by tympani and bassoons—the very dissonances of war—it proceeds to arpeggios in the violins and arabesques in the flutes; the rumbling military suggestion fighting for dominance a while and then succumbing to the persistent beauty of an almost Straussian waltz melody, nearly always with echoes of the storm and of unrest. The phrase of some critic, "We dance on a volcano," is a quite inspired description. The orchestra played this with great skill and with undeniable zest.

BEETHOVEN'S "SEVENTH"

AFTER the intermission, when the rigorous and sternly stylistic "Seventh" of Beethoven began, we began to have a feeling that so much color had been lavished on the first part of the program that the finale, with all regard to the mastery of Beethoven, was a bit too contrastful in its simplicity. Koussevitzky had wanted to do the "Eroica" in this place, but the club leaders had insisted on the "Seventh" as being the one now logically due. It was done in splendid fashion, with fine regard for traditions, with an exhibition again of what that noble choir of strings can do, in the allegretto, and with an especially crisp treatment of the third movement. The concert closed with a real demonstration of enthusiasm from the audience. An auspicious opening concert, if ever there was one.

SANE, YET INSPIRED

AS for Koussevitsky, who had been with us once before, he seems to us to parallel, in a general way, the attitude of Rachmaninoff in his own special field. His readings are of sanity and unostentation and yet marked by penetrative insight. Occasionally he will drop his beat for many measures at a time and again he is almost Creatore-ian in his solicitude for special expression in the individual choirs.

A great leader and a superb orchestra opens what we hope shall be for the Symphony club a most successful season.

Pgh. Post-Gazette.

—14—

Symphonic Series Start At Mosque

Koussevitzky Brings Boston Orchestra, Fine Program.

By HARVEY GAUL.

Who cares whether banks fold up like autumn leaves, whether we're in a depression or not, the orchestra season has begun, and last night at the Mosque a large and representative audience was present to snap its fingers at the impending apple business.

And some of us sat spellbound when the brilliant Boston Symphony sung those pianissimo passages, and we were not breathless either from novelty of program (there was only one number new to these hilltops), but rather was it entirely due to Dr. Koussevitzky's reading and the supreme ability of the men.

That IS an orchestra, a truly noble organization, and having heard it last night one regrets that it has been two years since it was last here.

For effulgence of tone, great sumach-colored sonority, it is doubtful if you can surpass the Boston strings, and for brasses commend us to those gentlemen scattered along the back-drop—they were superb.

Handel to Strauss.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, No. 12, opened the program, and sometimes Handel is dry and perfunctory, but last night in the larghetto and in the second largo, one heard cantabile in apogee; Handel, writing slow movements only comparable to those to be followed later by Beethoven.

Lovely little dialogued phrases were in that concerto, and right here may we pay respects to the concert-meister for his playing in this work and later in the tone poem. Whoever he is he's an exceptional man.

One doubts if there is a finer French interpreter than Serge Koussevitzky. Certainly he has feeling for Debussy and as often as "Two Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fetes" have been played here, we don't remember finer mutations, nuances, half-whispers than Dr. Koussevitzky gave "Clouds." As for "Fetes," it went pounding along like a glorious French band—and if you have ever heard a French band come tramping up the boulevard you know exactly the flare-blare rhythm.

Then came Maurice Ravel's "Suicide in Costume," the impressionistic "La Valse," choregraphic poem, and the same being the birth of the waltz, the birth of all waltzes—and the period of gestation was terrific.

What shall be said for this? It was another "Bolero," this time a Viennese valze, rambling along to a smashing climax. It was devilishly clever in working out, highly spiced, ornamentated with all kinds of instrumental devices, and the whole working itself up into a white heat and boiling over; Waldteufel sung by 105 men, Johann Strauss as he has never been played—and what of it?

"Life of a Hero."

No symphony. Instead, Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," the same being his most impressive tone poem, "Life of a Hero."

Now we will probably run afoul of the people cursed with kultur rabies, and we will be branded an Anglophobe, but the scenario of "Ein Heldenleben" is positively childish. It is nothing but grandiose balderdash and proves the absolute futility of trying to set metaphysics to music. However, that's another story and takes some space to prove.

That Strauss gave the tone poem all of his craft we have heard many a time and oft, and that in its way it is a masterpiece, we all know. All solo bits were marvelously encompassed, and if you could stand the scenario, it was a glorious finale.

Let's have Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony back next year; they start the season in fitting fashion.

October 31, 1931

—PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH—

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SYRIA MOSQUE

PROGRAM

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, No. 12 .... Handel
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
Nuages; Fetes.
La Valse .... Ravel
Ein Heldenleben .... Strauss

Mr. Lissfelt

After an absence of a season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned last night to Syria Mosque to inaugurate the concerts of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. Unfortunately there were vacant seats. Every lover of good music should have been there to hear such excellent playing.

Koussevitsky made a striking program. There was the Handel Concerto for his strings, the Debussy for his woodwinds, Ravel and Strauss for every player in the orchestra, and the ensemble for the director's own intellect. Beyond showing the fine quality of the Boston strings, Handel was dignified but not overwhelming. Debussy's nocturnes, on the other hand, had many a subtle touch, especially during "Fetes."

Only Richard Strauss has written a valse comparable to Ravel's, and that in the "Rosenkavalier." Both are fashioned in the same spirit, the orchestration in both is similar, but the character of the opera keeps Strauss' dance joyously vulgar, while Koussevitsky is too much the aristocrat to dance in the Prater. His was a feverish valse, but he kept it within the palace gates.

Never before have I heard such a tone in the opening motifs of the "Heldenleben." It was as if the hero could not burst the fetters that withheld him from his struggle with the world. There was a throb of impatience among the players until the music burst into its first full tone, and Koussevitsky planned it superbly. The violin solo was strikingly played, though more impassioned than on last hearing, at which time it was still more effective. This Strauss tone poem is only for the virtuoso orchestra; surely there is no better than the Boston Symphony.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

Pittsburgh Press
Oct. 31, 1931

Music

SYMPHONY WINS SIGNAL TRIUMPH

Boston Orchestra Opens Season Here to Plaudits

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Superlatives are inadequate in describing the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, last night at Syria Mosque, for in inaugurating the season this celebrated organization and its famous conductor scored a signal triumph in the rendition of a program that was as superbly constructed as its performance was memorable.

The spirit and ideals of that incomparable music patron, Henry Higginson, who has long since entered into the Nirvana of great art patrons, seemed projected through the medium of the orchestra, that his vision, loving interest, and determination brought into existence, and supported for many years.

Ushering in the program came the last of Handel's stupendous Concertos Grosso, the twelfth, for strings, and if there had been any doubt of the possibilities of greatness of effect in a composition of this type, that doubt was dispelled by a beauty of tonal accomplishment in its performance.

Rare Musicianship

For sheer loveliness of instrumental bel canto, the gorgeous Concertos Grosso of Bach and Handel—when played as the Boston Symphony and Koussevitsky presented them—are unsurpassed. The nobility of the first Largo, the vigor of the fugal Allegro, the finely restrained emotion in the Larghetto and in the ensuing connective Largo, was encompassed with rare musicianship and skill, while the concluding Allegro was climaxed with playing of majestic grandeur. Schools of composition may come and go but these regal works of the domain of music will ever stir the souls of concert goers, as the Hendel work did last night when at its conclusion a storm of applause attested to the universal appeal that it commands.

In exquisite contrast followed the Debussy Nuages (Clouds), and Fetes (Festivals), in both of which the orchestra, under the magic spell of Koussevitsky's conducting, wove timbres of poeatic mysticism in a manner that was enthralling. Never before have we heard these ingratiating orchestral pastelles of Debussy performed with such entrancing effect.

'La Valse' is Highlight

Ravel's remarkably orchestrated choreographic poem, "La Valse" was another highlight. This brilliant work, fashioned on the compelling rhythm of the inimitable Viennese Waltz, runs the gamut of emotion. Delectable in its grace, the mood of the waltz mounts gradually until it reaches a climax of passionate ardor that borders on barbaric fury. Hypnotic in effect it won well deserved approbation.

The grand final of this memorable concert offered Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" (A Hero's Life)—a composition that will forever remain a tonal monument to a glorious music era, and to a transcendent musician—Richard Strauss—who probably is the foremost living composer.

Performance Impressive

The united efforts of the orchestra and Koussevitsky were productive of an inspired and highly impressive performance. They gave of themselves unstintedly and imbued this notable work with unusual vitality. Koussevitsky was complete master of his orchestral forces. He is the personification of unaffected grace, imparting his interpretive will without ostentation and in a manner that is indicative of consummate learning and profound knowledge of his art.

Richard Burgin, the concert master, played the solo sections of the Strauss Tone Poem with extraordinary skill and impeccability of technic, surmounting the tremendous musical and virtuosic demands with ease and finesse. Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra were tended an ovation at the completion of the 53

◆ SOCIETY ◆

—PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1931

Brilliant Audience Attends Opening Symyhony Concert

A BRILLIANT assemblage gathered at the Mosque last evening to enjoy the delightful program offered by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first symphony concert of the season.

Noted entering the Mosque were Mr. and Mrs. B. R. B. Townsend, the latter wearing a gown of American beauty chiffon, and Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Harden Church, Mrs. William McClay Hall was in her box, wearing black velvet with shoulder boquet of gardenias. Noted also were Mr. and Mrs. William J. Holland, Mrs. William Thaw and Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., who wore a black chiffon gown with rhinestone shoulder straps. Mrs. George E. Tener, was in her box, in red velvet gown, with Mrs. Kinley Tener, in black and white.

During the intermission a number of the younger members of society were chatting in the foyer. Miss Caroline Mitchell was there in black velvet with short white velvet wrap. Miss La Salle Dorrance was there in pale blue satin with short white fur wrap. Seen also were Miss Ruth Willock in black chiffon, and her sister, Miss Virginia Willock, wore black lace. Also noted were Miss Rosamound Fitch in flowered chiffon, Miss Bertha Brooks in black with short white fur wrap, and her mother, Mrs. J. Twing Brooks in blue lace with silver cloth wrap. Miss Mary Magee was there in black lace, and Miss Dorothy Slack in black satin with black velvet wrap.

Mrs. Henry C. Bughman was there in Persian purple velvet and Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard was with her daughter, Mrs. Thomas A. Robinson, who was in black velvet.

Seen also were Mrs. Chester Van Kleeck in brown lace, with Mrs. John Joy Edson, Jr., in black lace with purple velvet wrap, and Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, in black velvet.

Mrs. Robert Keeney was in her box, wearing an old gold satin. Seen also were Mrs. Charles Dahlinger in cream chiffon, Mrs. John Freeman in black lace, Mrs. Charles Dickey, in blue chiffon, Mrs. E. M. House and Mrs. John L. McK. Yardley.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

1931

The Boston Symphony, last night at Syria Mosque, opening the symphony series of the winter, attracted such a large, brilliant audience that one would never have suspected that there was a depression. And a most responsive audience it was, too.

Symphony Attracts

Among the many I saw during intermission were Wilhelmina Balken, in delphinium blue chiffon, and George Pearson in black lace. In a group nearby I saw Mrs. T. Clifton Jenkins and her daughter, Elizabeth, in orange crepe.

Nancy Brown was there, and Jane Sloan. and Mrs. Arthur P. Woolfolk, wearing a petunia crepe gown. Rosamound Fitch was there and Florence Carroll.

Among those I noticed in boxes were Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson in blue lace, brocaded chiffon, Lydia Irish and Mrs. F. C. Irish.

Younger Set There

Marie Louise Bickford chose a black velvet frock with cap sleeves of beaded white chiffon and Harriet Fickes was in peach satin, and Ruth Willock in black chiffon.

Mrs. Henry Clay Bughman, Jr., wore garnet valvet; Mrs. William S. Moorhead, who sat in one of the boxes, wore black chiffon, and Mrs. John W. Lawrence, black and white chiffon.

Barbara Ewing chose a yellow satin gown, Mrs. George P. Bassett, one of the boxholders, was in black, and Caroline Mitchell, a deb of the season, chose a black velvet gown, over which she wore a brief jacket of white crepe having bands of mink at the flaring cuffs.

Virginia Willock I saw arriving, and Mrs. E. V. Babcock in black velvet and her daughter, Mrs. Gordon Fisher, Jr., in black satin.

The Samuel Harden Churches were there with Mrs. Church in black lace.

Striking Costumes

Others I had a glimpse of were Mrs. George S. Baton, Margaret Brainard in scarlet crepe, La Salle Dorrance in white satin with the long flowing sleeves banded in mink. Her house guest, Ruth Seymour, of Nayatt, R. I., wore blue crepe.

I also noticed Mrs. William McClay Hall, the B. R. B. Townsends. Mrs. George E. Tener, and Kinley Tener.

Mrs. J. Twing Brooks chose blue lace, Miss Dorothy Slack, black satin. And I saw Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard and Mrs. Thomas A. Robinson.

Mrs. John Joy Edson, Jr., was in black lace. Mrs. John Freeman in black lace, and Mrs. Charles Dahlinger in cream chiffon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

T 31 1931

MUSIC
Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYRIA MOSQUE

PROGRAM

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, No. 12	Handel
Two Nocturnes Nuages; Fetes.	Debussy
La Valse	Ravel
Ein Heldenleben	Strauss

After an absence of a season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned last night to Syria Mosque to inaugurate the concerts of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. Unfortunately there were vacant seats. Every lover of good music should have been there to hear such excellent playing.

Mr. Lissfelt

Koussevitsky made a striking program. There was the Handel Concerto for his strings, the Debussy for his woodwinds, Ravel and Strauss for every player in the orchestra, and the ensemble for the director's own intellect. Beyond showing the fine quality of the Boston strings, Handel was dignified but not overwhelming. Debussy's nocturnes, on the other hand, had many a subtle touch, especially during "Fetes."

Only Richard Strauss has written a valse comparable to Ravel's, and that in the "Rosenkavalier." Both are fashioned in the same spirit, the orchestration in both is similar, but the character of the opera keeps Strauss' dance joyously vulgar, while Koussevitsky is too much the aristocrat to dance in the Prater. His was a feverish valse, but he kept it within the palace gates.

Never before have I heard such a tone in the opening motifs of the "Heldenleben." It was as if the hero could not burst the fetters that withheld him from his struggle with the world. There was a throb of impatience among the players until the music burst into its first full tone and Kousse-

-The
-yed, n on was auss ioso bet-r.

—

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
SAT. NIGHT

OCT 31 1931

The Boston Symphony.

HAD Wednesday evening's audience been commensurate with the magnificance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program, the walls of Masonic Auditorium would have given way and Cass Park would have been completely filled. Koussevitzky made a good impression on ~~his last visit~~ but this time he was positively regal and gave a peerless performance. He seemed to combine all of the virtues of the other "conducting aces" but vith such a finely adjusted balance that he was dramatic without being sensational, scholarly but not academic, poetic but never saccharine and dignified without being wooden. His presentation of Ravel's La Valse has never been equaled in Detroit, while his Handel, Strauss and Debussy have never been surpassed. He is a great conductor and plays on an instrument that is still superb even though it has lost some of its prestige since the colorful Leopold placed himself on the American orchestral throne.—M. M. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WINNIPEG, CAN.
Manitoba Free Press

ts own symphony orchestra.

* * *

"I have changed my idea of modern music," says Koussevitsky, the eminent Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. "I think ~~the~~ period of experimentation is no more. During the past seven years I have devoted much of my time and energy to new compositions. Now our outlook is much clearer. A great number of works highly appreciated a few years ago have completely disappeared. I do not wish to say that we must not play new compositions, but it is necessary to appreciate what we must play and what we must not."

Symphonic Series Start At Mosque

Koussevitzky Brings Boston Orchestra, Fine Program.

By HARVEY GAUL.

Who cares whether banks fold up like autumn leaves, whether we're in a depression or not, the orchestra season has begun, and last night at the Mosque a large and representative audience was present to snap its fingers at the impending apple business.

And some of us sat spellbound when the brilliant Boston Symphony sung those pianissimo passages, and we were not breathless either from novelty of program (there was only one number new to these hilltops), but rather was it entirely due to Dr. Koussevitzky's reading and the supreme ability of the men.

That IS an orchestra, a truly noble organization, and having heard it last night one regrets that it has been two years since it was last here.

For effulgence of tone, great sumach-colored sonority, it is doubtful if you can surpass the Boston strings, and for brasses commend us to those gentlemen scattered along the back-drop—they were superb.

Handel to Strauss.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, No. 12, opened the program, and sometimes Handel is dry and perfunctory, but last night in the larghetto and in the second largo, one heard cantabile in apogee; Handel, writing slow movements only comparable to those to be followed later by Beethoven.

Lovely little dialogued phrases were in that concerto, and right here may we pay respects to the concert-meister for his playing in this work and later in the tone poem. Whoever he is he's an exceptional man.

One doubts if there is a finer French interpreter than Serge Koussevitzky. Certainly he has feeling for Debussy and as often as "Two Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fetes" have been played here, we don't remember finer mutations, nuances, half-whispers than Dr. Koussevitzky gave "Clouds." As for "Fetes," it went pounding along like a glorious French band—and if you have ever heard a French band come tramping up the boulevard you know exactly the flare-blare rhythm.

Then came Maurice Ravel's "Suicide in Costume," the impressionistic "La Valse," choregraphic poem, and the same being the birth of the waltz, the birth of all waltzes—and the period of gestation was terrific.

What shall be said for this? It was another "Bolero," this time a Viennese valze, rambling along to a smashing climax. It was devilishly clever in working out, highly spiced, ornamentated with all kinds of instrumental devices, and the whole working itself up into a white heat and boiling over; Waldteufel sung by 105 men. Johann Strauss as he has never been played—and what of it?

"Life of a Hero."

No symphony. Instead, Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," the same being his most impressive tone poem, "Life of a Hero."

Now we will probably run afoul of the people cursed with kultur rabies, and we will be branded an Anglophobe, but the scenario of "Ein Heldenleben" is positively childish. It is nothing but grandiose balderdash and proves the absolute futility of trying to set metaphysics to music. However, that's another story and takes some space to prove.

That Strauss gave the tone poem all of his craft we have heard many a time and oft, and that in its way it is a masterpiece, we all know. All solo bits were marvelously encompassed, and if you could stand the scenario, it was a glorious finale.

Let's have Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony back next year; they start the season in fitting fashion.

SOCIETY

—PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1931—

Brilliant Audience Attends Opening Symyhony Concert

A BRILLIANT assemblage gathered at the Mosque last evening to enjoy the delightful program offered by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first symphony concert of the season.

Noted entering the Mosque were Mr. and Mrs. B. R. B. Townsend, the latter wearing a gown of American beauty chiffon, and Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Harden Church, Mrs. William McClay Hall was in her box, wearing black velvet with shoulder boquet of gardenias. Noted also were Mr. and Mrs. William J. Holland, Mrs. William Thaw and Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., who wore a black chiffon gown with rhinestone shoulder straps. Mrs. George E. Tener, was in her box, in red velvet gown, with Mrs. Kinley Tener, in black and white.

During the intermission a number of the younger members of society were chatting in the foyer. Miss Caroline Mitchell was there in black velvet with short white velvet wrap. Miss La Salle Dorrance was there in pale blue satin with short white fur wrap. Seen also were Miss Ruth Willock in black chiffon, and her sister, Miss Virginia Willock, wore black lace. Also noted were Miss Rosamound Fitch in flowered chiffon, Miss Bertha Brooks in black with short white fur wrap, and her mother, Mrs. J. Twing Brooks in blue lace with silver cloth wrap. Miss Mary Magee was there in black lace, and Miss Dorothy Slack in black satin with black velvet wrap.

Mrs. Henry C. Bughman was there in Persian purple velvet and Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard was with her daughter, Mrs. Thomas A. Robinson, who was in black velvet.

Seen also were Mrs. Chester Van Kleeck in brown lace, with Mrs. John Joy Edson, Jr., in black lace with purple velvet wrap, and Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, in black velvet.

Mrs. Robert Keeney was in her box, wearing an old gold satin. Seen also were Mrs. Charles Dahlinger in cream chiffon, Mrs. John Freeman in black lace, Mrs. Charles Dickey, in blue chiffon, Mrs. E. M. House and Mrs. John L. McK. Yardley.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 31 1931

Symphony Attracts

The Boston Symphony, last night at Syria Mosque, opening the symphony series of the winter, attracted such a large, brilliant audience that one would never have suspected that there was a depression. And a most responsive audience it was, too.

Among the many I saw during intermission were Wilhelmina Balken, in delphinium blue chiffon, and George Pearson in black lace. In a group nearby I saw Mrs. T. Clifton Jenkins and her daughter, Elizabeth, in orange crepe.

Nancy Brown was there, and Jane Sloan, and Mrs. Arthur P. Woolfolk, wearing a petunia crepe gown. Rosamound Fitch was there and Florence Carroll.

Among those I noticed in boxes were Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson in blue lace, brocaded chiffon, Lydia Irish and Mrs. F. C. Irish.

Younger Set There

Marie Louise Bickford chose a black velvet frock with cap sleeves of beaded white chiffon and Har-lengthy plays give them a chance to come in late oftener and step on people's feet! . . . You owe Gloria's school two months' payment—$22 . . . Nothing else stirring, be a good boy—R. C.

AMUSEMENTS.

Shubert ALVIN Tonite 8:15 Matinee Today 2:15

deb of the season, ... velvet gown, over which she wore a brief jacket of white crepe having bands of mink at the flaring cuffs.

Virginia Willock I saw arriving, and Mrs. E. V. Babcock in black velvet and her daughter, Mrs. Gordon Fisher, Jr., in black satin.

Striking Costumes

The Samuel Harden Churches were there with Mrs. Church in black lace. Others I had a glimpse of were Mrs. George S. Baton, Margaret Brainard in scarlet crepe, La Salle Dorrance in white satin with the long flowing sleeves banded in mink. Her house guest, Ruth Seymour, of Nayatt, R. I., wore blue crepe.

I also noticed Mrs. William McClay Hall, the B. R. B. Town-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 31 1931

MUSIC
Boston Symphony Orchestra
SYRIA MOSQUE

PROGRAM

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, No. 12	Handel
Two Nocturnes Nuages; Fetes.	Debussy
La Valse	Ravel
Ein Heldenleben	Strauss

After an absence of a season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned last night to Syria Mosque to inaugurate the concerts of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. Unfortunately there were vacant seats. Every lover of good music should have been there to hear such excellent playing.

Mr. Lissfelt

Koussevitsky made a striking program. There was the Handel Concerto for his strings, the Debussy for his woodwinds, Ravel and Strauss for every player in the orchestra, and the ensemble for the director's own intellect. Beyond showing the fine quality of the Boston strings, Handel was dignified but not overwhelming. Debussy's nocturnes, on the other hand, had many a subtle touch, especially during "Fetes."

Only Richard Strauss has written a valse comparable to Ravel's, and that in the "Rosenkavalier." Both are fashioned in the same spirit, the orchestration in both is similar, but the character of the opera keeps Strauss' dance joyously vulgar, while Koussevitsky is too much the aristocrat to dance in the Prater. His was a feverish valse, but he kept it within the palace gates.

Never before have I heard such a tone in the opening motifs of the "Heldenleben." It was as if the hero could not burst the fetters that withheld him from his struggle with the world. There was a throb of impatience among the players until the music burst into its first full tone, and Koussevitsky planned it superbly. The violin solo was strikingly played, though more impassioned than on last hearing, at which time it was still more effective. This Strauss tone poem is only for the virtuoso orchestra; surely there is no better than the Boston Symphony.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
SAT. NIGHT

OCT 31 1931

The Boston Symphony.

HAD Wednesday evening's audience been commensurate with the magnificance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program, the walls of Masonic Auditorium would have given way and Cass Park would have been completely filled. Koussevitzky made a good impression on his last visit but this time he was positively regal and gave a peerless performance. He seemed to combine all of the virtues of the other "conducting aces" but with such a finely adjusted balance that he was dramatic without being sensational, scholarly but not academic, poetic but never saccharine and dignified without being wooden. His presentation of Ravel's La Valse has never been equaled in Detroit, while his Handel, Strauss and Debussy have never been surpassed. He is a great conductor and plays on an instrument that is still superb even though it has lost some of its prestige since the colorful Leopold placed himself on the American orchestral throne.—M. M. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WINNIPEG, CAN.
Manitoba Free Press

ts own symphony orchestra.

* * *

"I have changed my idea of modern music," says Koussevitsky, the eminent Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. "I think the period of experimentation is no more. During the past seven years I have devoted much of my time and energy to new compositions. Now our outlook is much clearer. A great number of works highly appreciated a few years ago have completely disappeared. I do not wish to say that we must not play new compositions, but it is necessary to appreciate what we must play and what we must not."

Symphonic Series Start At Mosque

Koussevitzky Brings Boston Orchestra, Fine Program.

By HARVEY GAUL.

Who cares whether banks fold up like autumn leaves, whether we're in a depression or not, the orchestra season has begun, and last night at the Mosque a large and representative audience was present to snap its fingers at the impending apple business.

And some of us sat spellbound when the brilliant Boston Symphony sung those pianissimo passages, and we were not breathless either from novelty of program (there was only one number new to these hilltops), but rather was it entirely due to Dr. Koussevitzky's reading and the supreme ability of the men.

That IS an orchestra, a truly noble organization, and having heard it last night one regrets that it has been two years since it was last here.

For effulgence of tone, great sumach-colored sonority, it is doubtful if you can surpass the Boston strings, and for brasses commend us to those gentlemen scattered along the back-drop—they were superb.

Handel to Strauss.

Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra, No. 12, opened the program, and sometimes Handel is dry and perfunctory, but last night in the larghetto and in the second largo, one heard cantabile in apogee; Handel, writing slow movements only comparable to those to be followed later by Beethoven.

Lovely little dialogued phrases were in that concerto, and right here may we pay respects to the concert-meister for his playing in this work and later in the tone poem. Whoever he is he's an exceptional man.

One doubts if there is a finer French interpreter than Serge Koussevitzky. Certainly he has feeling for Debussy and as often as "Two Nocturnes," "Nuages" and "Fetes" have been played here, we don't remember finer mutations, nuances, half-whispers than Dr. Koussevitzky gave "Clouds." As for "Fetes," it went pounding along like a glorious French band—and if you have ever heard a French band come tramping up the boulevard you know exactly the flare-blare rhythm.

Then came Maurice Ravel's "Suicide in Costume," the impressionistic "La Valse," choregraphic poem, and the same being the birth of the waltz, the birth of all waltzes—and the period of gestation was terrific.

What shall be said for this? It was another "Bolero," this time a Viennese valze, rambling along to a smashing climax. It was devilishly clever in working out, highly spiced, ornamentated with all kinds of instrumental devices, and the whole working itself up into a white heat and boiling over; Waldteufel sung by 105 men, Johann Strauss as he has never been played—and what of it?

"Life of a Hero."

No symphony. Instead, Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," the same being his most impressive tone poem, "Life of a Hero."

Now we will probably run afoul of the people cursed with kultur rabies, and we will be branded an Anglophobe, but the scenario of "Ein Heldenleben" is positively childish. It is nothing but grandiose balderdash and proves the absolute futility of trying to set metaphysics to music. However, that's another story and takes some space to prove.

That Strauss gave the tone poem all of his craft we have heard many a time and oft, and that in its way it is a masterpiece, we all know. All solo bits were marvelously encompassed, and if you could stand the scenario, it was a glorious finale.

Let's have Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony back next year; they start the season in fitting fashion.

Nov. 12 Jur Plays and P

5

Novel Numbers Made Ready at Symphony Hall

Three Unfamiliar Pieces on Dr. Koussevitzky's List, A New Violinist

EVERY item on the program for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday may have some mention in this weekly article about the new and the unusual. Best known of all is, of course, Brahms's Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra. In itself anything but novel, it brings to Symphony Hall a new violinist, Professor Adolf Busch of Berlin. Another number, Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome," is one of those worthy and interesting pieces, from lack of performance relatively unknown to Bostonians, which the searching conductor proposes to restore to the active repertory of the orchestra. Pick-Mangiagalli's "Carnival Scene," from his ballet, "Casanova in Venice," and Respighi's orchestral arrangement of five of Rakhmaninov's "Picture-Studies" are both entirely new.

Four Hands Round

Serge Rakhmaninov is known to the Symphony Concerts as composer of various concertos for piano; of a Symphony, last played in 1928; of the tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead"; Ottorino Respighi as composer and arranger of various works, all orchestrally brilliant, some even spectacular. The five "Picture-Studies" which Respighi has transcribed for orchestra are taken from two sets of Rakhmaninov's like-named piano-pieces, his Opus 33 and Opus 39. There are eight studies in Opus 33 and nine in Opus 39. Of the five pieces that Respighi has arranged, "The Sea and the Gulls" is Op. 39, No. 2; "The Fair," Op. 33, No. 7; "Funeral March," Op. 39, No. 7; "Red Riding Hood and the Wolf," Op. 39, No. 6; "March," Op. 39, No. 1. Rakhmaninov's seventeen piano-studies, in such editions as can be found hereabouts, are without titles. The origin of the names set above the five orchestral pieces is not made known.

Victor Belaiev, friend and patron of Russian musicians, and shrewd commentator upon their work, has this to say in the Musical Quarterly (1927) about Rakhmaninov as composer in the days when he wrote these studies: "Rakhmaninov's third period [from about Opus 30] is even more tragic than the second. The feeling with which it is impregnated might be described as tragedy raised to the nth power. At the same time it is a period of great artistic and harmonic achievements and of the working-out of a finished style of composition, grandiose and impressive in its massiveness and severity. Rakhmaninov's creative ideas are now moulded into huge monolithic blocks and even his smaller compositions, excepting perhaps the songs forming Opus 34, are grouped into series connected by some common idea, as, for instance, the "Etudes-Tableaux," Op. 33 and 39, and the songs Op. 38. Both sets of Studies may, indeed, be regarded as one, not only because their titles are similar, but also because they are bound together by a common conception. The composer himself connects them by transferring three Studies originally intended for Op. 33 to Op. 39.

"The 'Picture-Studies,' as the title indicates, prove to be something more than sketches. They are a series of psychological pictures, lying wholly on the new plane of the composer's thought, a plane which has some similarity with that of Medtner's harmonic language. All but three of the Studies are written in the minor." The pieces are all structurally simple. Usually a single contrasting section near the middle of a piece is the only foil to the music of its beginning and end. This graphic music has given Respighi ample opportunity for the exercise of his consummate orchestral skill:

I. "The Sea and the Gulls." Lento assai—3-4—A minor. Whoever named this piece, Rakhmaninov or Respighi, could not have found a title more aptly suggesting the music. Accompanimental figures proceed in gently undulating motion; the suggestion of the sea is obvious. A simple, sustained melodic figure now poises itself above these accompaniments, now darts swiftly and suddenly beneath them. Gulls soaring in air, diving swiftly into the water, could not have been more suggestively portrayed in music. Near the middle of the movement there is slightly more agitation. Shall we assume a more turbulent sea?

II. "The Fair." Allegro con fuoco—4-4—E-flat major. A brilliant and fiery piece of music. Its bold and displayful qualities undoubtedly suggested its title. It is full of the carnival spirit. Music almost martial in character alternates with brilliant figuration that might suggest the galloping of horses. Aggressive chord-progressions form the basis of the principal contrasting section.

III. "Funeral March," Lento (lugubre)—4-4—C minor. Belaiev wrote of this Study that it is in a "quintessentially sombre, funereal mood." Even without a title one must conceive this music funereally. Not once does the pervading gloom find, even momentarily, the relief of a major key. Rugged minor harmonies, and toward the end, hollow, mocking sonorities characterize it. It rises to the heights (or depths) of passion. But it never finds an instant of cheer. The rugged, march-like main theme is first interrupted by smooth intriguingly rhythmed chord-successions, always keeping the sombre mood. The next interruption is a suave melody for 'cellos and horns. This is developed and expanded to a vibrant climax. At last, as it subsides, there is suggestion of the music of the beginning.

IV. "Red Riding Hood and the Wolf." Allegro—3-4—C major. The suggestion is again as apt as it is obvious. After a few rushing, introductory measures, the picture opens with rapid "leggiero" figures. There follows an ominous middle section. Then there is sudden return to the "leggiero" music with a final climax that suggests both the preceding.

V. "March." Allegro moderato—4-4—D major. There are clanging, martial rhythms interrupted by displayful passages. The contrast is a quieter music with subtler, more insinuating rhythms. Return to the brilliant music of the beginning concludes the march.

Around Casanova

Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli, half-Czech, half Italian, was introduced to the Symphony Concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky, with a Prelude and Fugue, in the fall of 1929. His "Casanova in Venice" is a ballet in eight scenes produced at La Scala in April, 1929. Writing of the performance in the London Morning Post, Mr. Francis Toye judged it "really good ballet music. Indeed the score is about as attractive and well made as possible, piquant without being vulgar, delicate without being feeble."

Casanova was born at Venice in 1725. Various dates are given for his death. Chambers's Biographical Dictionary says of him that "at twenty-five he had been an abbé, secretary to Cardinal Aquaviva, ensign and violinist. . . . His irregularities drove him from Venice". Returning in 1755, he was quickly condemned to prison for five years, but made a noted escape after fifteen months. Thereafter he lived a roving life. "Everywhere he was introduced to the best society, and always had to 'vanish' after a brief period of felicity". Among his high-born dupes were Frederick the Great and Madame Pompadour. His voluminous memoirs are famous. Of them Chambers writes, "His clever, cynical 'Mémoires écrits par lui-même' are unmatched as a self-revelation of scoundrelism."

Details of the scenario for Pick-Mangiagalli's eight danced episodes are not known hereabouts. The excerpt to be played as concert-piece is entitled simply "Carnival Scene". In this form it was first performed at the Sala del Conservatorio at Milan, February 6, 1931, A. Toni conducting. The music consists of a forlane (lively Venetian dance in 6-8 meter) and a waltz. Both move with exceeding swiftness. The scoring is deft, the harmonies modern. The carnival spirit is made as vividly real as in Berlioz's celebrated overture.

Re-enter Salome

Florent Schmitt's music of Salome has not been heard at these concerts since the fall of 1919. Its first (and only other) performance was in 1913 under Dr. Muck. It was written in 1907 and was danced b Miss Loïe Fuller at the Théatre des Art the same year. Subsequently it passe into the repertory of Diaghilev's troup remains still in the repertory of th Opéra at Paris. This "Tragedy Salome" has nothing to do wit Wilde's play, dear to Strauss, bu follows a poem of Robert d'Humière Professor E. B. Hill, in his "Mode French Music" has an admirable co densation of d'Humiéres's scenario, co bined with occasional references to th music:

"A prelude outlines the mood of th work. The scene is a terrace outsi Herod's palace overlooking the Dead Se The mountains of Moab frame the ho zon. It is sunset. Soon torches illumi the scene. Herodias examines a coffer jewels. Salome is fascinated by them a sketches the dance of pearls. The seco part begins with the enchantments on th sea. Herod is enveloped by darkness, prey to thoughts of debauchery and fea Herodias watches him. Mysterious ligh arise from the accursed sea. Fragmen of chants heard during orgies, strangl by the rain of bitumen and ashes on th terraces of Sodom and Gomorrah, breat forth confusedly. Snatches of dance sighs and a wild laugh are heard. A voi mounts from the abyss. Herod, subj gated, listens. Vapors rise from the se vague forms are outlined. A distant pe of thunder rolls.

"Salome dances amidst the flashes of lightning. She tempts Herod. He pursues her and tears off her veils. John the Baptist appears and covers Salome with his anchorite's mantle. Herodias interprets Herod's fury, and by a gesture delivers John to the executioner. He soon reappears with John's head upon a bronze charger. Salome, triumphant, possesses herself of the trophy, and begins a dance. Then, suddenly disquieted, she rushes to the edge of the terrace and hurls the charger into the sea. It turns blood-red. Herod, Herodias and the executioner are struck dumb with terror. Salome faints. When she recovers she sees the apparition of John's head, now in one place now in another; at last it multiplies on all sides. Salome begins the dance of terror. The storm bursts. Sulphurous clouds roll up the precipice. Whirling gusts of sand come from the desert. The tall cypresses rock and crash. Mount Nebo bursts into flames. The palace walls give way and crush Salome.

This ballet, in concert version, yields these numbers: I. Prelude; Dance of Pearls: II. Prelude; Enchantments on the Sea; Dance of the Lightnings; Dance of Terror. There exists another version, the score of which is labelled "choreographic," which outlines an entirely different sequence of events and sets different titles over the several numbers. The first part includes (1) Prelude, (2) Song from Aica, on the shores of the Dead Sea. (3) Dance of Terror, (4) Dance of Blood. The Song from Aica is included under Enchantments on the Sea in the orchestral version; the Dance of Terror of this choreographic version is the Dance of Lightnings; the Dance of Blood repeats the Dance of Terror. The second part comprises: (5) Appearance of Salome; (6) Dance of Seduction; (7) Dance of Triumph. The Dance of Seduction does not appear in the orchestral version and the Dance of Triumph is the music of the Dance of Pearls.

Schmitt has clothed this French working of the Salome material with a music vivid, exotic, graphic. He has produced a piece highly imaginative, exuberantly dramatic. When he wrote Stravinsky had not yet penned his "Firebird"; Debussy's star was still in the ascendant. But unlike the tenuous, delicate music of Debussy, that of Schmitt is robust, sonorous, full-grained. He is a musician of constructive ability rather than of impressionistic vaporings. The "Tragedy of Salome" is still Florent Schmitt's masterpiece.

A. H. M.

Neglected Ludwig

There are letters to hand concerning the Symphony Concerts. One, from a "justly indignant matron tempered by as much good humor as she can muster," roundly declares that "in all her experience of the Symphony Concerts, which is extensive, five pairs have not hitherto passed without the inclusion of one or more of Beethoven's immortal works. Yet this fall, it is only Brahms and Brahms and Brahms." This department has neither time nor energy to match itself with the good lady at statistical inquiry. It takes her at her word; is disposed to agree with her when she cries for respite from Brahms's Violin Concerto, to be played tomorrow and Saturday for the third and the fourth time within eight months. It can also soothe her indignation with the news that half of the sixth pair of concerts, on Nov. 27 and 28, will fall to the perennial Ludwig, twenty-four hours after her Thanksgiving Day. Taking leave, it even dares to hint that he, as well as audiences, is none the worse for the present hiatus. For players and for hearers, there is such a thing as Beethoven in routine.

Changed Times, Changed Ears

The other letter craves sympathy rather than looses impatience. The correspondent listened intently last Saturday evening to Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," music that he has long enjoyed. For the first time, as he puts it, he "found it too much of a good thing." In his ears, it now sounded "over-written, over-colored, over-thick, over-sensuous, like a too rich pudding of which one has foolishly taken a second helping." There were repetitious spots (he insists) and monotonous pages.

At supper after the concert, others, to his surprise, confessed to the same impression, but they were all harshly chidden by one of the venerable sages who would give the law to music in this town. He bade them rejoice "in a superb music superbly played" and that sort of thing. Doing an errand of mercy, this department suggests to its friend that the musical times change and ears change with them; that much music of the luxuriant and romantical eighties and nineties now sounds the worse for the wear of the years; that the spare, sinewy, "cerebral," moderns have made inroads upon it; that as for Rimsky-Korsakov after Sibelius in one and the same concert, the less said the better—now that Finland is no longer Russian dependency.

New Music by Bax for Symphony Hall

Nov 13

WRITES Herbert Hughes in the London Daily Telegraph: "Arnold Bax has long been attracted by the bardic literature of Celts and Scandinavians, and it is not surprising to discover that his new work should have something of the qualities of Nordic saga. 'Winter Legends' is the title, a sinfonia concertante in three movements for piano and orchestra. It is dedicated to Miss Harriet Cohen, who will be pianist when it is produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky's bâton, at Boston in the middle of December.

"I have just been privileged to make acquaintance with the new work, with the composer translating the orchestral parts to one piano and Miss Cohen as executant at another. Strenuous, concise, intensely expressive, rather grim music—this is my first impression of a composition which will, I feel sure, add much to the reputation of the composer at home and abroad. Its first European performance is due at a broadcast concert by the B. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in February next.

"Like more than one imaginative composer of our own time, Mr. Bax repudiates any hint of a 'program.' According to him, 'Winter Legends' must be regarded as pure music, abstract and unliterary. Yet in spite of his specific denial of any romantic or narrative implications, in spite also of all one misses of orchestral color and dynamic force in a piano-version, the music expresses a mental and spiritual experience (and in that sense is narrative) as clearly as any written or spoken legend.

"So distinctive in character and so sharply contrasted are the themes—there are at least four in the first movement—that one is impelled to regard the work as essentially romantic; romantic, however, with the minimum of sentiment and with nothing at all of love-lornness. In the slow second movement, for example, a gentle first subject gives way to a theme which the composer himself refers to as pagan. And the last movement begins with one he calls 'bardic' in character. It requires little stretch of a picturesque imagination to regard the ultimate development and climax of the big theme in the finale as the frenzy of a Berserker. . . . Listeners will always be found to put their own interpretation on the most abstract and formal music. But whether abstract or narrative, I have no doubt in my own mind that in 'Winter Legends' Bax has written a work of mastery."

Concert-Chronicle

Clearing the Air

The correspondent in Boston of the Musical Leader, published at Chicago, lately interviewed Dr. Koussevitzky and drew from him these sayings about his zeal for music of our immediate time: "My interest in modern music springs primarily from one of the essential reasons for our present civilization. That of Youth! No art without such a force is worthy of the name.

"I hold no brief for those 'modernists' whose work I cannot find serious enough to bring to a first hearing. I must feel the reason for the existence of a work before I can begin its study. Then I attempt to communicate this to my orchestra, because every one of my men must understand it, too, in order to give the composer the benefit of whatever doubt might exist. Then comes my final and, as it always proves, my most difficult task, my first performance before an audience which, in many cases, is often prejudiced in advance, discounting at once the idea of a composer's hard work or the effort and energy which goes into the preparatory work before the actual audition.

"If I am successful in getting the composer's idea over to even a tithe of the audience I am happy; because then I know that all the work is not in vain and the musician's greatest hope: that his inspiration, in terms of music, shall enter into the consciousness of others, has been realized. In a similar manner if I find that this minimum does not exist, I discard the music once and for always. I should like my Boston public to understand this so that their future appraisal of some of the new works may be a shade more yielding than in the past. I am pleased to have the opportunity of presenting this to you for the first time."

Ourselves and Others

In Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky sets this program for the Symphony Concerts today and tomorrow:

Five Picture-Studies .... Rakhmaninov
(Scored for orchestra by Respighi)
Tone-Poem, "Salome's Tragedy"....... Schmitt
Concerto in D major for Violin with Orchestra .... Brahms
(Violinist: A. Busch)
Carnival Scene from the Ballet, "Casanova in Venice" .... Pick-Mangiagalli

In New York, Mr. Kleiber and the Philharmonic Society are playing:

Overture to the Oratorio, "Esther"..... Handel
"Love-Scene" and "Fête at Capulet's" from the Dramatic Symphony, "Roméo and Juliet" .... Berlioz Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Beethoven

In Philadelphia, Fritz Reiner takes over Mr. Stokowski's orchestra with this program:

Overture, Leonora, No. 3.......... Beethoven
Symphony in G minor................ Mozart
Little Overture to the Opera, "The Fan" Toch
Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin"...... Ravel
Tune-Poem, "Night Ride and Sunrise" Sibelius

In Chicago, Mr. Stock has chosen these pieces, with Jacques Gordon, formerly concert-master of the orchestra, for assisting violinist:

Overture to the Opera, "Suzanne's Secret" Wolf-Ferrari
Concerto for Violin.................... Nardini Symphony, No. 2, in A major.......... Mason
Concerto for Violin.................. Whithorne Hungarian Dances (Nos. 17 to 21)...... Brahms

Incidents and Prospects

A correspondent again sends a letter that asks a word. He suggests that in addition to the annual performance at the Symphony Concerts of at least one Symphony by Sibelius, two or three of the composer's [illegible] repertory, where such short and graphic pieces are few. He names, with reason, "The Swan of Tuonela;" "A Saga;" 'Night Ride and Sunrise." Except the

Continued on Following Page

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

'Swan," at a single pair of concerts in 1927, none has been heard at Symphony Hall since Dr. Muck's time.

Manhattan's respite from Mahler draws to an end. For the while, Dr. Koussevitzky has taken up the apostolate that Mr. Mengelberg, giving way to Mr. Toscanini, laid down. Next Thursday evening Mahler's Ninth Symphony, thrice heard at home this autumn, will fill half the first concert, for the new season, of the Boston Orchestra in New York. Harold Morris's new Piano-Concerto will be heard at the Saturday matinée.

The four concert-pieces that George Copeland, the pianist,, has edited out of his current repertory may be had at the music-shops as published by Messrs. Riker, Brown & Wellington. They comprise a Corrente and a Saraband from Corelli; the Adagio from Grazioli, played many times in Boston; the anonymous 'España Cani."

Trans Nov 14

Symphony Concert --- The

Violinist, Conductor, And Brahms

His Concerto Notably Played, New Stuff Variously, Schmitt at Full

It was best—the program considered—to seek the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon with an open mind and not too much expectation. . . . Contrary to anticipation Brahms's Violin-Concerto, and the playing of it, proved the event of the day. Some of us were saying in our hearts that of late it had been heard too often at Symphony Hall; that it would sound the better for a season or two of retirement, even though an inferior music replaced it. Those that like to count figures had further reported it as played at three pairs of Symphony Concerts within the past three years. By that repetition, as the event proved, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have attained to a unified, proportioned, comprehensive, significant performance unusual to hear. Not a detail of the symphonic web—for the piece is a symphony, less the scherzo, for orchestra and violin rather than a virtuoso's concerto—now escapes them. Each under-voice sounds clear and truly measured. Every shading falls into place. Between the wind choir and the solo-instrument there are euphonies that woo the ear; while hereabouts no conductor of concertos has been more sensitive and even-handed than Dr. Koussevitzky in the adjustment of the orchestral with the solo-part.

All this is accomplished with no thinning of the full outline, no cooling of the pervading warmth, no weakening of the recurring vigors. By this time, after Thibaud, Heifetz and now Busch, the academic Brahmsites must have relaxed their notion that here is an austere rather than a romantical music. The freedom of the beginning; the rhapsodic note in the pages of figuration and "passage-work"—as they were played on Friday; the gathering and re-gathering of propulsive energy after musing mood, are all, through the first movement, of the warm, romantic Brahms In the slow movement, as the German saying goes, he puts his music into the cradle. The orchestra, with the oboe leading, sings a song of simple sentiment; with it draws near to simple beauty; while around it the solo-violin weaves again gentle figures and glamorous filigree. The lyrical Brahms, to be followed in the finale by the skillful, effective, humorsome Brahms, nothing loth to occasional shakings of the Hungarian pepper-pot. Through the whole Concerto, it is the conductor's obligation to keep in balance the composer's energies and musings, freedoms and precisions, ingenuities and rhapsodies—to blend and measure strength and sweetness, both inherent in the music. Dr. Koussevitzky, and an orchestra at one with him, now fulfill this obligation with equal insight and justice. The listeners hear Brahms of the Violin-Concerto, and hear him whole.

To this outcome, the violinist, Mr. Adolf Busch of Berlin, making a first appearance on this side of the Atlantic, materially contributed. Some part of the audience must have known his high reputation won in Europe. Seldom has a newcomer been more warmly welcomed at the matinée. Perhaps this reception reassured Mr. Busch. Perhaps, as his sturdy figure, serious face, quiet pose and freedom from every "expressional" mannerism suggested, he is no prey to the nervousness besetting many a débutant at these concerts; among violinists nearly wrecking, once upon a time, the illustrious Ysaye. He is, moreover, an understanding, unselfish musician, respecting the art that he serves. Like everyone else, he perceived Dr. Koussevitzky's share in the performance of the Concerto; when the audience had thrice recalled him, insisted upon the conductor's appearance at his side; remembered also the grateful congratulations to the orchestra. Telegrams to Berlin will have more reasons than one to call the occasion an auspicious début.

Mr. Busch's playing of the violin-part—for he must forgive Americans their distaste in print for his honorable German title of professor—was distinguished, in the first movement, by rhythmic verve in his opening measures and at the staccato return of the second theme; by the rhapsodic warmth and freedom, rare to hear, with which he invested figures and "passage-work"; by the breadth and boldness with which he proclaimed the right of the re-entering violin to take possession of the melody, muse and improvise upon it; by the fine, keen energy with which he released the cadenza toward the end. In the slow movement he renewed, with a lighter hand, the rhapsodic mood, while the solo-instrument weaves figures about the orchestral melody. Adding musicianly poise to German instinct for this cradling Brahms, he checked sentiment, which the music asks, before it became sentimentality. He softened tone, but did not smear it. So to the last measures lent the quiet beauty implicit in them.

In the finale Mr. Busch was all for the impetuous Brahms, incisive of rhythm, high in humor. Like the conductor, he was fortunate throughout in measured blending of the strength and sweetness of the Concerto; in the golden mean of a tone that was neither too sensuous and silken nor too dry, cold, austere. At every turn his rhythm was vitalizing. A personal quality most appeared in the rhapsodic mood and the finely-tempered hand with which he played the figure-work of the first and the second movement. In recent years, nearly every performance of Brahms's Violin-Concerto at Symphony Hall has been memorable for some individual distinction that the violinist—say Thibaud or Heifetz—lent it. Mr. Busch's takes place beside theirs.

A novel number began and ended the concert. To conclude, Dr. Koussevitzky set a fragment from the "Casanova" ballet of the Czech-Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, slightly adapted from the stage of La Scala to Bostonian and other concert-halls. It opens and closes with high-colored, tumultuous tone-picturing of a Venetian "Carnival Scene," rhythmically hard-driven, orchestrally flamboyant. Between, a lively-paced, gay-humored folk-dance, the furlana. For contrast a slower, more sensuous waltz. (What was it doing, except by stage-license in Casanova's eighteenth-century Venice?) First, last and all the way, music of a virtuoso-composer for a virtuoso-conductor and a virtuoso-orchestra. Once in so often he must make it and they play it—or perish under suffocation of a natural and acquired instinct. An audience, accustomed to these virtuosities; unhappy without them also once in so often, hears them gladly.

At the other end of the program, and more questionably, the arrangements for orchestra worked by Respighi upon five of Rakhmaninov's "Picture-Studies" for piano. By the evidence of their presence and their works, as Bostonians have known them at Symphony Hall, the Italian is of one temperament and imagination; the Russian of another. In the transcriptions, already described in this place, the external exuberance of Respighi rather than the inner brooding of Rakhmaninov is usually uppermost. In fact in the casual encounter of a first performance, there was no more than a pennyworth of the Russian's bread and salt to an infinite deal of the Italian's heady wine. The Respighi of graphic rhythms was heard in "Sea and Gulls"; of sharp-set orchestral tumults in "The Fair"; of plangent sonorities in the Funeral Music"; of astute and suggestive ingenuities in "Red Riding Hood and the Wolf"—what strange company they keep nowadays: of tramping rhythms, thundered out, in the final "March."

Along the way the Respighi of the Roman tone-poems was occasionally audible; while always the Respighi of exhaustless orchestral resource and adroit arranging skill was in presence. Often, however, he has deployed remarkable insight into the composer and the music transcribed, as in his arrangements of ancient dances or in his orchestral version of Bach's Passacaglia for organ, which we in Boston might well hear. But in this newest venture, Rakhmaninov is rather far to seek. In imagination this and that hearer recalled him bending over the piano and playing these "Picture-Studies" in a mingling of grandiose virtuosity and somber fantasy that waived away programmatic titles and graphic effects. With endless care and pains Dr. Koussevitzky, and his men with him, made the most of Respighi's orchestral artifice and flamboyance.

These are the latter and not too fortunate days of Florent Schmitt, composer of music. In his own Paris his pieces are now seldom heard. There, perforce, he must ply the trade of reviewer of concerts for a newspaper. "Down there," as the French amiably designate all that considerable world so unlucky as not to be part, or dependency, of France, his name seldom appears on programs. The more the credit to the sympathetic Koussevitzky for the present revival of Schmitt's masterpiece, the music that he set, twenty years ago, to a poem of d'Humières, "Salome's Tragedy"; that ultimately emerged as mimodrama for Diaghilev and the Opéra and as Suite for the concert-hall. (Dr. Koussevitzky played it as Suite with a range between Parts I and II that puzzled most listeners. Were it not better to take it as continuous tone-poem, section after section, with only the slightest halt?)

In these nineteen-thirties Schmitt's music is a rent masterpiece. There are pages that now sound, loud and hollow; pages as well that overdo graphic imagery and dramatizing impact until they defeat themselves. Yet as many more charged with acrid sensuality, macabre fantasy, ominous bodement, a veritable savagery of lust and triumph, dread and misery, rare in music and still intensively expressed. There was one tour de force in Schmitt, this "Salome's Tragedy." In Dr. Koussevitzky's performance it survived the inroads of time and fashion; the composer's voids and excesses.

H. T. P.

Watchful Waiting

Adolf Busch

The New Violinist of the Current Season, Who Played for the First Time in America at the Symphony Concert of Friday

---

Boston Symphony

Monitor Nov 14

Two novelties decorated the fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, played Nov. 13 in Symphony Hall, Boston: Five "Picture-Studies" by Rachmaninoff, arranged for orchestra by Respighi, and the "Scène Carnavalesque" from Pick-Mangiagalli's ballet, "Casanova in Venice." They were not the most important items on the list.

The more interesting of the two was the Rachmaninoff-Respighi collaboration, which consists of orchestrations of five of the pianist's "Tableaux-Etudes" from op. 33 and op. 39. None of the originals has a descriptive title, and it does not appear which of the composers labeled them, in their present form, "The Sea and the Gulls," "The Fair," "Funeral March," "Red Riding Hood and the Wolf" and "March." At all events, music and titles march well together, except that some of those Roman statues of Respighi's come to strident life in the cortège instead of in the final March. The instrumentation of course is brilliant. This was the first performance.

The Pick-Mangiagalli piece was marked "First time in the United States." To which one is tempted to reply, "What of it?" It is difficult to think why it should have been made part of a symphony program, unless Dr. Koussevitzky has decided to compete with Mr. Toscanini in producing fourth-rate Italian novelties.

Florent Schmitt's Suite, "The Tragedy of Salomé," unheard in Boston for a dozen years, was worth revival, in spite of its cinematic argument. It is true that the noisier passages fall less effectively upon the ear with the passage of the years, but there is unfaded beauty in the gentle measures that describe the stage setting, and in the music of the "Enchantments on the Sea." The performance was limpid and compelling.

Adolf Busch, playing for the first time in the United States, was soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto. This artist, whose high European reputation had preceded him, was received with acclaim. He displayed a finished technique, sound musicianship and an intellectual grasp of the concerto which was reinforced by a fiery execution. His tone is sweet rather than broad, and a tendency to rush his tempi in allegro passages rather obscured line and structure at times. One's final impression was that the violinist had revealed virtuosity rather than a profound penetration into the meditative heart of this great score.

L. A. S.

Herald Nov. 14

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Rachmaninoff, Five Picture-Studies orchestrated by Respighi: The Sea and the Gulls, The Fair, Funeral March, Red Riding Hood and the Wolf, March (first performance). Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome," suite (after a poem by d'Humieres). Brahms, concerto for violin (Adolf Busch, violinist; his first appearance in Boston). Pick-Mangiagalli, Scene Carnavalesque, from "Casanova in Venice" (first time in the United States.)

Otterino Respighi goes up and down the land like a raging lion, seeking what he may "arrange" and orchestrate. Whether the musical contents of these piano pieces by Rachmaninoff warrant the labor expended by the Italian is an open question. He reminds one of Mr. Wemmick: "Hello! Here's a piano piece—let's arrange it for orchestra." Rachmaninoff wrote two sets of piano pieces—nine in each set. Did Respighi orchestrate them all? Harrowing thought! Did he or the publisher give the fanciful subtitles which Rachmaninoff neglected to invent?

Now Respighi is a master of orchestration, and the chief attraction in the pieces performed yesterday is the skill he displays. The first, "The Sea and the Gulls," was worthy of this display; the music is picturesque, poetic, charming in every way; but the other four pieces have little inherent significance.

Perhaps if one heard the Russian pianist play them, one would hold another opinion. Take the "Funeral March," for example. The march was apparently halted more than once by traffic signals. There was no continuity of mourning; there was no overwhelming expression of grief. With all Mr. Respighi's skill, the march seemed labored, artificial. One could not help remembering the simplicity and the powerful effect of Handel's "Dead March in Saul," written in the key of C major, and, paradoxically, all the more mournful. How did Handel, choosing a key consecrated to jubilation, gain this effect? Probably the only answer is that he was a wonder-worker in music.

They think highly of Florent Schmitt in France. From what has been heard here of his music, this good report is inexplicable. Possibly the music for his "Salome" has greater dramatic force, a finer oriental flavor, compelling sensuousness, and a hair-raising expression of horror, when it is heard in the theatre, with stage settings, costumes and the sight of Salome with the series of dances that cost the Baptist his head; but this is doubtful, for this music, even when one tries to picture the scenes that it accompanies, lacks imagination. His Salome is not seductive; is not demoniacal; she is cerebral, nor does she, over-brained, not over-sexed, give way to hysteria and thus become an interesting apparition. One little piano piece, "The Passing Bell," played here when Miss Winifred Christie gave her first recital, has more emotional mystery and at the same time a more poignant effect than the elaborate compositions, the great "machines" by Schmitt that Bostonians have heard.

Pick-Mangiagalli's "Scene Carnavalesque" is another composition that, with its bustle and its din, is for the theatre stage. Here again there are pages ingeniously orchestrated, as those in which the good old air "The Carnival of Venice" is treated con amore. And after Schmitt's "Salome" and the arrangement of Rachmaninoff's piano pieces, what a pleasure it was to hear an honest tune!

Mr. Busch with the orchestra, led by Dr. Koussevitzky with his customary regard for soloist and composer, gave an excellent interpretation of Brahms's concerto. Too often the performance of this concerto is like the Hamlet of the young tragedian in "Great Expectations"—"massive and concrete." The reputation of the visitor is so established that technical proficiency, full and pure tone, intelligent and musical phrasing, a comprehension of the work as a whole, these were anticipated. Nor was the agreeable expectation deceived. For to the fine qualities was added warmth, a poetic feeling when the composer allowed it and put aside his gruff, surly, forbidding mask, to reveal himself a human being.

The violinist was recalled several times, so unmistakable was the appreciation by the audience of his performance. The audience was also greatly pleased by the attempt of Messrs. Rachmaninoff and Respighi to imitate the howling of a wolf. The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The next concerts will be on Nov. 27, 28. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct in the first half of the concerts Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus" and his Fourth Symphony. After the intermission Nicolai Tcherepnin will conduct his symphonic poem "The Enchanted Kingdom" (after a Russian tale), his "Ten Miniatures" (after a Russian illustrated alphabet), and his prelude "in memory of Rimsky-Korsakov." The prelude will be performed for the first time. Tcherepnin had already written a sinfonietta in memory of Rimsky-Korsakov.

55

SYMPHONY PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Schmitt's "Salome" Creates Deepest Impression

Nov 14 — Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon increased from two to four the number of novel pieces of the current season and offered in the person of Adolf Busch, eminent German violinist and director of the Berlin Hochschule, its second soloist.

SCHMITT'S BALLET

Almost a novelty, indeed, was yet another item on the programme, the suite made from Florent Schmitt's ballet, "The Tragedy of Salome," unheard here since 1919. In interest it outshone, at least for one listener, all else in the concert: Respighi's generally inappropriate orchestration of five of Rachmaninoff's none-too-important Etudes Tableaux for the pianoforte, the noisy and hollow "Carnival Scene" from Pick-Mangiagalli's ballet, "Casanova in Venice," and even the Violin Concerto of Brahms, heard over-frequently here of late years and yesterday given by Mr. Busch a thoroughly sound performance but one ungraced by any special virtues of tone, technique or interpretation. It should be added here that the audience received Mr. Busch with marked enthusiasm.

The poem of Robert d'Humieres that serves as basis for Schmitt's "mute drama" and that affords the clue to the orchestral suite is steeped in an atmosphere of unwholesomeness and of horror that is marvellously reflected in the music. Great as is the evocative power of this suite in the concert hall, its graphicness and potency in the theatre must be doubly great. So eloquent was yesterday's performance, however, that the music told well its own story without scenic aid.

The bulk of Florent Schmitt's music may not survive, but in his choral and orchestral setting of the Forty-Seventh Psalm and in "The Tragedy of Salome" he has produced two masterpieces. For a modern composer that is, after all, no small achievement.

If Dr. Koussevitzky was minded to honor his distinguished countryman, a performance of Rachmaninoff's long-neglected Second Symphony or of his "Island of the Dead" would have been more fitting than the playing of these showy transcriptions of Respighi in which the Italian's indulgence in his favorite orchestral tricks tends to efface the composer's personality. Only in the first of the five, which bears the title "The Sea and the Gulls," a title, like the others in the suite, presumably contributed by the transcriber since the piano-pieces are themselves titleless, was recognizably Rachmaninoffian.

Busch Debut Is Feature

Amer. Nov. 14

By MOSES SMITH

A remarkable program is offered for this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Adolph Busch, renowned German violinist and teacher, present master, indeed, of Yehudi Menuhin, in soloist in the Brahms concerto.

In yesterday's matinee performance, which constituted his American debut, Busch justified his reputation as one of the classical school, for his playing was marked by purity of tone and an almost Olympian calm. Many in the audience might have criticised his playing as "cold." But it was not so much the lack of "warmth" which disappointed this writer—for one can have his fill of hot-blooded playing—as it was that fine violinist as Busch is, he seemed, on one hearing at least, to be not so much head and shoulders above the herd as enthusiastic advance notices indicated.

As foil to this thrice-familiar music Mr. Koussevitzy devoted the remainder of his program to works with most of which the audience was unacquainted. Heading the list was an arrangement by Respighi of five of Rachmaninoff's "Etudes - Tableaux," ingenious and beautiful little piano poems.

A Camaval Scene from "Casanova in Venice," by Pick-Mangiagalli, was played for the first time in this country. It seemed to us to shed no new light on the character of the notorious cavalier, nor to be intrinsically fine music. It serves admirably, however, as a brilliant closing show-piece. Far more significant is Florent Schmitt's Suite drawn from his "Salome," not heard here in a dozen years.

56 MUSIC

Globe Nov 14

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new violinist of the first rank, in the familiar Brahms concerto, a revival of a notably original and impressive modern composition, and two insignificant new pieces diversified the program of yesterday's Symphony concert.

Adolf Busch, who played for the first time in Boston, and apparently for the first time in America, though the omniscient program book did not say so, has been heard of here chiefly as a teacher of violin. It was to him that Yehudi Menuhin was sent for those lessons in style and in virtuoso technique which even the most gifted of boy violinists must receive if a prodigy is to ripen into a master. But Mr Busch's playing yesterday had none of the academic coldness and dullness this renown as a pedagogue might have led one to expect. He is a first-rate musician, a remarkable violinist, and full of that mysterious inner fire one can only describe by the much-abused word temperament.

Adolf Busch Satisfies

Better playing than his in the Brahms concerto yesterday one has never heard. There were no excesses, no inaccuracies, no lapses of taste or of technique. Every melody was firmly and justly phrased, every rhythm keenly vital. So, one felt, Brahms would have wished his music to sound. And, in addition, there was a warmth and vigor of feeling by no means inherent in every measure of this concerto, put there by performer rather than composer. The orchestral accompaniment was a bit heavy handed, lacking in some of the classic perfections of the soloist's memorable performance. Mr Busch insisted on sharing the hearty applause with conductor and players.

Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," remembered from the days of Dr Muck as an impressively original tone poem, renewed that impression yesterday. Schmitt, unlike most present day French composers, belongs to no group. He has taken his own way, bodied forth in music his own dreams, using for their utterance idioms and instruments employed by others, but never imitating anyone. His Salome it not based on Wilde's play, but on a poem by Robert d'Humieres. In its original form it was a "mute drama," first performed in 1907 at Paris with Loie Fuller and Lou Tellegen in the cast.

Tired as we have most of us grown of the self-conscious "decadence" of the pre-war years, there is still something vital and compelling in Schmitt's music, though the words of Wilde and of d'Humieres now seem as false and as utterly artificial as those of say such "Gothic romances" as Walpole's "Castle of Otranto."

Sea Picture

The first performance anywhere of Respighi's arrangement of five of the piano pieces Rachmaninoff entitled merely "Etudes Tableaux," began the concert. There are titles for the pieces in the new orchestral version. "The Sea and the Gulls," "The Fair," "Funeral March," "Red Riding Hood and the Wolf," and "March," they are now called, presumably by Respighi. The sea picture might seem the most impressive of the lot did not one recall the opening of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," which paints that sort of picture far better. "Red Riding Hood and the Wolf" is a study of tonal contrasts of the sort better done by Ravel in the "Beauty and the Beast" section of his "Mother Goose." The instrumentation is skilful, but not dazzlingly brilliant. The piano pieces in their original form were effective enough, but they hardly demanded so much sound and fury.

Of the other novelty, a "Scene Carnavalesque" by Pick-Mangiagalli, taken from his ballet "Casanova in Venice," little need be said. It sounded to one hearer like a finale from a Winter Garden Show of about 1914. The composer, an Italian, has consistently adopted all the weak points of American popular music of 15 years back. If we are to listen to robust popular strains at the Symphony, let us have some up-to-date Gershwin in the original Broadway version, not such European "highbrow" ragtime as this.

P. R.

Nov. 16 '31 Trans.

--- The Scr

Keeping Up With Boston Concert-Halls

The Lack of Violin-Concertos, Bruce Simonds Enlarged, Programs to Hand

NEARLY everyone was agreed, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, upon the merit of Mr. Busch's playing of the violin-part in Brahms's Concerto; no less upon the version of the whole music as conductor and violinist accomplished it. Even with memories of Kreisler, Thibaud and Heifetz hanging in the air, it sounded, above them all, as the real thing that Brahms not only put to paper but also imagined as he wrote. Yet one and another who admired and applauded to the top of his bent, regretted that the violinists more and more confine themselves to Brahms and Beethoven. (Mr. Busch will play Beethoven's Concerto in New York when he appears there with the Philharmonic Society and Mr. Toscanini.)

Grant that Chaikovsky's is wearing threadbare; that only the rarest sympathy can save Mendelssohn's from tameness; that Saint-Saëns's sound as withered beaux look. But need Elgar's—with discerning cuts—stay always on the shelf; or Glazunov's go for "mere" virtuoso-piece when it is more to be desired than his symphonies; or Sibelius's—a masterpiece—pass for a music too grim to be often endured? Besides, there are always the ancients, Bach and Mozart; one modernist, Prokofiev, whose violin-concerto deserves more frequent doing; and within six weeks Stravinsky. "How they will hate it!" writes an amiable young modernist who heard the Concerto in Berlin. Before long Hindemith should also do the job—and a good one.

Adv Nov 15

Strauss at Last 'Accepted'

By Morris Hastings

A NOTED French painter has said that a classic is merely a revolutionary who has "been accepted."

This rather brilliant definition is seldom more pat than in the case of Richard Strauss, the contemporary German composer whose tone-poem, "A Hero's Life," brings the Boston Symphony's concert to a close a week from next Tuesday afternoon.

So completely have we come to "accept" Strauss that it seems incredible that a brief 30 years ago he was "the bad boy of music." And yet, such he was. His opera, "Salome," was banned from some stages; his "Electra" was howled down, and his tone-poem, "Tyl Eulenspiegel," was constantly referred to in program books as "this strange composition."

"Discords Mingled"

The times and musical standards have changed so swiftly that nowadays we seek relief in Strauss' scores from the turmoil of modern life and sound. There are pages in his works which still excite rather than soothe us, which amuse rather than cajole us. But shock us?—Never!

"A Hero's Life" sums up the composer's life and philosophy. It also contains the best and the worst of his writing.

Richard Strauss is, of course, the hero of his own tone-poem. In this music we hear him setting out into the world with athletic stride, we hear the cacophonous cackling of his enemies—said to be the music critics. A heroine, described by the first violin, skittishly sidles up to him. There follow impassioned pages of love-making. These are interrupted by the insistent call to battle of the venemous and picayune critics, over whom the hero gloriously triumphs.

His victory won, Strauss sets about the world with a message of peace. The world is cold; the hero, highly indignant, retires from it and settles down to a noble and contemplative old age. He dies, and the brasses of the orchestra deliver a sublime eulogy over his grave.

Continued on Page 10, Column 4

Strauss Is 'Explained'

Continued From Page 8

At its worst—and Dr. Koussevitzky's compelling interpretations makes the adjective sound carping—the music is vain, overly repetitious and rather cheap.

At its best, "A Hero's Life" is sumptuous stuff—Strauss is a master of the orchestra. In its splendid final pages it achieves a grandeur and beauty which is excelled only by the greatest pages of the greatest masters.

Strauss is most fondly esteemed as an orchestral composer. He has, nevertheless, written some excellent songs. Rose Zulalian will sing some of the best of them at her Symphony Hall recital this afternoon.

A composer of significance, this Strauss, in spite of the vulgarity that glitters in many of his pages. He well deserves the phrase bestowed on him by an admiring critic: "One of the big boys."

---

een

Nov. 17 Trans.

Our American Orchestras in Brief Survey

An English Visitor to Boston, Philadelphia and New York Records Impressions

ORGANIZATION is the ruling passion of our time. The truth of this [writes Basil Maine in the London Morning Post] is manifest in every sphere of activity, in politics (of course), in religion (even), in sport, in commerce (for all its apparent chaos), in book-publishing, in play-production, in music-making, and so on. In the sphere of music-making the passion is revealed at its most intense degree in the quest for perfection in orchestral playing.

It is only of late that we in England have started out on this adventure. It was necessary for us to be visited by orchestras from Berlin, Vienna and New York before we began to realize that orchestral playing was something more serious than a jolly game of sight-reading by a number of old hands who sometimes turned up on the night, and at other times sent deputies so that they could go and help in another little game in another parish-hall.

Even then, after we had been shown how serious a matter an orchestral concert can be, there were many who were not inclined to forsake the happy-go-lucky concerts of the old kind for the intensive culture of the new. Many are still disinclined. They prefer to be ordinary listeners at amateurish concerts rather than eager analysts of music which has first of all been masticated for them by a dozen M. A.'s (Masters of Appreciation), and afterwards is played by a slick and shiny machine of an orchestra.

But I must be careful not to embark here upon a thesis lest I find that I have no space in which to prove my point. (In any case, my real point has not yet emerged, has only been suggested. Another time, then.) My present purpose is to record recent experiences of music-making in a country where organization is not so much a passion as an axiom.

Just over three weeks ago, through the courtesy of the various managers, I was the guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Philharmonic Society of New York, each in its own city and on successive days. Both in America and on my return to England I have been repeatedly asked to give my impression of the three orchestras, to compare them, giving reasons, as the examination-papers say, for my preference. And always I have answered that it is almost impossible to give preference to one orchestra above the other two.

For one thing, the three attainments are so alike in quality and degree that it would be necessary to indulge in technical hair-splitting in order to differentiate—an obnoxious and dull occupation both for writer and reader. For another thing, a final judgment based on a single program by each orchestra, with each program entirely different from the others, would be valueless, not to say unjust. Moreover, my arrival in America coincided with the opening of the concert-season. The baseball teams had become fixed units; all summer long a rigid organization had been working towards that end. But in October the orchestras had yet to play themselves in.

I forbear, therefore, to rush in where many a devil has dared to tread, and will concentrate upon mere impressions, heedless of Ernest Newman's recent anathematizing of "personal reactions," I traveled from the Worcester (Mass.) Festival to Boston for the Symphony Concert there. Koussevitzky conducted. Decidedly he has impressed his personality upon that orchestra and made it his own. The players understood him to a demi-semi-quaver, understood his conceptions in themselves and in every detail.

It seemed to me that this was the more remarkable seeing that Koussevitzky's beat sometimes becomes a fanciful flourish; he is then difficult to follow. Of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloë" (the Second Suite) he gave a brilliant performance. In this the climax was overwhelming, yet with no danger of the composite whole splitting up into confusion. The Boston players never give you noise. Each tone is telling.

I was agreeably surprised by Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms's Fourth Symphony—surprised, because I had harbored an altogether different notion of his attitude toward Brahms. It was enlightening to compare the phrasing in the Symphony and in Franck's "Les Eolides." Not every conductor, not every great conductor, is always successful in appraising the subtle difference of quality between a typical phrase for strings in Brahms and in Franck.

The works on the program compelled one to attend to the excellence of some of the units of this orchestra, the first flute, (Mr. Laurent), for example, the first horn (Mr. Böttcher), and the first clarinet (Mr. Polatschek), who, I was told, recently went over from the Vienna Philharmonic. The glittering ensemble, however, in Ravel's Suite permitted no dwelling upon the merits of individuals. This was a brief moment of transfiguration. I experienced nothing like it at any other concert in America.

The Philadelphia concert left as vivid an impression, but of another kind. In the first place, the program was confined to music of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In the second place, Stokowski's attitude, whether towards music or orchestra or audience, is altogether unlike that of Koussevitzky. Many would defend the purist ideals of the Philadelphian conductor. Others, perhaps, would find them, and their various expressions, irritating.

His habit, for instance, of beginning a work almost before he has reached his desk, and of playing through each half of the program with no perceptible break between the works, may or may not be an eloquent plea for "music for music's sake." Certainly it is misleading for those who are beginning to form the habit of concert-attendance, especially when a Suite of six movements and another of five, are presented so that the ordinary listener mistakes them for a single Suite of eleven movements. But whatever Stokowski does is allowed to pass—at present. And, in any case, it would be a mistake to allow these considerations to stand in the way of full appreciation of the fine performances he directed in this uncompromising program.

Erich Kleiber conducted the New York Philharmonic concert. His straightforward methods revealed him to be a fine-thinking musician. He gave a reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony which was persuasive because of simplicity and utter sanity. There was no underlining (compare Furtwängler's exaggeration of the violas' phrases in the second movement), no distortion, no undue emphasis. The last movement was one of the most natural performances I have ever heard. Which proved (to return to my original point) that even an organization as complex as an orchestra, may lead a healthy and natural life; must do so if it wishes to keep alive its audience.

As Conductor Now as Well As Composer

Cherepnin, the Man and His Music, in Prospect at Symphony Hall

Trans. Nov 25

TO the Symphony Concerts of the week-end comes Nicolai Nicolaevitch Cherepnin, in the dual guise of composer and conductor. In this two-fold role the last half of the program has been allotted to him. In it he will conduct his "Enchanted Kingdom," an orchestral sketch after a Russian tale; his Miniatures for Orchestra, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet" of Benois; his prelude, "To the Memory of Rimsky-Korsakov."

Mr. Cherepnin as composer is not an entire newcomer to these concerts. A piano concerto of his was played in the autumn of 1922; a suite from his ballet, "Borodin," was heard only last spring. . . . Nicolai Cherepnin was born at St. Petersburg (now Leningrad) in 1873. He was destined by his parents for the law and was entered in that field of study at the University of St. Petersburg. In 1895, however, he came under the influence of Rimsky-Korsakov, and entered his classes at the Conservatory. The influence of this great teacher has undoubtedly been the chief single factor in determining the talented pupil's future. It was Rimsky who introduced Cherepnin to Belaiev, who in turn published his first works, who brought him into contact with other notable musicians, and who otherwise greatly befriended him.

All his life Mr. Cherepnin has been both conductor and composer. Within a year or two after he left the Conservatory (1898) he was appointed as one of the conductors of the Russian Symphony Concerts at St. Petersburg. By 1907 he was conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra and one of the conductors of the Marinsky Opera. He still recalls the strictness of the discipline there. The year 1908 saw him in Paris, conducting his master's "Snow-Maiden." From that time until the war he toured with Diaghilev's troupe as conductor of the orchestra. In 1918 he settled in Tiflis, Georgia, as director of the conservatory and as conductor. In his room at the Ritz on Monday he spoke warmly of the native music of this country—"both folk music and intellectual music," to use his own phrase. This music he relates, is entirely diatonic, in contrast to the music of Armenia, so near geographically. He spoke of a characteristic chord in this music as C-F-G, or C-D-G, instead of the usual Western triad in thirds. It is a music of which Western countries know next to nothing, and yet a music capable of firing the enthusiasm of so universal a musician as Nicolai Cherepnin.

It was probably his good fortune that in 1921 he found himself in Georgia rather than in Russia. The bolshevik Georgian Government readily gave him permission at that time, in recognition of valuable services rendered, to go to Paris. Such permission might have been less easy to secure from the Russian Government. Like all Russian musicians, he speaks feelingly of the "nationlization" of all his music by the Soviets—which principally means that the Russian Soviet Government has relieved him of the duty of receiving an income from Russian performances or sale of his works, preferring to perform that duty themselves. Since 1921 he has been active as conductor in all the principal musical capitals of Europe, and as composer with residence in Paris.

Though he has written in many forms, the forms that interest him most are the opera and the ballet. His conductorships have been chiefly in these fields. Among the first of his works to become widely known are the ballets, "Pavilion d'Armide" from the period shortly after emerging from Rimsky-Korsakov's tutelage, and "Narcisse," which begins to show his study of the French impressionists. There are also the ballets, "The Masque of Red Death" (after Poe), "Dionysus" and "Russian Fairy Tale." Asked if he had composed much since taking up his residence in Paris, Mr. Cherepnin was quick to reply in the affirmative. He mentioned first numerous "commissions," chiefly in the ballet form—for example, the mimodrama, "Cowardice," in collaboration with Bakst. "But the works which I have written entirely because of the inner urge to write are two operas." Their titles may be translated as "Marriage Broker" and "Being Poor Is Not a Vice." He speaks also of a still later opera, "Le Seneschal," in nine scenes, moving and changing with the swiftness of the scenes of the cinema. Nor must one forget his work in completing Musorgsky's "Fair at Sorochinski," last year's Metropolitan performance of which brought him for his first visit to this country.

The composer Cherepnin is an eclectic rather than an innovator. He has always kept abreast of the times. Says Leonid Sabaneyev of him in a paragraph in his "Modern Russian Composers": "N. Cherepnin belongs to the most striking figures of this world [the Rimsky-Korsakov-Glazunov group of Petrograd] . . . Cherepnin possesses a magnificent technic as composer and the ability to extract exquisite sonorities from the orchestra. He is not hostile to the most recent achievements in musical color. In his tone poem, "Enchanted Kingdom," he makes use of a palette which recalls not only his teacher, Rimsky-Korsakov, but also Ravel and Debussy, and the other new magicians of the orchestra. His beautiful and elegant, though not profound, talent may perhaps be characterised as 'external' and somewhat salonesque."

Montagu-Nathan, well-known writer upon all that pertains to Russian music, in his "Contemporary Russian Composers" goes farther when he finds that Cherepnin's style "contains instrumental characteristics associated with Chaikovsky and harmonic reminiscences of the French impressionists, of Strauss, and even of Schönberg, and rivals the boldness of Stravinsky." All of which is no more than to say that in the molding of a thoroughly eclectic style he has "lost no bet," but has weighed innovations wherever he found them, and has made frank and honest and effective use of such as suited his needs.

In subject matter Cherepnin has shown a decided interest in and a decided flair for things that come from Russian legend or out of Russian folk lore. Says Montagu-Nathan: "The musical path which he has cut for himself through the thick undergrowth of present-day Russian musical tendencies is apparently that which leads to a tonal presentment of these legends suitable for the modern ear. Seemingly Cherepnin's purpose is that of interpreting Russian legend to the outside world by means of music." In proof one cites in addition to titles already mentioned, many song settings of fairy tales, an orchestral sketch on the Fire-bird story, and among piano works six illustrations to Pushkin's "The Fisherman and the Fish." Montagu-Nathan concludes his essay on Cherepnin by saying, "If Cherepnin, as seems likely, intends to devote himself in the future to the popularization of the form adopted in the 'Fairy Tales' and 'The Alphabet' [to be heard in part this week], he will provide for us an opportunity of obtaining a deep insight into the Russian character through an easily accessible means. In thus occupying himself he should win an esteem more permanent than that brought by his ballets."

As was the case with his master Rimsky-Korsakov, so Cherepnin—his supreme accomplishment lies in the field of orchestration. The piano accompaniments to his songs, the piano pieces themselves, bear witness to the fact that his musical thinking is orchestral. Much of the piano music, for example, is scored on three, and occasionally even four, staves. While for the sake of securing just the exact orchestral effect he desires, he brings in foreign instruments as freely as the most futuristic modernist. "The Masque," to mention one instance, calls for mandolin, zither, gusli, metallophone in addition to the more usual orchestral instruments.

Much of Cherepnin's music is program music. The "Enchanted Kingdom," Opus 39, takes one into the legendary realms already known through Stravinsky's "Fire-bird." Here is the program: "King Katschei rests in his enchanted retreat; the little bells softly murmuring watch over his repose. Imperceptible breezes pass over and guard him. Nothing disturbs his sleep, nothing can break the charm; neither the groanings of the magic chords, nor the penetrating song, gentle and languishing, of his fair prisoner, 'the Fire-bird.' Night falls, 'the Black Horseman' passes the silent kingdom of Katschei. In the matchless peace of the soundless kingdom, one can scarcely hear the faint bells, the guardians passing, the winds, suspended good watchmen." In conversation the composer added: "It is the same tale that Stravinsky used. But where he treated the whole story, I was interested in only one moment of that story. The captured Fire-bird is always protected. How? By the little bells as they sway gently in the wind. These mysterious little guardians were what princially interested me." No wonder that commentators speak of "wonderful harmonic texture and exquisite orchestration, fresh, a little whimsical, but always expressive."

The miniatures of this week's program come from the composer's Opus 38, a set of fourteen piano pieces (in two books) intended as a musical representation of Benois's "Alphabet in Pictures." "The great painter Benois," says Mr. Cherepnin, "who was the scenic artist in Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Coq d'Or' and in my 'Pavilion d'Armide'—to mention only two —did these pictures entirely in jest. They greatly appealed to me, just as Hartman's pictures appealed to Musorgsky." He has set them in a manner partly com ly grotesque, always fittingly o Eight of them (instead of ten, as previously announced) will be played on Friday and Saturday:

1. Negrillon—A fantastic Negro boy appearing before a curtain at a fair.
2. Baba yaga—The evil witch flying through the air in a mortar.
3. General—Gorsonnet, leading battalions of tin soldiers in an assault upon a cardboard fortress.
4. Egypt—A caravan rests at the foot of a colossus.
5. Stars—Wise men in periwigs explaining the courses of the stars to some rich lords.
6. Mamam—The doll's' supper.
7. La Foret—Moonlight, a faun, dryads.
8. La Tsarine — The young tsarina with her followers solemnly coming forth from the palace.

Of the prelude in memory of his teacher Rimsky-Korsakov, the composer writes as follows. "In this commemorative prelude, I have introduced two themes of Rimsky-Korsakov,—the theme of Saint Fevronia and that of the holy bells, both from the legend of 'The Invisible City of Kitej' ". In a single work he does homage to his chief love, Russian legend, and to the master who has been so very strong a force in his life.

The other day he thus expressed himself about this prelude: "I did not want to leave this world without an expression of thanks to my revered master. A great man, whose life has been full of activity, of high noble deeds, departs from this earth. One delivers eulogistic orations in his honor. What does one recall in such orations? Surely the man's works. In this section I quote two themes from "The Invisible City of Kitej." They develop into a tremendous apotheosis. The bells of the bell theme become the bells of eternity. Something like this is my psychological program for the work.— And by the way, if I were asked to name the greatest of Rimsky-Korsakov's works. I would unhesitatingly say, his 'Invisible City'. It is so Russian. But perhaps it is too Russian for the Western world to enter fully into it."

It would be unfair to close this article without adding Mr. Cherepnin's enthusiastic words on Monday about the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "I have this morning had my first rehearsal with them. Having high expectations, I was prepared to have them read the notes with a startling accuracy. I did not expect that they would also, at first reading, observe every musical nuance, that they would make every pianissimo a real pianissimo, every legato a true, smooth legato. This is indeed cause for wonder. It tells more eloquently than words how good are the hands in which they find themselves."

A. H. M.

Not entirely unexpectedly the opening of the new musical piece, "Of Thee I Sing," which is to make its first appearance on any stage at the Shubert, has been postponed from Monday, Dec. 7, to Tuesday, Dec. 8.

At the Colonial the engagement of the "Follies," beginning Dec. 7, has been changed from one week to a fortnight.

MUSIC

Herald Nov. 25

TUESDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Yesterday afternoon, at the first of this season's series of Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky offered a program of music by the two Richards —Wagner and Strauss. The former was represented by the overture to "Tannhaeuser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and the Prelude and Libestod from "Tristan und Isolde," the latter by "Ein Heldenleben." The audience which filled Symphony hall greeted the conductor cordially at the beginning of the concert and gave every sign of enthusiastic appreciation of the quality of the performance.

Up to the intermission, at any rate, the program was one to make a ready appeal to the majority of listeners, for Wagner has long been a symphonic "best seller." The "Tannhaeuser" overture is undoubtedly one of the best known and most popular pieces in the repertoire. Dr. Koussevitzky is well fitted by temperament to perform it eloquently. The solemn Pilgrim Chorus, the rapturous and seductive music of the Venusberg, was played with all the orchestra's resources of tonal beauty and emotional suggestion. Pleasure as great was given by the "Lohengrin" prelude, with its marvelously ethereal opening and close, its pervading atmosphere of calm repose, the spiritual ecstasy of its climax. The overpowering human ecstasy and epic sadness of the "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod were effectively conveyed, though we have heard performances under Dr. Koussevitzky in which the music cast its spell more potently. This was true especially of the Liebestod, which even with the utmost perfection of rendition, almost never is as moving in the concert hall as in the theatre, where orchestra and audience alike have been attuned to the emotions of the moment by the preceding drama and the accompanying stage picture, and where the score is completed by the soaring beauty of Isolde's voice— usually absent from the concert version.

As to the beauty of the music that followed the intermission there may have been less unanimity in yesterday's audience, even though 32 years have elapsed and fashions have changed again since Strauss, in "Ein Heldenleben," so admirably portrayed himself and his activities, and so vitriolically depicted his enemies (if the popular interpretation of the work be correct). For there are longueurs for those whose attention is apt to wander, and, in the battle scene, acrid dissonances to distress the over-delicate; and for the critical musician, it cannot be denied, much of the thematic material is pretty trite. Yet the extraordinary virtuosity of its orchestration, the surpassing richness of its contrapuntal texture, the ingenuity displayed in the development and transformation of themes, the glamorous beauty of certain episodes, the brilliant energy of others, such incomparable tours de force as the diabolically clever caricatures of the hero's adversaries (Strauss's critics?), will long continue to give "Ein Heldenleben" a place in orchestral programs. Yesterday's performance (to which Mr. Burgin's exquisitely-played solo passages contributed much) was of unusual brilliance.

S. S.

AND GROUP

Monitor Music Nov 25

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first of its Tuesday afternoon series of concerts. The program comprised Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," Prelude to "Lohengrin" and Prelude und Liebstod from "Tristan und Isolde," and "Ein Heldenleben," by Richard Strauss.

In pursuance of his custom, Dr. Koussevitzky set upon this Tuesday program some of the older classics which his Tuesday patrons have come to consider their special prerogative. Although opinions might differ concerning the length of the program, which was somewhat long, no one could probably be found who would agree with his neighbor upon the precise spot where a cut might have been made, unless it were in the Strauss number.

With each succeeding symphonic performance of the Wagnerian overtures and preludes, it becomes increasingly evident that to be altogether satisfying, in themselves they must be divorced from the operas for which they were written. With an orchestra of the proportions of the Boston organization to play them, none may deny that the introductory measures to "Tannhäuser" or "Lohengrin" for instance, acquire additional interest, especially when heard sans the soft yet disquieting rustle of late-comers at the opera. Of the performance yesterday it is difficult to write in terms which have not been applied to similar performances in the past. Dr. Koussevitzky again built his climaxes with the same assurance which we expect from him. He also accentuated his adagios in the accepted Koussevitzkian manner. Yesterday's performance was Wagner in the grand manner.

Strauss was given a remarkable reading. Contrasts were sharply defined, legato passages deeply stirring and the ironical measures colloquially played. A performance which brought to conductor and men alike th justly enthusiastic plaudits of the audience.

NOVEMBER 25, 1931

Wagnerian Ways For the Tuesdays

Trans. Nov. 25

THE Tuesday afternoon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday in Symphony Hall with what is colloquially known as an "all-Wagner" program, amplified by a full hour of Straussian tone-poem. Inadvertently or not, this first concert proved to be a chronological exposition of the development of the Wagnerian idea in orchestral theory and technique, with Richard Strauss's "A Hero Life" as the natural culmination of the principles for which Richard Wagner strove so steadily throughout his career. As opening piece, Dr. Koussevitzky proposed the overture to the opera, "Tannhäuser," which was the first important landmark in the composer's upward path; then came the prelude to "Lohengrin," which gave the Wagnerian movement its initial impetus; then, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," generally considered the supreme achievement in the field of music-drama. Finally, after intermission, the tone-poem of Strauss, founded solidly upon Wagnerian principles, yet achieving even more startling triumphs in orchestra effect and technical command, if not in actual creative power, and adding a wholly original contribution in the bitter harmonic timbres which seem almost to mock the feeble ironies of certain lesser modernists of today.

It is easy to say: What could be more fitting and acceptable for the Tuesday audience than an "all-Wagner" program. There is nothing like a program of Wagnerian excerpts to draw a "full house" to an occasional concert. Presumably the Tuesday audience and the occasional audience are similarly constituted. They draw upon a suburban clientele: visitors to Boston who have the leisure for afternoon entertainment; teachers and students who wish to be well grounded in fundamentals. These listeners demand a conservative program, consistently eschew-

FIRST TUESDAY OF SYMPHONY

58

Orchestra Gives Wagner-Strauss Programme

Post — Nov 25

Yesterday at Symphony Hall Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra, returned from the recent trip to New York, in which they won fresh plaudits from metropolitan critics, presented the season's first Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert. To begin it came Dr. Koussevitzky's electrifying performance of the Overture to "Tannhauser," in which the orchestra once again fulfilled their conductor's brilliant intention. Then followed, completing the Wagner half of the programme, the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." Dr. Koussevitzky's persuasive way with both these excerpts is familiar; yesterday it once more came to complete accomplishment.

The second half of this programme was devoted to Strauss' tone-poem 'Ein Heldenleben." At a pair of regular concerts not long since, Dr. Koussevitzky revealed new heights and depths in his interpretation of this, one of the master-works of Strauss, which has thus far quite defied the ravages of time, giving it the vigor, the freshness, the assurance that were its composer's when he wrote it in his youthful prime. Yesterday's performance was no anti-climax, and the audience received it with every sign of enthusiasm. And Dr. Koussevitzky, responding to the applause, not only brought the orchestra as a whole to its feet to share his acknowledgements, but also summoned Messrs. Burgin and Boettcher, the sole performers upon the violin and the horn, respectively, in the final section of the piece, to receive the special recognition that was their due.

MUSIC

Globe Nov

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitky opened the current series of Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts with a program of music by Wagner—the overture to "Tannhauser," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

This substantial and familiar program offered opportunity, among other things, to observe to a certain extent the growth of Wagner's genius. It is an interesting musical journey from the angularities and mixed musical styles of "Tannhauser," through the increasing melodic and contrapuntal skill of "Lohengrin," to the unexcelled splendor and power of "Tristan" with its exquisite melodies and harmonies, it unceasing polyphonic ebb and flow, and its superb orchestration which clothes so beautifully and so aptly the musical setting of the tragedy of the Cornish knight and the Celtic princess.

Sophisticates may dub Wagner "old stuff," "inflated romanticist"; call the dramatic situation in which Isolde pours out her grief in the "Love-Death" absurd. Yet, was there ever music which more captivates the listener and makes him find in it a musical essence of human emotional experience? Were there ever measures more noble, sincere, and touching than those of the "Love-Death"?

Dr Koussevitzky gave the "Tannhauser" overture a thrilling performance, as he has done before this season. But both the "Lohengrin Prelude" and the "Tristan" music were curiously plodding and listless. The tempo was too slow; in consequence phrases were broken, and the music lost the swell and flow; the inevitable onward surge which Wagner wrote into it.

Dynamic accents seemed out of proportion; the natural climaxes of both the "Lohengrin" and the "Tristan" music seemed understressed, unsatisfying.

Strauss' "Heldenleben" is a curious mixture of good music and interludes of rather childish tone-painting. It is unreasonably long and repetitious. At least half of it fails to convey any emotional significance, and without the help of its ponderous program would mean nothing. Possibly the most sincere praise which could be made is that the work is a marvelous and gigantic polyphonic structure, and that the composer is a prodigious musical architect and craftsman. Dr Koussevitzky gave it an eloquent performance.

The next concert of this series will be given Jan 5.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Nov 25

For the first Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussewitzky last night provided music of Corelli, Brahms, Ravel and Rachmaninoff. It is to the last that we might first turn our attention, for in this orchestral version by Respighi, these five of the Etudes Tableaux are new to New York. As music they are not remarkable, or even in the best vein of their progenitor. But the scoring that Respighi has evolved for them is glamorous and exciting, examples of his craft which are fully equal to the sonorities of his Roman confections. For us they have now ceased to exist as piano pieces, so completely has Respighi dominated them. It is, indeed, the most interesting facet of this collaboration of Respighi and Rachmaninoff, that the musical individuality of the former is completely engulfed in the orchestral personality of the latter. Listening to them one is struck by the phenomena of the characteristic Respighi orchestra speaking in phrases which are distinctly unindigenous to it.

Together with the Daphne and Chloe suite of Ravel, which closed the program, they furnished illuminating examples of the euphonic possibilities of a hundred instruments, particularly when the hundred are Mr. Koussewitzky's exceptional retinue. As for the Brahms fourth symphony, earlier in the evening, analysis of its insufficiencies would serve no particular purpose, for we don't suppose that even Mr. Koussewitzky would view himself as an inspired Brahmsian.

IRVING KOLODIN.

Musical Morning

Not at A Fashionable Hotel But with Koussevitzky And His Orchestra

Trans Nov 28

EVEN on bright mornings nowadays, the sun comes dimly into the empty corridors of Symphony Hall at 11.30. In the still air, dust-motes hang motionless in slanting yellow light from the high windows. But there is life in the great empty place. Through the paired sets of red doors comes muffled sound in confusion: a violin scampers through its highest notes, over and over a trombone speaks carelessly and somberly a flute soars and falls, soars and disappears; the tuba's labored blare punctuates the din; and now and then comes forth the brrrrt, brrrrt of the harp.

One decides that some student orchestra has been granted the hall for a rehearsal. Surely our supremely competent, our graceful and precise body of musicians would never launch such a tonal chaos upon even the empty air.—But curiosity prompts a glance within.

There is no turning back now. The stage holds a strange and fascinating spectacle. No even ranks of meticulous black-coated, white-shirted figures, of careful complexion and sure coiffure—no. Instead, their close but unfamiliar resemblers, their workaday doubles. Somewhere, we realize, we have seen that flutist in the unpressed gray flannels. But now he gazes abstractedly at the music before him, holding a cigarette in his rounded lips, smoking it, for some reason, without the aid of his unoccupied hands. About an inch of ash will presently fall upon his old blue coat.

And one of the brasses, he of squat and steadfast mien of a Friday or Saturday, do not his eyes twinkle strangely? Yes, for a bassoonist is looking high and low for his reed-box. He left it right on his stand a minute ago. Now where could it ———? He sees the twinkle, makes a dive for his box behind the other's chair. Before he can reach it, a trombone's crook spanks the box across the floor like a hockey stick against a puck. Brass and bassoon scurry after it on all fours, chuckling and clutching. The second violins, aroused by shaking music-stands, rise austerely and resist the invaders with cautous prods of foot and elbow. But now the bassoonist has his reeds; the squat one grins at him; the second violins reperch, like a startled treeful of sparrows returning to rest.

The din has been going on, unabated save for a brief suspension of the tuba's blat-blat during the scuffle. Meanwhile another flutist, unmoved, has accompanied with his eyebrows the rhythmic rise and fall of his liquid and meticulous tone. There are a few sober and conscientious people in the world.

Have we not seen somewhere this dapper violinist, who lounges at ease, as if his chair were beside a table in a French café? His face is vaguely familiar, but his soft gray suit and matching spats do not consort with the anxious and morose countenance we have seen in evening clothes at the same desk. Now, we feel, he is himself, or another self, as he watches with happy smile the player behind him. This colleague holds his instrument against his chest like an old fiddler, and bounces his foot high in the air in exaggerated accentuation of the cacophonous sawings of his flying bow.

Through a door at the side of the stage, players have been alternately drifting and bustling in. Some lift big viols of belled brasses over their colleagues' heads as they weave perilously through the underbrush of teetering music stands. One, with a compact black case under his arm, moves with the precision of a doctor to his place. One would almost expect a stethoscope to come from the black leather case, so precisely does he adjust the crease of his striped gray trousers.

Now and then, drawn by the tonal Babel, a stage hand stands incredulously in the side door, as if he could not quite get used to the idea of so many men continually preoccupying themselves with this unpleasantness. He stands aside to admit a bent figure in a black cape, who peers over the ramp from behind the bass drum, as if into an arena of playful animals.

The players have been gradually settling into place. A burly violinist, weary of his absorption in five lonely notes, sits as if in stolid expectation of an unwelcome and inevitable event. The tympanist has completed his confidential communings with his brood, and leans back with folded arms. The violinist who was aping the old fiddler now tunes in earnest. Plainly something is about to happen.

* * *

From across the stage, a contrabassist has seen the bent, caped figure. He nudges his neighbor. "Ssssh! a serpentine whisper runs around the stage. There is a moment of sudden and ominous silence. The caped figure backs away from the ramp. But in front of him jumps a dapper 'cellist—his instrument held high over his head—who bounds around the corner from the side door and skips to his place with the sheepish bravado of a late schoolboy. At his appearance the silence is rent by hoots, whistles, cat calls, stamps of heavy feet. He answers them with a quick, short bow of mocking thanks, then disappears over his viol. The familiar dissonance of a hundred instruments testing their pitch again fills the air.

The bent figure in the black cape comes forward, his mouth set in a long amused smile, his glance reflectively on the floor before him. One looks again. Can it be? He looks up as he turns: It is!

A sharp "Psst!" has stopped the din. The bent figure moves gravely across the front of the stage, drops the cape gracefully into a chair, climbs just a little wearily onto the conductor's stand. "Zhentlemen," he seems to bend toward all of them at once, in dignified greeting. He lifts his baton.

For a moment there is silence. Then, as if by magic, there pours from the so lately discordant violins a flood of soaring, liquid tone. The trombones, no longer troublesome and unruly, lend sturdy and sober support. From the 'cellos a heavy sigh erases memory of their recent churlish bleating. With grace and ease breathes the flute, tone edged with the softness of birds' wings.—Plainly a god has come to bring order out of chaos.

RICHARD SLOANE ANGELL

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 1 - 1931

Boston Symphony Here November 19

The Boston Symphony will give its usual series of 10 concerts in the metropolis at Carnegie Hall. The opening event will take place Nov. 19. Other evening concerts are scheduled for Jan. 7, Feb. 5, March 3 and April 7. Saturday matinees are promised on Nov. 21, Jan. 9, Feb. 6, March 5 and April 9. Serge Koussevitzky will occupy the podium for the entire series.

Will Sing Here

REINALD WERRENRATH

Herald Nov 27

CIVIC SYMPHONIES PLANNED AT GARDEN

Werrenrath, Noted Baritone, On First Program

For the first time Boston music-lovers will, on Sunday night, Dec. 6, hear the famous concert baritone, Reinald Werrenrath, at popular prices. The singer, who has been called "the most entertaining vocalist in America today," will appear as the star of the first of the winter series of civic symphonies at the Boston Garden.

The Civic Symphony orchestra, Thompson D. Stone, conductor, will also be heard. That orchestra is made up of 105 musicians, picked from the leading symphony orchestras from all over America. The concerts will start at 8:30. Koussevitzky will be the guest conductor.

Werrenrath is due to arrive in Boston Dec. 5 and will be greeted at City hall by Mayor Curley. He will also be tendered a reception.

His program will be selected for him, by the people of Boston, for patrons have been asked to notify the manager of the Boston Garden or Mayor James M. Curley, co-sponsor of the symphonies, of their wishes as to the program they want Werrenrath to sing. The concerts are designed, as Mayor Curley expressed it, "to furnish the finest possible music for all of the people" and for that reason the public will, as far as possible, dictate the programs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JOURNAL

NOV 1 - 1931

The dates announced for Dr. W. Louis Chapman's lectures at the Providence Public Library on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are Nov. ~~15, Dec. 6~~, Jan. 17 and April 10. The lectures come as in past seasons on the Sunday afternoons preceding the concerts and start at 4 o'clock. They are under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club and are free to the public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 1 - 1931

The New York series of the Boston Symphony concerts will be inaugurated in Carnegie Hall November 19. Serge Koussevitzky will have entire charge. Unlike the Philharmonic and Philadelphia orchestras, there are no "guest" conductors at the Bostonian concerts. Five Thursday evenings and five Saturday afternoon events constitute the usual metropolitan quota.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA.

POST-GAZETTE

[illegible]

Brilliant Audience Attends Opening Symyhony Concert

A BRILLIANT assemblage gathered at the Mosque last evening to enjoy the delightful program offered by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first symphony concert ~~of the season.~~

Noted entering the Mosque were Mr. and Mrs. B. R. B. Townsend, the latter wearing a gown of American beauty chiffon, and Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Harden Church, Mrs. William McClay Hall was in her box, wearing black velvet with shoulder boquet of gardenias. Noted also were Mr. and Mrs. William J. Holland, Mrs. William Thaw and Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., who wore a black chiffon gown with rhinestone shoulder straps. Mrs. George E. Tener, was in her box, in red velvet gown, with Mrs. Kinley Tener, in black and white.

During the intermission a number of the younger members of society were chatting in the foyer. Miss Caroline Mitchell was there in black velvet with short white velvet wrap. Miss La Salle Dorrance was there in pale blue satin with short white fur wrap. Seen also were Miss Ruth Willock in black chiffon, and her sister, Miss Virginia Willock, wore black lace. Also noted were Miss Rosamound Fitch in flowered chiffon, Miss Bertha Brooks in black with short white fur wrap, and her mother, Mrs. J. Twing Brooks in blue lace with silver cloth wrap. Miss Mary Magee was there in black lace, and Miss Dorothy Slack in black satin with black velvet wrap.

Mrs. Henry C. Bughman was there in Persian purple velvet and Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard was with her daughter, Mrs. Thomas A. Robinson, who was in black velvet.

Seen also were Mrs. Chester Van Kleeck in brown lace, with Mrs. John Joy Edson, Jr., in black lace with purple velvet wrap, and Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, in black velvet.

Mrs. Robert Keeney was in her box, wearing an old gold satin. Seen also were Mrs. Charles Dahlinger in cream chiffon, Mrs. John Freeman in black lace, Mrs. Charles Dickey, in blue chiffon, Mrs. E. M. House and Mrs. John L. McK. Yardley.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DETROIT, MICH.

TIMES

NOV [illegible] 1931

IT REMAINED for Edison's passing to bring the Boston Symphony out of the radio silences. The very seeming reluctance of this band to broadcast its music makes its occasional radio concerts all the more significant. In this respect it displays a sense of showmanship that ought to commend itself to the Republican strategists along the Potomac.

* * *

~~Trans. Nov 27~~

Its Prestige In New York Running High

Unusually Warm Praise for The Boston Orchestra And Koussevitzky

IT IS late in the day to make record of the visit to New York, last week, of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra. Seldom have they been more warmly praised or the new music that they brought to hearing been better received. Therefore, when at last there is room, there shall also be summary. . . . The Times and The Evening Post vied with each other in praise of orchestra and conductor. Said The Times: "There may be divergences of opinion regarding the quality of the orchestra itself, compared with others in this city, which is fortunate in hearing the finest orchestras. The writer believes that the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra, surpasses all its rivals in beauty and brilliancy of tone and suppleness of technique. It is true that the effect of an orchestra depends so much upon the qualities of the conductor that exact comparisons are difficult. The playing last evening surpassed any earlier achievement of the season. No conductor of whom we have memory, except possibly Mr. Koussevitzky himself, has equaled his performance of the Second Suite, from Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloë.' Mahler's Ninth Symphony was interpreted with an eloquence, a conviction, a richness of color which may well have given the music fictitious significance."

In turn, The Post: "Orchestral playing of the highest finish and dazzling in its virtuosity was lavished upon the audience which applauded Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony at their first New York concert of the season. Seldom has Mr. Koussevitsky been so brilliantly successful, from first to last. With all due respects to the other technicians who have earned our admiration by some vital and glowing performances, this concert was the orchestral tour-de-force of the season to date. The character of the program was not one to stir the profounder emotions. But it offered opportunities for baton-wizardry that the Boston conductor seized upon, as a born thaumaturge and worker of miracles.

"We have yet to hear another conductor or another orchestra achieve similarly the hushed fantasy of the visional procession midway in [Debussy's] 'Fêtes' or the color-irisations of the opening 'Lever du Jour' of Ravel's masterpiece; for that is what 'Daphnis et Chloë' is—a supreme accomplishment of its kind. The applause after the breath-taking Dance Generale was that of an audience genuinely excited." For their part the Herald Tribune wrote of "that great orchestra to which we are indebted for so many consequential works"; while The Sun, at the end of its comment on Mahler's Ninth Symphony, noted "a superb performance in which nothing was lost under the baton of Koussevitsky or the virtuoso-playing of the great orchestra from Boston."

Good Will to Mahler

More than half the first concert fell to Mahler's Ninth Symphony, heard at home last October. The audience answered warmly. Seldom have the reviewers been better disposed. Said The Sun: "Now that it has come to the port of missing symphonies, to wit, New York, let us rejoice in that in fundamental matter and in much of the treatment, it is Mahler at his best. The melodic ideas are not trivial, as they so often have been in this composer's music, though they might easily betray a greater tenuosity if bared of their instrumental verbiage. The developments are very well planned, though in no one of the movements was Mahler able to avoid that episodic treatment which made so many of his longest creations seem short of breath. The orchestration is more consistently idiomatic and germane to the musical thought and the rounding out of the scheme made more effective thereby. . . . That the symphony was worth hearing is beyond question. That it revealed once more all the individual traits of Mahler's art, the plain melodic speech, the tremendous effort of the developments and the inability to condense and be pointed, is also not to be gainsaid."

Or the Herald Tribune: "The Symphony is not consistently fine and distinguished in musical thought. None of Mahler's symphonic scores is that; for Mahler had no inward censor; he never knew when he was saying something memorable and choice, and when he was delivering himself of platitudes and banalities. Yet the genuineness of his feeling, his burning and indubitable sincerity as an artist, give even his most portentous futilities at times a kind of impressiveness, and soften one's resentment of their triteness.

"Mahler, they say, was obsessed by premonitory thoughts of death when he composed this music. His biographer, Paul Stefan, sees in its concluding movement a farewell to earth, a 'farewell without bitterness,' as sequel to earlier pages in which Mahler storms and weeps and mocks, savagely deriding the life that men are given here to lead. His utterance of this obsessing mood is not so extraordinary in the Ninth Symphony as it is in the Fifth. Yet those pages of the Ninth Symphony in which Mahler utters his fears and woes and lamentations are, musically, the most memorable in the score. They occur in certain pages of the first movement (though as a whole this is the least original and impressive movement of the symphony). They are at the bottom of the savage and ironic mockery of the brilliant Rondo-Burleske. But they are most moving in the final Adagio."

Even the Evening Post knew pangs of contrition: "The playing was so fine as almost to win over some of us who have grown weary of the efforts of successive conductors to acclimatize Mahler to our soil. As it came to our ears at this concert, Mahler's Ninth has many beauties of detail, though by no means unmixed with those weaknesses, inconsistencies and palpable artifices that so generally have tipped the critical scales against Mahler in this country. For us, Mr. Koussevitzky succeeded in minimizing Mahler's characteristic defects, the while he ensnared his listeners with serenities, tendernesses and exaltations such as have been brought home to us in Mahler's music only in some memorable performances of the 'Lied von der Erde,' and the 'Kindertotenlieder.'"

The American Concerto

The novel piece of the second concert was Mr. Harold Morris's Piano-Concerto, likewise fresh from performance in Boston. On all sides praise was plentiful. The Herald Tribune heard an individual voice from the composer. The Times congratulated him on a lively and nervous temperament; an encouraging ardor; a modern tang, all conveyed with no small technical skill. To the Evening Post the Concerto had vitality and an abundance of orchestral color. The Sun heard "a symphonic composition in which the piano plays an important obbligato, and which is glowingy orchestrated. It should win the approval of those to whom music means more than a mere vehicle for the display of virtuosity. Viewed as a whole, the concerto is an addition of worth and dignity to the American repertory of the piano."

Ourselves and Others

For the Symphony Concerts today and tomorrow, Dr. Koussevitzky sets this program:

Overture to Collin's Tragedy, "Coriolanus" . . . Beethoven
Symphony, No. 4, in B-flat major. . . . Beethoven Tone-Poem, "The Enchanted Kingdom"—Ten Miniatures after a Russian Illustrated Alphabet—Prelude in Memory of Rimsky-Korsakov. . . . . N. Cherepnin (Conducted by the Composer)

With Mr. Reiner as conductor, the Philadelphia Orchestra is playing a concert-room patchwork from the Third Act of "Tristan and Isolde"; fragments from "Parsifal"; excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" that joint the close of the Second Act to the usual numbers from the Third. Seemingly, Mr. Reiner himself has made these arrangements.

In Chicago, Mr. Stock and his orchestra are playing these pieces, with Albert Spalding for assisting violinist:

Overture to the Opera, "Oberon" . . . . Weber
Concerto for Violin with Orchestra ("Dedications") . . . . La Violette Enigma" Variations on an Original Theme . . . Elgar
Three Movements from the "Spanish Symphony" for Violin and Orchestra . . . . Lalo Venusberg-Music from the Opera "Tannhäuser" . . . . Wagner

Programs to Hand

Following annual custom, Mr. Burgin, leaving his usual chair, will be deputy-conductor at the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 4 and 5, while Dr. Koussevitzky enjoys a week of freedom from rehearsals and performance. The program will traverse Chausson's Symphony, unheard since Mr. Monteux's day; a "Little Theater Suite" by Toch, the German modernist—miniatures done with the lightest possible hand; two "Studies for Orchestra"—one grave, one gay—by Vladimir Vogel, a Russian with German sympathies; a new Concerto for Violin by Nicolai Berezovsky, Russian exile in New York. Toch's Suite was played recently in New York and well received. Vogel's "Studies" were heard last month in Philadelphia. Mr. Berezovsky once contributed a Symphony to the supplementary concerts of Monday.

At the second of the supplementary Symphony Concerts, on Monday evening, Dec. 14, Roland Hayes, the tenor, will be assisting singer in a group of songs with orchestral accompaniment. Brahms's Fourth Symphony; the seventeenth-century Suite of Corelli; the familiar Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë" are the other numbers in prospect.

From Various Beethoven to Russian Guest

Cherepnin at Symphony Hall, Conductor, Orchestra and Two Classics

TRANS. —NOV. 27

THE CLASSICS still have a way with them—a way that leaves them the residue of many a concert in which they are played. Two weeks ago at Symphony Hall Brahms's Violin-Concerto was the surviving piece (as it were) of a fourfold program. Yesterday it was Beethoven's Symphony in B-flat—from the neglected "even numbers," which are the Second, this Fourth, the Sixth and the Eighth. For his part Dr. Koussevitzky treats it kindly, finding room for it nearly every two years; while he has overlooked the neat little, amusing little, Eighth ever since the centenary festival of 1927. There is not a reason—except, of course, tradition and precedent—why the Fourth should not be heard as often as the "Eroica," the Seventh or the overdone Fifth. Tested by pure æsthetics, it probably fulfills its design beyond any of the "odd numbers." Purists and pedagogues have judged it the "most perfect" of all Beethoven's Symphonies. Certainly it is the most lyric, unless hearers hark back to the youthful Second; while it is uncommonly free from the great Ludwig's less likable idiosyncrasies.

Consider, for example, the slow movement. In it is never a trace of the preachiness, the moralizing, that in certain other Symphonies, when Beethoven passes to Adagio or Andante, overcloud his meditations in tones. No doubt the Victorian epoch preferred him so; descanted accordingly. We sons and daughters of another time are also of another taste. Give us this slow movement in the Fourth Symphony, with its richness of motiv and melody, undeviatingly expanded from and within itself; its diversity of contrast and felicity of detail; its pervading ardor, warm yet poised and gentle, and there is Beethoven writing in tones a flawless lyric poetry, albeit in the classic rather than the romantic tradition. No time to moralize in such a quest for beauty. . . .

Beside this Adagio put a Scherzo that tempers to high spirits the usual tumults and intersperses anew the lyric freshness. Join to both a Finale in which Beethoven, with a glance over his shoulder toward Haydn who taught him so indifferently, prefers light breeze to driving gale. Precede all three with a first movement that charms [illegible] its way out of dusk into brightness; that forthwith is blithe with rhythm or pensive with song; that matches the Adagio in felicities of craft and poetry—and the Symphony stands full-rounded, as nearly perfect thing in lyric kind as mortal hand and mortal imagination may effect.

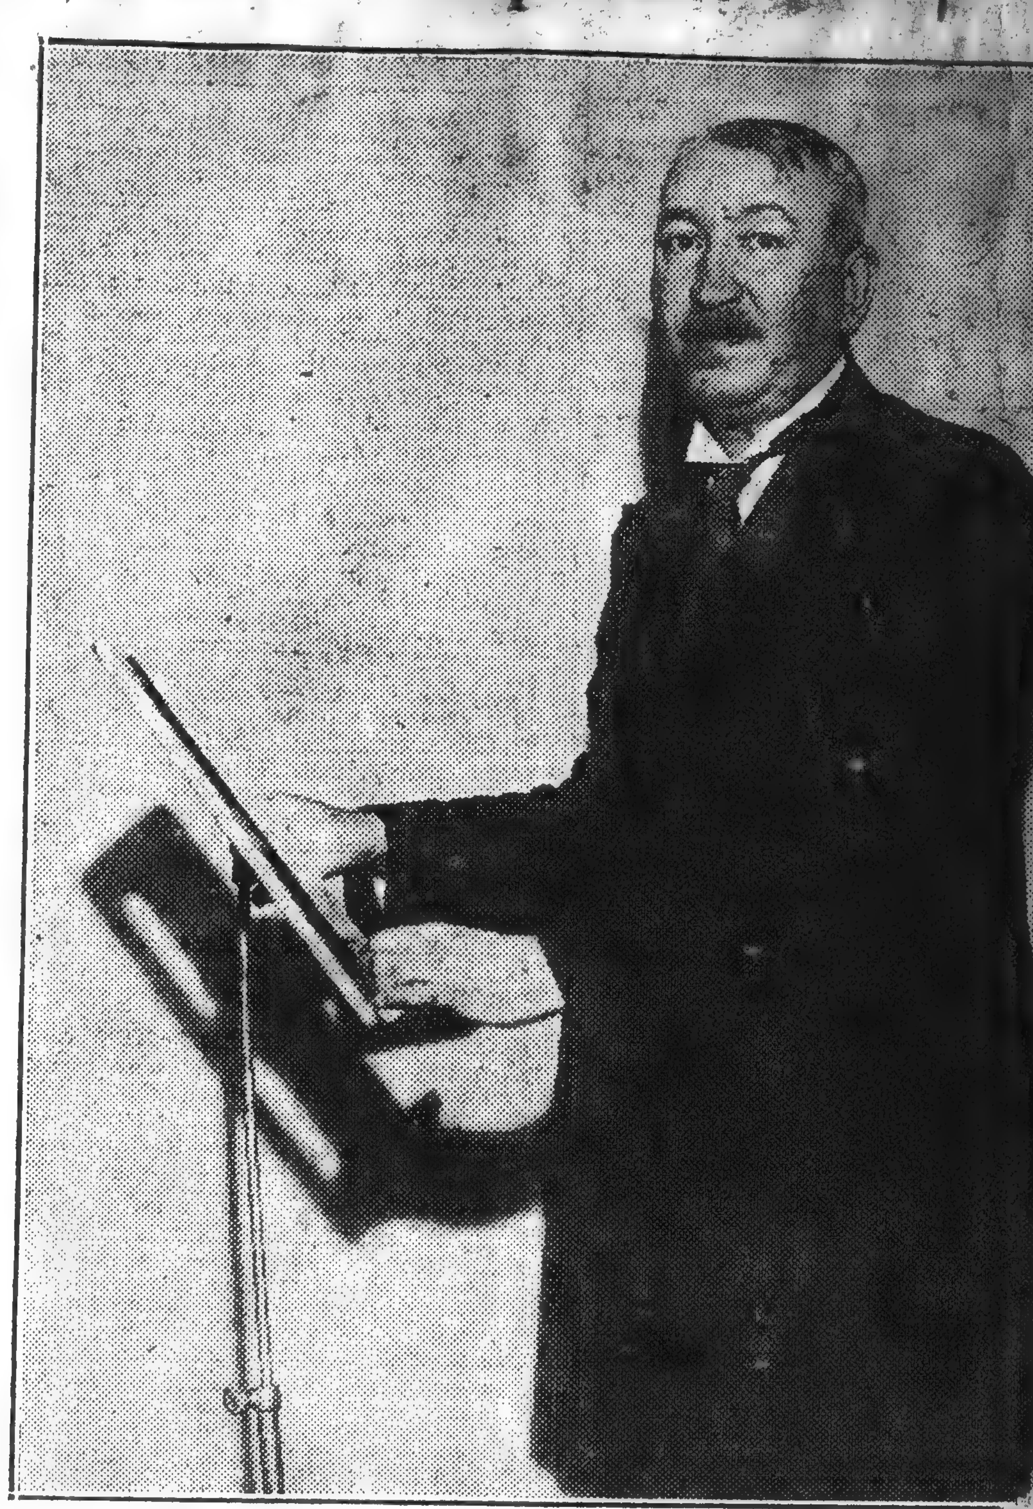
Such impression ran the deeper for the quality of the performance. (By common consent, in this seventh year of association, conductor and orchestra are at acme.) The string choir surpassed itself in lightness of hand, sensuous texture of tone, sheen to gild it. The virtuosi of the woodwinds likewise outdid themselves whenever songful or decorative or transitional measures were theirs. The horns lent magical euphonies, the kettle-drummer oftener stroked than struck his tympani. For his part. Dr. Koussevitzky proportioned and unified these voices into transparent flow and gracious motion, broken only at Beethoven's will; dramatized nothing in a Symphony that is pure music self-contained and self-sufficient; sang everything; neither overlooked nor overdid any grace or savor of detail; kept the pace unstayed and unhurried; measured Beethoven's lighter and stouter strokes of accent or transition; set free the lyric spirit, the poetizing temper, of the whole music. He erred only when in eagerness for the perfect phrase, he stayed for half an instant, the Symphony's pellucid progress. Any poet, of words or tones, knows that a lyric may be as treasurable as an epic, and closer to the listening heart.

The epical Beethoven indeed was prelude to the lyrical. Like the Eighth Symphony, the "Coriolanus" overture had somehow slipped out of the active repertory. Now it was timely restored A century and a quarter afterward, nobody knows anything about Collin's discursive tragedy, to which it was prelude—except of course the venerable and learned "programist." Nobody, either, thinks more than twice of Plutarch's and Shakspeare's lofty Roman matching his prideful will not only against his country but against the prayers of his women. What we all hear is Beethoven, at starkest and tersest, setting two opposed principles in tonal conflict—resolution against submission, pride against affection, darkness against light, what you will; waging the conflict to inevitable tragedy. We heard it the more epically for Dr. Koussevitzky's handling of the gentler melody. It tempts to softening, and he withstood the temptation.

The guest of the day, Nicolai Cherepnin, Russion composer of the elder generation, filled the second part of the concert—a tallish, grayish, spare and sturdy figure, quiet of manner; experienced in concert-hall and theater as conductor at Petersburg and other capitals. Since the revolution, he has dwelt in Paris; for the while sojourns in New York; received Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation last year when he was setting Musorgsky's "Fair at Sorotchintzy" on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House; is now able to accept it. For this skilful, sensitive, unobtrusive conductor, the orchestra played responsively. The audience received two of his numbers warmly.

There were three in all: a tone-poem, "The Enchanted Kingdom"; eight "Miniatures after a Russian Alphabet," illustrated by Benoist; a Prelude "In Memory of Rimsky-Korsakov," Mr. Cherepnin's teacher, encourager and lifelong friend. Upon the Prelude it is not necessary to dwell. It is music that more pays public homage than utters private grief and affection. It utilizes in large sonorities motivs from one of Rimsky's operas of mystical Russian legend. Otherwise neither spacious speech, broad handling nor unmistakable sincerity may hide intrinsic commonplace. On the other hand, "The Enchanted Kingdom," suggested by a folk-tale of a magical garden in slumbrous peace, is music of chiselled and lacquered detail. There is no remarkable invention, but subtlety after subtlety of phrase, accent, modulation, harmonic and instrumental color. It is true that Mr. Cherepnin may have heard, or even anticipated, Debussy and Ravel; while his orchestral technique becomes a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov. But these subtleties are also his own. He weaves them, besides, into sound that is illusion of silence. . . . The eight Miniatures were diversified and fanciful tonal sketches, each with a label, each graphic and technically adroit. Everyone who frequents concert-halls knows the Russian deftness with such pieces—not least Mr. Cherepnin's. H. T. P.

Experience



Nicolai Cherepnin (Colby—

Guest-Composer and Conductor at the Symphony Concerts Ye and Today

Russian Conductor-Composer Well Received at Symphony

Times Nov 28 By MOSES SMITH

Nikolai Nikalaievitch Tcherepnin, Russian conductor and distinguished composer, is guest in both capacities at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he leads in the second half of the program, devoted to his works.

These include "The Enchanted Kingdom," a charming little symphonic poem after a Russian folk tale dealing with the slumbers of the fearsome Kastchei; eight out of the ten Miniatures for orchestra, "After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet"; and a Prelude, "In Memory of Rimsky-Korsakov." The Miniatures and the Prelude were given their first performance anywhere at yesterday's matinee, while "The Enchanted Kingdom" was new to Boston, so far as we are aware.

The new music is, with the exception of the Prelude, delightful stuff. The orchestration is advanced Rimsky (of whom Tcherpnin was a pupil) in the manner of, say, the early Stravinsky Similarly, the harmonic basis. The Miniatures, which are scored with the utmost economy and precision and with consummate knowledge of the full range of instrumental color, are little gems of fancy and poesy, of irony and whimsy, having such suggestive titles as "Arab-boy," "Mama," and "General." There is weirdness and awesomeness in "Baba-Jaga" and in the tone poem. In contrast, the Prelude, with its inflated orchestra and generally bombastic utterance, was almost nauseous.

So far as a Friday afternoon audience ever allows itself to become excited over new music, it received these compositions well, and applauded the conductor, who directed the orchestra ably. The first half of the concert was devoted to Beethoven, with Serge Koussevitzky leading his orchestra in excellent performances of the "Coriolenus" Overture and the Fourth Symphony.

Half a concert devoted to the enduring master was none too much in these lean, after-the-Festival days for Beethoven. The noble Overture has not lessened in stature, and the neglected Symphony seems to grow with the years. In the performance of yesterday there were a few technical slips, surprising in a virtuoso orchestra, but in general things went very well. We were particularly pleased by the tempi set by Mr. Koussevitzky, and his adherence to them.

Looking Ahead

DECEMBER 7—
Ziegfeld Follies at the Colonial.
DECEMBER 8—
"Of Thee I Sing" at the Majestic.
DECEMBER 12—
"Treasure Island" (one performance) at the Plymouth.
DECEMBER 26—
"Star Dust" at the Colonial.

FIRST TUESDAY

60

Herald Nov 28

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to Collin's tragedy "Coriolanus" and the Fourth Symphony. The second part of the program was given over to Mr. Nicolai Tcherepnin—born at Leningrad in 1873; now living in Paris—who conducted his compositions: "The Enchanted Kingdom"—after a Russian tale; Eight Miniatures (after a Russian Illustrated Alphabet); Prelude, "In Memory of Rimsky-Korsakov" (first performance).

Dr. Koussevitzky had not conducted Beethoven's overture at the Friday-Saturday concerts since his first season. His interpretation of the overture and the symphony yesterday was remarkable. The proud, indomitable spirit of the music, its heroic character relieved only a little by the tender, lyrical theme, was dramatically, but not theatrically expressed, and in the singing of the second theme Dr. Koussevitzky did not indulge in the sentimentalism—gained by a slackening of pace in approaching this theme and a decided change in tempo—shown by certain conductors—though men of indisputable parts—who preceded him. The performance was far from being perfunctory, familiar as is the overture. Especially noteworthy was the treatment of the restless figure for strings, with the walk of each part so clearly defined with ever-increasing intensity. The very simplicity of the final measures—measures of lamentation—or as some would have it, portraying the hero's death, gave dignity to pathos.

And so with the symphony. The performance was one of extreme brilliance from the introduction to the first allegro music that might have been written by a modernist, but not an anarchist; to the dazzling virtuosity shown by the orchestra in the Finale. Some have wondered at Berlioz's rhapsody over the Adagio: pure in form, angelic melodic expression, indescribably tender, and smiled at the great Frenchman's introduction of the archangel Michael sighing this movement, "When overcome by meloncholy he contemplated the worlds from the threshold of the empyrean." They would not have smiled hearing the performance of yesterday nor would they have called the rhapsody of Berlioz mere hifalutin.

Mr. Tcherepnin, an excellent musician and a conductor of wide and long experience, was greeted warmly by audience and orchestra. He conducted modestly, quietly. His work had been done in rehearsal; the players heeded willingly his wishes.

"The Enchanted Kingdom" and the Miniatures may be classed as pictorial music. The former, in which our old friends of Russian fairy tales and Stravinsky's ballet Kastchei, and the Fire-Bird figure, might well be music for a ballet. As Tcherepnin was associated for five years as conductor of Diaghilev's Ballet Ruse, it is not surprising that this symphonic poem suggested ballet scenes. The music was comspicuous for harmonic and orchestral effects rather than flowing melodic lines, though the song of the Fire-Bird was an unmistakable as the sleep of Kastchei and the guarding breezes. The ending was of peculiar beauty.

The Miniatures—the translation into music of an illustrated alphabet—were originally for the piano. The orchestral version was played yesterday for the first time. Ten were announced; only eight were given: Arab-boy, Egypt, Baba-jaga—the witch whom we have met in Liadov's little tone-poem and in Moussorgsky's "Pictures in an Exhibition"—Stars, "Mama"—a charming lullaby; General (leading soldiers in an assault on a cardboard fortress); the Tsarina with her followers solemnly coming forth from the palace. These little pieces, different in character, pleased the audience greatly. If they had been performed at one of Mr. Schelling's concerts for children the pictures on the screen might have added to the enjoyment and revealed more clearly the fancy of the composer, but the music, even with only a line or two of written explanation, made its way. Mr. Tcherepnin studied composition with Rimsky-Korsakov. In the prelude in memory of him, two themes of that master of instrumentation are treated. This prelude is an interesting work, not dismally funereal, but rather a glorification of the master. Only at the end, after the apotheosis, comes music of tender recollection, tender in its thought that even composers are mortal, creatures of clay, whose end is dust.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

Mr. Burgin will conduct the concerts next week. Two etudes, Ritmica funebra and Ritmica scherzosa by Vogel; Toch's Little Theatre Suite and Berezowsky's violin concerto (the composer, the violinist), will be played in Boston for the first time. The second part of the concert will be devoted to Chausson's symphony, which has not been heard at these concerts since Mr. Monteux conducted it.

AY, NOVEMBER 28,

BEETHOVEN EXALTED BY SYMPHONY

Post

Tcherepnin Conducts Own Tone Poem in Second Half

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Symphony programmes, like politics, sometimes make strange bedfellows. That of yesterday was shared by Beethoven and Nikolai Tcherepnin, the Russian composer making his first appearance in Boston as conductor of his own music.

TWO FOR FIRST TIME

From Beethoven came the Overture to Collins' "Coriolanus," unheard at the Symphony concerts since 1925, and the Fourth Symphony, for which Dr. Koussevitzky has shown an especial partiality. Mr. Tcherepnin, cordially received by the audience, conducted his tone-poem, "The Enchanted Kingdom," a set of eight "Miniatures" after a Russian illustrated alphabet, and a Prelude in memory of Rimsky-Korsakov, the two last-named in their first performance.

The pronounced impression made yesterday by the "Coriolanus" Overture is an argument in favor of giving the classics an occasional rest. A similar vacation might freshen and rejuvenate the Overture to "Egmont" and even the third "Leonora." Nevertheless the performance was, in its own right, singularly vivid and impressive, dramatic without theatricality, forceful without exaggeration. Dr. Koussevitzky's Beethoven is today altogether admirable: witness the superb performance of the "Eroica" at the concert in memory of Edison and the remarkably fine and wholly Beethovenish performance yesterday of the lesser Fourth with which, it should be added, the conductor has always been fortunate. Again the introduction breathed its note of mystery; to the Allegro was given its proper cheerfulness, to the Adagio its sculptured serenity, while the Finale fairly bubbled over with high spirits pointed by touches of sly humor.

A pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, Mr. Tcherepnin has been influenced by his great teacher whose feeling for the pictorial he has inherited. But to his pictorial sense Rimsky could add the power of salient and distinguished musical invention. Mr. Tcherepnin conveys his pictorial images chiefly by means of ingeniously manipulated orchestral effects. The music itself, the harmony and the melody, show less skill in characterization.

The most successful of the eight Miniatures was also the least pretentious, one that would set forth a general of tin soldiers storming a cardboard citadel, a charming conceit that would make a capital encore at the Pops. The one entitled "Baba-Jaga" brought only recollection of how much more graphically Moussorgsky and Liadov had realized the Russian witch. The Prelude, based on two of Rimsky-Korsakov's themes, proved sententious rather than profound. Towards the end an imposing climax is reared, with organ and bells joined to the orchestra, but the end itself is anti-climactic.

Mr. Tcherepnin, a gray-haired modest-seeming man nearing 59, conducted without ostentation but with the authority born of long practice at the conductor's desk.

MUSIC

Globe Nov 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program of yesterday's Symphony concert was divided between the works of Beethoven and those of Nikolai Tcherepnin, a Russian musician of the elder generation, who conducted his tone poem, "The Enchanted Kingdom," eight of his "Miniatures After a Russian Illustrated Alphabet," and his prelude "In Memory of Rimsky-Korsakov." Mr Tcherepnin was cordially applauded, especially after the "Miniatures," amiable and unpretentious little pieces, which plainly delighted many in the audience.

Of Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony little need now be said. As on former occasions, his was a personal reading. He molded the melodies and stressed the rhythms in a way of his own. Had the conductor been in isible and anonymous, one would still ave felt the impress of Koussevit ty's personality on the familiar mu c. This symphony is the least satis ng of the nine Beethoven wrote. It carried in the orchestral repertory by the power of the composer's fame, not by its own intrinsic merit.

The "Coriolanus" overture, on the other hand, is one of Beethoven's greatest creative achievements. Hearing it, one thinks not of Collin, whose play it professes to introduce, not even of Shakespeare's play about the same hero, but of the essential mood of all great tragedy. With Dr Koussevitzky this overture is not, obviously, a favorite. He has given us perhaps a dozen performances of "Leonore No. 3," its only rival among Beethoven's overtures. One does not recall hearing him conduct the "Coriolanus" before.

Yesterday's performance was a turgid and ill-balanced one, though something like justice was done to the marvelous second theme, the greatest thing in the overture.

Mr Tcherepnin, the elder of the two noted Russian musicians of the name (the other is his son), is a conductor who also composes rather than a composer who conducts. He has had a lengthy and distinguished career, at the Maryinsky Opera in St Petersburg, with the Diaghilev ballet from 1909 to 1914, and so on. He led his own works yesterday with an authority and a command of the full tonal resources of the orchestra not often to be noted when a composer conducts. His modest, unassuming bearing, his eagerness to share the applause with the players, were noteworthy.

A pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov and the teacher of Prokofiev, Mr Tcherepnin loves orchestral color and sonority for its own sake. His "Enchanted Kingdom" depicts the same Russian legend on which Stravinsky's "Firebird" is based. But in it there is none of the melodic invention, the firmness of musical texture to be heard in the work of the younger master. Tcherepnin is content with a rather naive impressionism.

The eight "Miniatures," written to be mimed by an interpretive dancer, are pretty little pieces, conventional in substance, but effectively written and in their unpretentious way ingratiating. They would scarcely bear frequent hearings, but yesterday's first performance was warmly applauded.

The memorial overture for Rimsky-Korsakov, also performed for the first time, uses two themes from Rimsky's opera, "The Invisible City of Fate," building up an impressive climax, and then straying into anticlimax by pointless reiteration and embroidery.

Next week Richard Burgin will conduct a program including novelties by Vogel and Toch, a violin concerto by Berezowsky, with the composer as soloist, and Chausson's symphony. P. R.

Music

Monitor Nov 28

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Nikolai Tchérepnin was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its sixth pair of concerts, the first of which was given on the afternoon of Nov. 27, 1931, in Symphony Hall, Boston. He directed, as the second half of the program, three of his own works: "Enchanted Kingdom," after a Russian tale; Eight Miniatures, after a Russian illustrated alphabet, and a Prelude in memory of Rimsky-Korsakoff. For the first half of the program, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the "Coriolanus" Overture and the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven.

Mr. Tchérepnin was greeted with a warmth that was fitting, in view of his distinguished position as conductor and as composer in his native Russia and elsewhere in Europe. As a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, he joined the Belaieff circle, and became one of his master's chief beneficiaries. It might be said that he has devoted his life to acknowledging this obligation. His "Enchanted Kingdom" deals with the legend Stravinsky used in his "Fire-Bird"—but as Rimsky would have used it. The miniatures are orchestrations of piano pieces inspired by Benois's illustrated Russian alphabet. Listening to them, one thinks perhaps of the "Schéhérazade" Suite, of Liadoff's "Music Box" and—a little wistfully—of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition." They are very charming, naïve and atmospheric. In the Prelude Mr. Tchérepnin has introduced two of Rimsky-Korsakoff's themes: that of the Saint Phevronia, and that of the bells from the "City of Kitej." The work, which is elegiac and heroic in style, pays the sincerest possible tribute to its subject.

The undoubted success that Mr. Tchérepnin won could not, however, obliterate from memory the performance of the works of Beethoven. As listed items on a program, they would not stir much expectation in a hardened concertgoer. But do not forget that they were conducted by Koussevitzky, and played by the Boston orchestra. Thus the "Coriolanus" Overture became vividly dramatic; and the hearers were reminded that the Fourth Symphony may easily be underestimated. This was a superb performance, which did not attempt to "lift" this music to the level of the Third or the Fifth, but was content to publish its humor, its wit, its fancy and its grace. What? Wit and grace in Beethoven? Certainly; quite as well as in Haydn or Mozart, if you look for them—or, perhaps better, let Koussevitzky show them to you.

L. A. S.

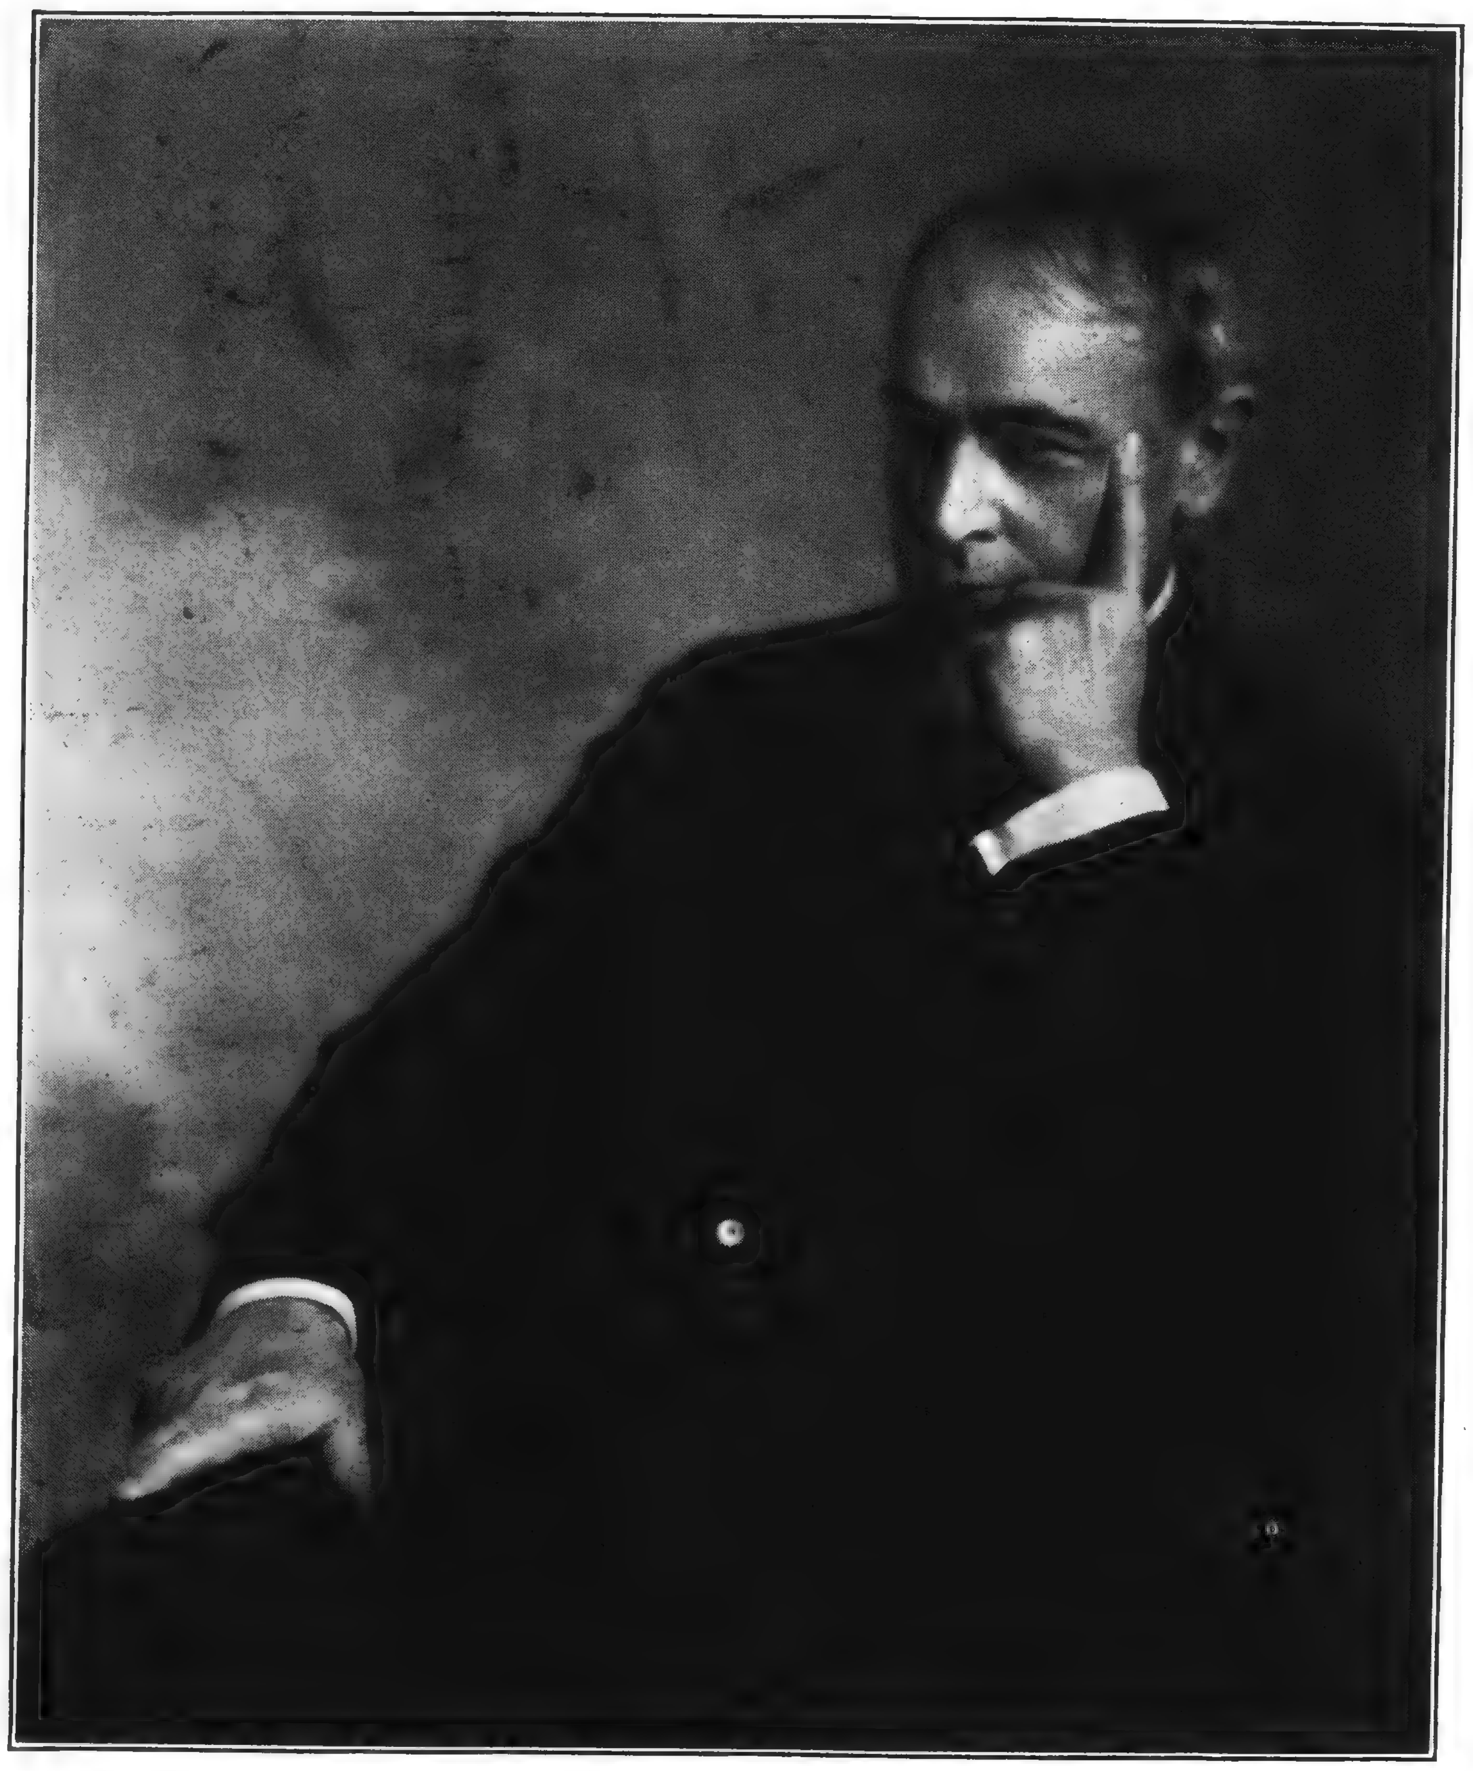

Photo by Garo

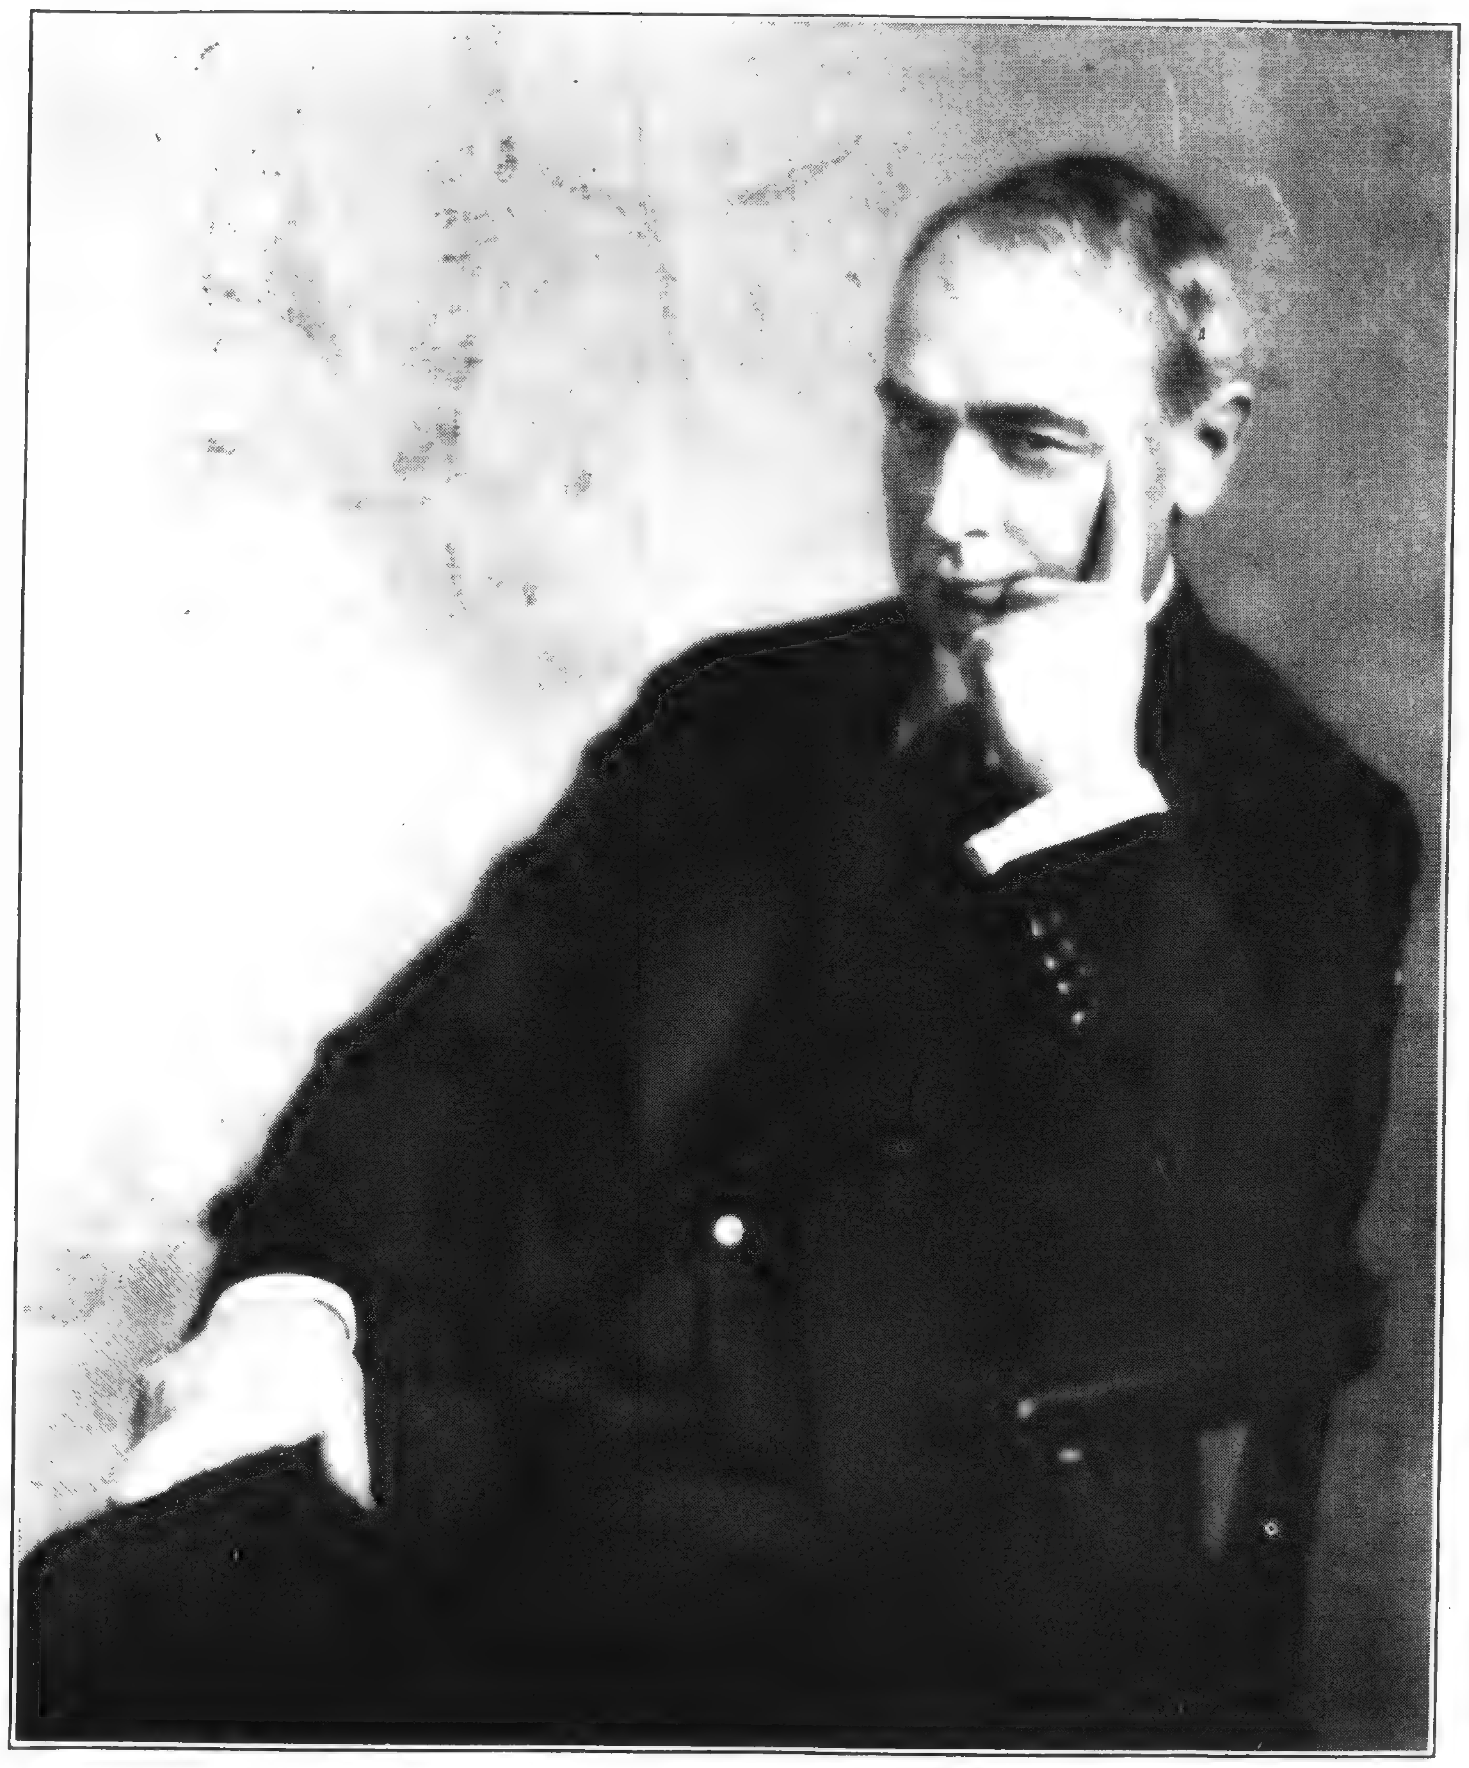
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Noted Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra



[illegible]

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Noted Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

621

Nov, 1931

Koussevitzky—The Life of the Musical Season

ON his return from abroad last month, Serge Koussevitzky proposed music as an antidote for depressed spirits. Others must be so minded, for the musical season is flowering to a patronage even beyond custom. This applies not only to orchestral concerts, for the "Don Cossacks" and Lily Pons have opened two recital series in Symphony Hall before great audiences.

With the Friday Afternoon Symphony Concerts of course there is no question of attendance—that goes without saying. What is impressive is the degree of tenacity with which people keep their seats under the family name, even though they have to lease them out or hand them to friends. Family heirlooms, inherited from the days of "rehearsals" and auction sales, are not so lightly relinquished. The Saturday evening subscribers are no less determined, although their motives may be on the whole more musical and less traditional. The shorter and younger Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series multiply the patronage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by two, and point to the true center of attraction—Serge Koussevitzky himself.

"Koussevitzky the electric returns, and Boston's voltage rises," writes a Boston editor, and indeed there is no sleeping before Dr. Koussevitzky, or behind him for that matter, as he stands upon his platform—the zealot, the enlivener, the refiner—the commander. There is a mutual touch and go about orchestra and leader this year which somehow challenges the past at its best.

When it comes to programs, Koussevitzky is like Emerson in preferring rash enterprise to doubly safe routine. In the brief space of five programs he has introduced to America a symphony of Mahler which has the earmarks of greatness, not to mention a talented American composer, Harold Morris, in his own piece. He has struck new life into more than one score which has been passed by in late years—Sibelius' Fourth Symphony, Franck's Les Eolides, Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Florent Schmitt's La Tragedie de Salome. And then, after such stimulating surcharge, the grateful balm of the more familiar Brahms, or Wagner, or Rimsky-Korsakov. Yet even these are sparked with life, and not allowed to stale.

These are some principal reasons why the town is rather solidly with Koussevitzky. Call it idol worship if you like, but is it not rather a discriminate response to an artist of such abundant spirit that he can touch really notable achievement week after week? A season is very much ~~alike~~ alive when such a one is its prime mover.

Returning To Symphony Hall
DON COSSACKS
FAMOUS RUSSIAN MALE CHORUS
Monday December 7th At 8:30

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

NOV 1 - 1931

LIFE HISTORY OF A MAESTRO

Serge Koussevitzky, Orchestra Conductor, Is Subject of New Biography.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY, by Arthur Lourie. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. Knopf.

The facts about the life of the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which this book contains might be told in a single chapter. He was born in 1874, in a small Russian town, of poor parents. His father was a violinist, his mother a pianist. Small as the town was, it had its musicians, and young Koussevitzky learned to play, after a fashion, several instruments. At the age of 14 he ran away from home, went to Moscow, and obtained admission to the Philharmonic School, where he specialized in the double bass. He became a virtuoso on that large and neglected instrument, sometimes called the dog-house; he became one of the three greatest double bass virtousi in musical history. He astonished everyone by making a solo instrument out of his bull fiddle, which the majority in his audiences had considered as useful for nothing but to produce a ground tone for the other instruments in an orchestra.

Having gone as far as he could as a double bass performer, Koussevitzky took up conducting and achieved a European reputation. After the Bolsheviks secured control of Russia he told them that he could not work according to their rules and was allowed to depart. He conducted orchestras in many countries and in 1924 became conductor of the Boston Symphony. He is distinguished among conductors by the catholicity of his taste and the opportunities he affords for hearing new works—though many of them do not long continue on his programs.

Beyond these facts, Lourie's book contains some musical history and criticism and some philosophy, which may be clearer in the original than it is in translation, for his ideas are often befogged in words that are without clear meaning unless the reader is fairly familiar with the point in question. For instance, the comparison of Debussy and Scriabine is fairly dense. Some of his statements are inaccurate, as for example: "He introduced Brahms to Boston, where he had been respected, but very little played." He was certainly played frequently enough by both Fiedler and Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST STANDARD

NOV 1 - 1931

Cornell's Music Season Opened With Symphony

Koussevitzky Conducts 110 Musicians

ITHACA.—Cornell university opened its new music season in Bailey hall Saturday night with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 musicians with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. It was a sort of post-football concert, falling on the same day as the Cornell-Columbia game and the capacity audience included many who combined their love of music with their love of the outdoor sport for their motive in coming to Ithaca.

The program included Brahms' Fourth Symphony; Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse;" Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The appearance of the orchestra in Ithaca on this occasion was part of the rounding out of its first 50 years of existence. Koussevitzky came to America in 1924 to head the organization after having achieved high reputation in Russia before the war. In bringing 110 musicians to Ithaca this year the orchestra had the largest number that has ever played here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

NOV 2 1931

Drops of Blood

Imagine living in a small up-country town where all in the same day you can see the Columbia football game and hear the Boston Symphony, stepping from one to the other with scarcely a let-down in the tempo!

Both, I think, were works of art and more nearly comparable than most folks suspect, who have not some knowledge and appreciation of the two forms of expression. When Mr. Serge Koussevitzky slowly raised a relaxed hand and in response the strings began to breathe almost inaudibly, I couldn't help thinking how endless and painful must have been the drill to reach such perfection in execution. Just as at the game when perfect harmony of motion was achieved, not once but many times, I could visualize Mr. Gilmour Dobie back there in September tapping his baton on the water bucket and patiently rehearsing the apparently minor phrases and movements that finally came together to form the football symphony of Saturday.

An orchestra must have musicians and a football team must have players, but when either achieves the heights, it is because a leader has willed that it should and has put into the effort his intelligence, his tireless patience and the drops of his own creating blood that distinguish a work of art from a machine-made product. My! How that Boston Symphony stays out in front through all the years, and retains a flavor all its own! Perhaps it's because Colonel Higginson put more into it than his money—drops of his blood.

4

The Ohio State Journal
Published Every Morning in the Year by
THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL CO

Columbus Office. The Ohio State Journal Building.
Telephone: ADams 8151.
New York Office: New York Central Building.
Chicago Office: Room 1309, 75 E. Wacker Drive.
Philadelphia Office: Fidelity-Philadelphia Trust Bldg., 123 So. Broad St.
San Francisco Office: 801 Sharon Building.
Los Angeles Office: 117 W. Ninth St.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES
Delivered by Carrier.

Daily only, week...	$0.15	Daily-Sunday, week..	$0.25
Daily only, month...	.65	Daily-Sunday, month	1.09
Daily only, year ...	7.50	Daily-Sunday, year..	13.00

MAIL SUBSCRIPTIONS IN ADVANCE.
(Within 150-mile radius of Columbus.)

Daily and Sunday, one month	$1.05
Daily-Sunday, year	$11.00	Daily only, year.....	6.00
Daily only, month..	.55	Sunday only, year ..	5.00

(Outside of 150-mile radius, rates on application.)

Entered at Postoffice, Columbus, as second-class matter

MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS.
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited in this paper and also the local news published herein.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1931.

The Double Bass.

IN most orchestras the double bass, once known as the bass viol, the largest member of the violin family, is merely an humble toiler in the rear ranks, with heavy tones marking time and adding emphasis to the musical offering. But in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the double bass, still located in the rear ranks, has been made an aristocrat, and its importance magnified largely. It is called on to provide the volume once supplied by bass horns.

The Boston orchestra has 10 double bass players and the conductor uses them with fine effect in building up big tonal pictures. The work these players were able to do was shown when the Lohengrin prelude was given. Many who heard it were able to recall the resounding noise when many big bass horns were used to develop tonal immensity which the gifted Wagner loved and used so freely. The double bass players from Boston provided the volume without the blare of brass that hardly can be eliminated when great sweeping strains are being played under a driving conductor such as Boston has.

Since the double bass was placed in orchestras in 1696 many players have sought eminence as soloists, but only three have won historic prominence. It does not lend itself to solo work readily, but the larger use made of it by the Boston orchestra shows that it has possibilities.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

NOV 5 - 1931

Boston Symphony To Open Season Here Nov. 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its forty-sixth season in New York at Carnegie Hall on Thursday and Saturday, November 19 and 21. Serge Koussevitzky will introduce at the first concert Mahler's Ninth Symphony, of which he gave its first Amerrican performance last month in Boston. A feature of the second will be the new piano concerto of Harold Morris, with the composer as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 7 - 1931

Boston Symphony Wants $18,000 a Broadcast

The Boston Symphony is asking $18,000 a broadcast and finding radio rajahs cold. Yet, broadcasters paid Lauder $15,000 a broadcast...If Lauder is worth $15,000 to them, the Boston band, still the best in the land, save when Toscanini is conducting the Philharmonic is surely worth $18,000...Highest fee paid in radio is that given the Philadelphia Orchestra. It receives, spies say, $18,000 a broadcast. It would seem Stokowski is also a first class salesman...Most audible of stage favorites on the air is Ruth Etting, torch singer...Best of new Broadway dance tunes on the air are those from "The Band Wagon"...The stage seeking actor to interpret Jewish characters also looks to radio. James R. Waters, heard for a long period in "The Rise of the Goldbergs," has now a prominent part in "Wonder Boy," latest lampoon of the movie industry...Busiest family on the microphones is that called Lanin. There are eight brothers in the family, all of them maestros. They operate on a kind of bootleggers' agreement not to encroach upon one another's territory, nor to hi-jack one another's contracts . . . Explorers no longer depart upon expeditions without first signing radio contracts. Radio contracts have been found so much more profitable than lecture tours...Never knew there were so many explorers...Hard to get into a radio studio today without tripping over one or two of them, waiting to see program directors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 8 - 1931

Boston Symphony

Mahler and Morris Works To Be Played Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its forty-sixth season in New York at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, November 19 and 21. On the Thursday, Serge Koussevitzky will give the first performance here of Mahler's Ninth Symphony; in the matinee, Harold Morris will be soloist in his own piano concerto, which had its first performance in Boston a fortnight ago. The orchestra will play at the Brooklyn Academy November 20.

The orchestra returned from a tour last week to give a Boston program, including Sibelius's fourth symphony. The Boston program for next Friday and Saturday includes Rachmaninoff's Etudes Tableaux, orchestrated by Respighi; Pick-Mangiagalli's "Scene Carnavalesque" (first time), Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and the Brahms violin concerto with Adolf Busch as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

NOV 7 - 1931

Koussevitsky to Open Concert Season In Providence Nov. 17

—Photo by Bachrach.
DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

To Present Classics on Program, With Contemporary Scores Of Importance

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will open the 51st season at the Albee Theatre here Tuesday evening, Nov. 17.—Other concerts to be held in the Albee will be on Dec. 8, Jan. 19 and April 12.

The season in Boston started last month with Dr. Koussevitzky opening his eighth season as conductor. The personnel of the orchestra has been but slightly changed.

The conductor will include masterpieces of the past in the Providence series, also playing contemporary scores of importance. Tickets for the concert will go on sale next Monday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV [illegible]

SEAT SALE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

The public sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens tomorrow, but locations are very limited, it is understood, as the number of renewals of subscriptions are reported to have been greater than ever before. This condition is said to prevail in other cities visited by the organization. Every aspect of the orchestra's 51st season, which opened in Boston last month, promises one of the finest in its history.

The Providence series opens Nov. 17 in the Albee Theatre and will continue with three concerts on Dec. 8, Jan. 19 and April 12. Dr. Koussevitzky will include on his programs foremost masterpieces of the past and certain contemporary scores of unquestioned importance.

The personnel of the orchestra, which is always but slightly changed from season to season, retains in toto the membership of the 50th anniversary season just past. Dr. Koussevitzky opened his eighth season as the orchestra's conductor with four notable pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. In the last week of October the orchestra made a tour of the West, giving concerts in Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca. This tour was a series of brilliant successes almost without precedent in each city. The New York season of the orchestra will open later in the same week as the Providence season.

Music student cards for the first Boston Symphony concert will be ready for distribution Tuesday at the studios of Mary Cull, 615 Jackson building, and Carrie Schmitt, 15 Conrad building. These cards are provided through the courtesy of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs and are issued only to students under 25 years of age. Each application must be signed by the student's teacher.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

NOV 7 - 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its forty-sixth season in New York on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 19 and 21. Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce Mahler's Ninth Symphony at the evening performance, and at the matinee a new piano concerto by Harold Morris.

64

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 8 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE TUESDAY NOV. 17

Other Concerts Will Be Given Dec. 8, Jan. 19 and April 12.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in Providence will open Tuesday evening, Nov. 17, in the Albee Theatre. The three other concerts of the season will be given Dec. 8, Jan. 19 and April 12.

The famous orchestra, which last year observed its 50th anniversary, retains fully the same personnel this year and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is now beginning his eighth ~~season as~~ conductor of the organization.

The orchestra gave concerts in Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Ithaca during the last week of October. Its New York season will open later the same week of its Providence concert. Dr. Koussevitzky plans to include foremost classical masterpieces as well as important contemporary scores in the Providence concert series. A limited number of season tickets will be placed on public sale here Monday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 8 1931

In its concerts in Carnegie Hall Nov. 19 and 21 the Boston Symphony, under Koussevitzky, will present two works new to this city—Mahler's Ninth symphony, given its American première last month in Boston, and, at the matinee concert the new piano concerto of Harold Morris, with the composer as soloist. Next week in Boston the orchestra will give the first performance of Pick-Mangiagalli's "Scène Carnavalesque," Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salomé" and Brahms's violin concerto, with Adolf Busch as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

NOV 14 1931

Harold Morris, soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on November 21.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST

NOV 14 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra

First Concerts Here This Season—Programs of Philharmonic and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestras Next Week

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brings his Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall for the first time this season Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon with interesting programs. Thursday Mahler's Ninth Symphony will be played for the first time here, and the other numbers will be Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, second suite, consisting of "Lever du Jour," "Pantomime" and "Danse Generale."

Saturday afternoon Harold Morris's Concerto for piano will be given for the first time in New York and the composer will be the soloist. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

rlo Edwards Garo

harmonic-Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, paying its first New York visit of the season, will introduce works new here on Serge Koussevitzky's programs for both Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Thursday's unfamiliar number is Gustav Mahler's ninth symphony, which was first performed at Vienna in 1912, the year after the composer's death. Bruno Walter conducted. The first American performances were in Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston concerts of October 16 and 17, 1931.

Saturday's novelty is a piano concerto by Harold Morris, who will be he soloist. The work was first performed in the Boston concerts of October 23 and 24. For Philip Hale's program notes of that date the composer wrote that the concerto was begun bout three years ago. "The beautiful piritual, 'Pilgrim's Song'," he continued, "shows the effect of civilization on the slaves of the Southern states and is in great contrast to the rugged, rhythmic character of the African Negro drumbeat with which the first movement opens, and is used throughout this movement and momentarily in the last as a binding link between the movements. The other material in the concerto is, I hope, the natural and logical result of growing up with and studying folk music as we have it in the South. But I do not mean this to imply that I believe in leaning entirely on folk music or that it should in any way limit or hamper our modern musical expression, but rather that it should be the basis, as it was with composers of the past."

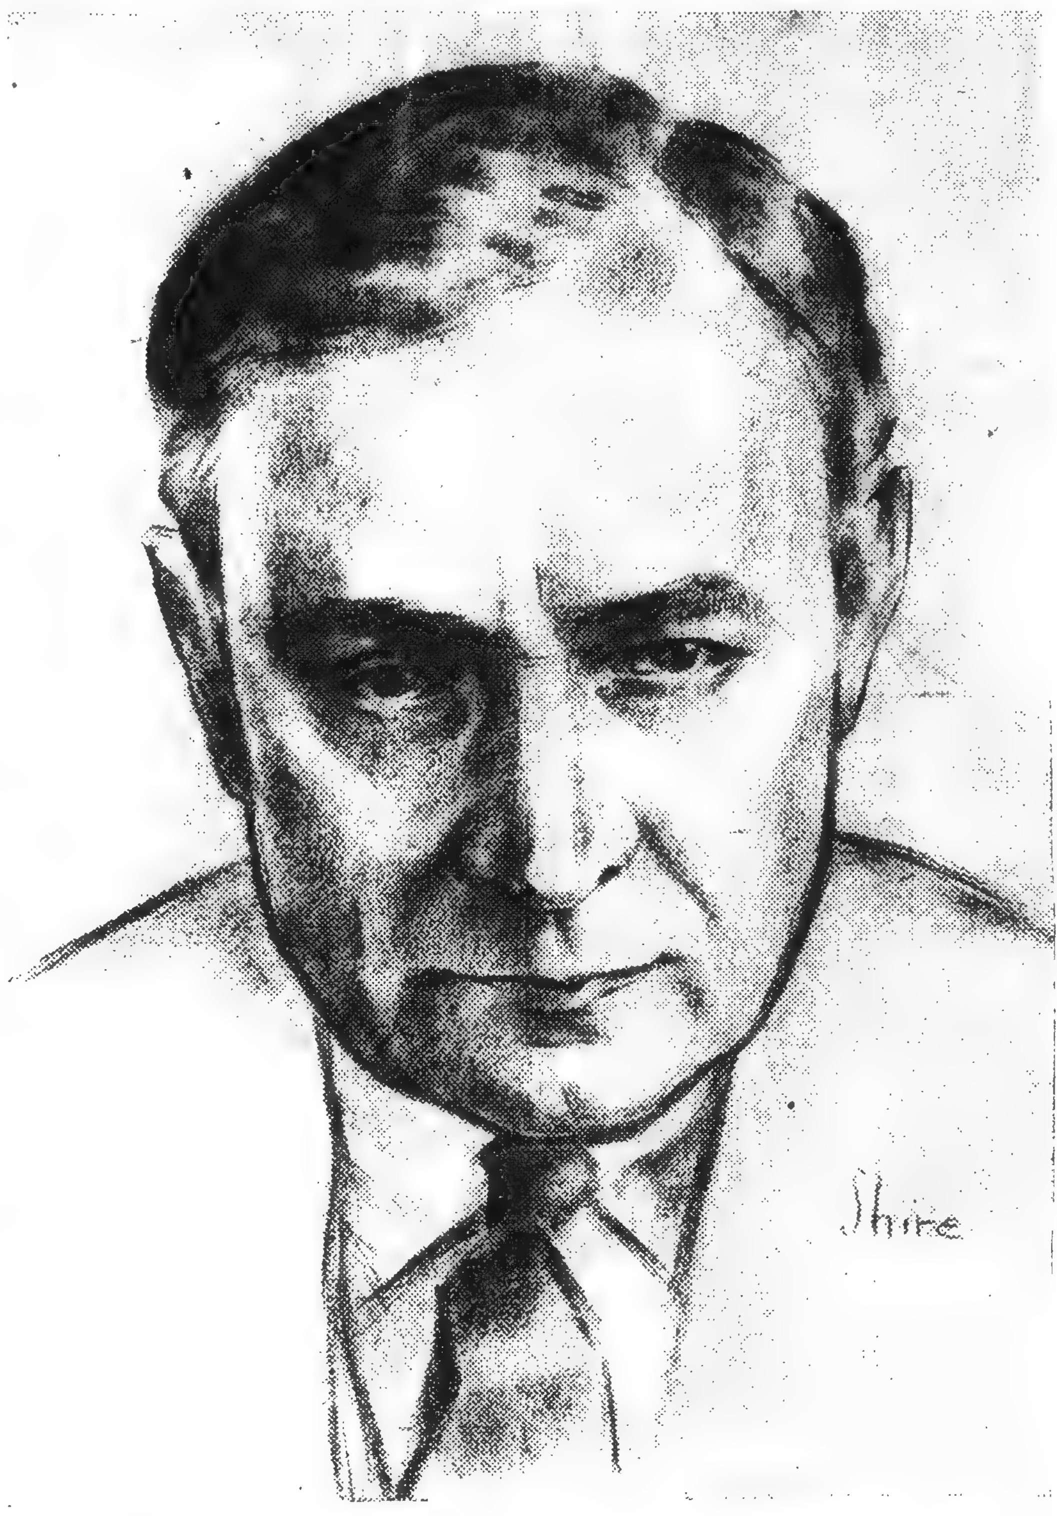
Mr. Morris was born in San Antonio and was graduated from the University of Texas. Among his teachers have been Edgar Stillman Kelley, the late Walter Henry Rothwell, Leopold Godowsky and Rosario Scalero.

Trib NY Nov 15

THE NEW YORK TIMES, S

MMENT OF TH

Nov 15



The Distinguished Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Who Brings His Orchestra Here for Two Carnegie Hall Concerts This Week.

Boston Symphony's Initial Providence Concert Tuesday

Prov Journal Nov 15

Rachmaninoff Work to be Heard Here for First Time on Program Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Conducts; Brahms, Ravel and Corelli Are Listed

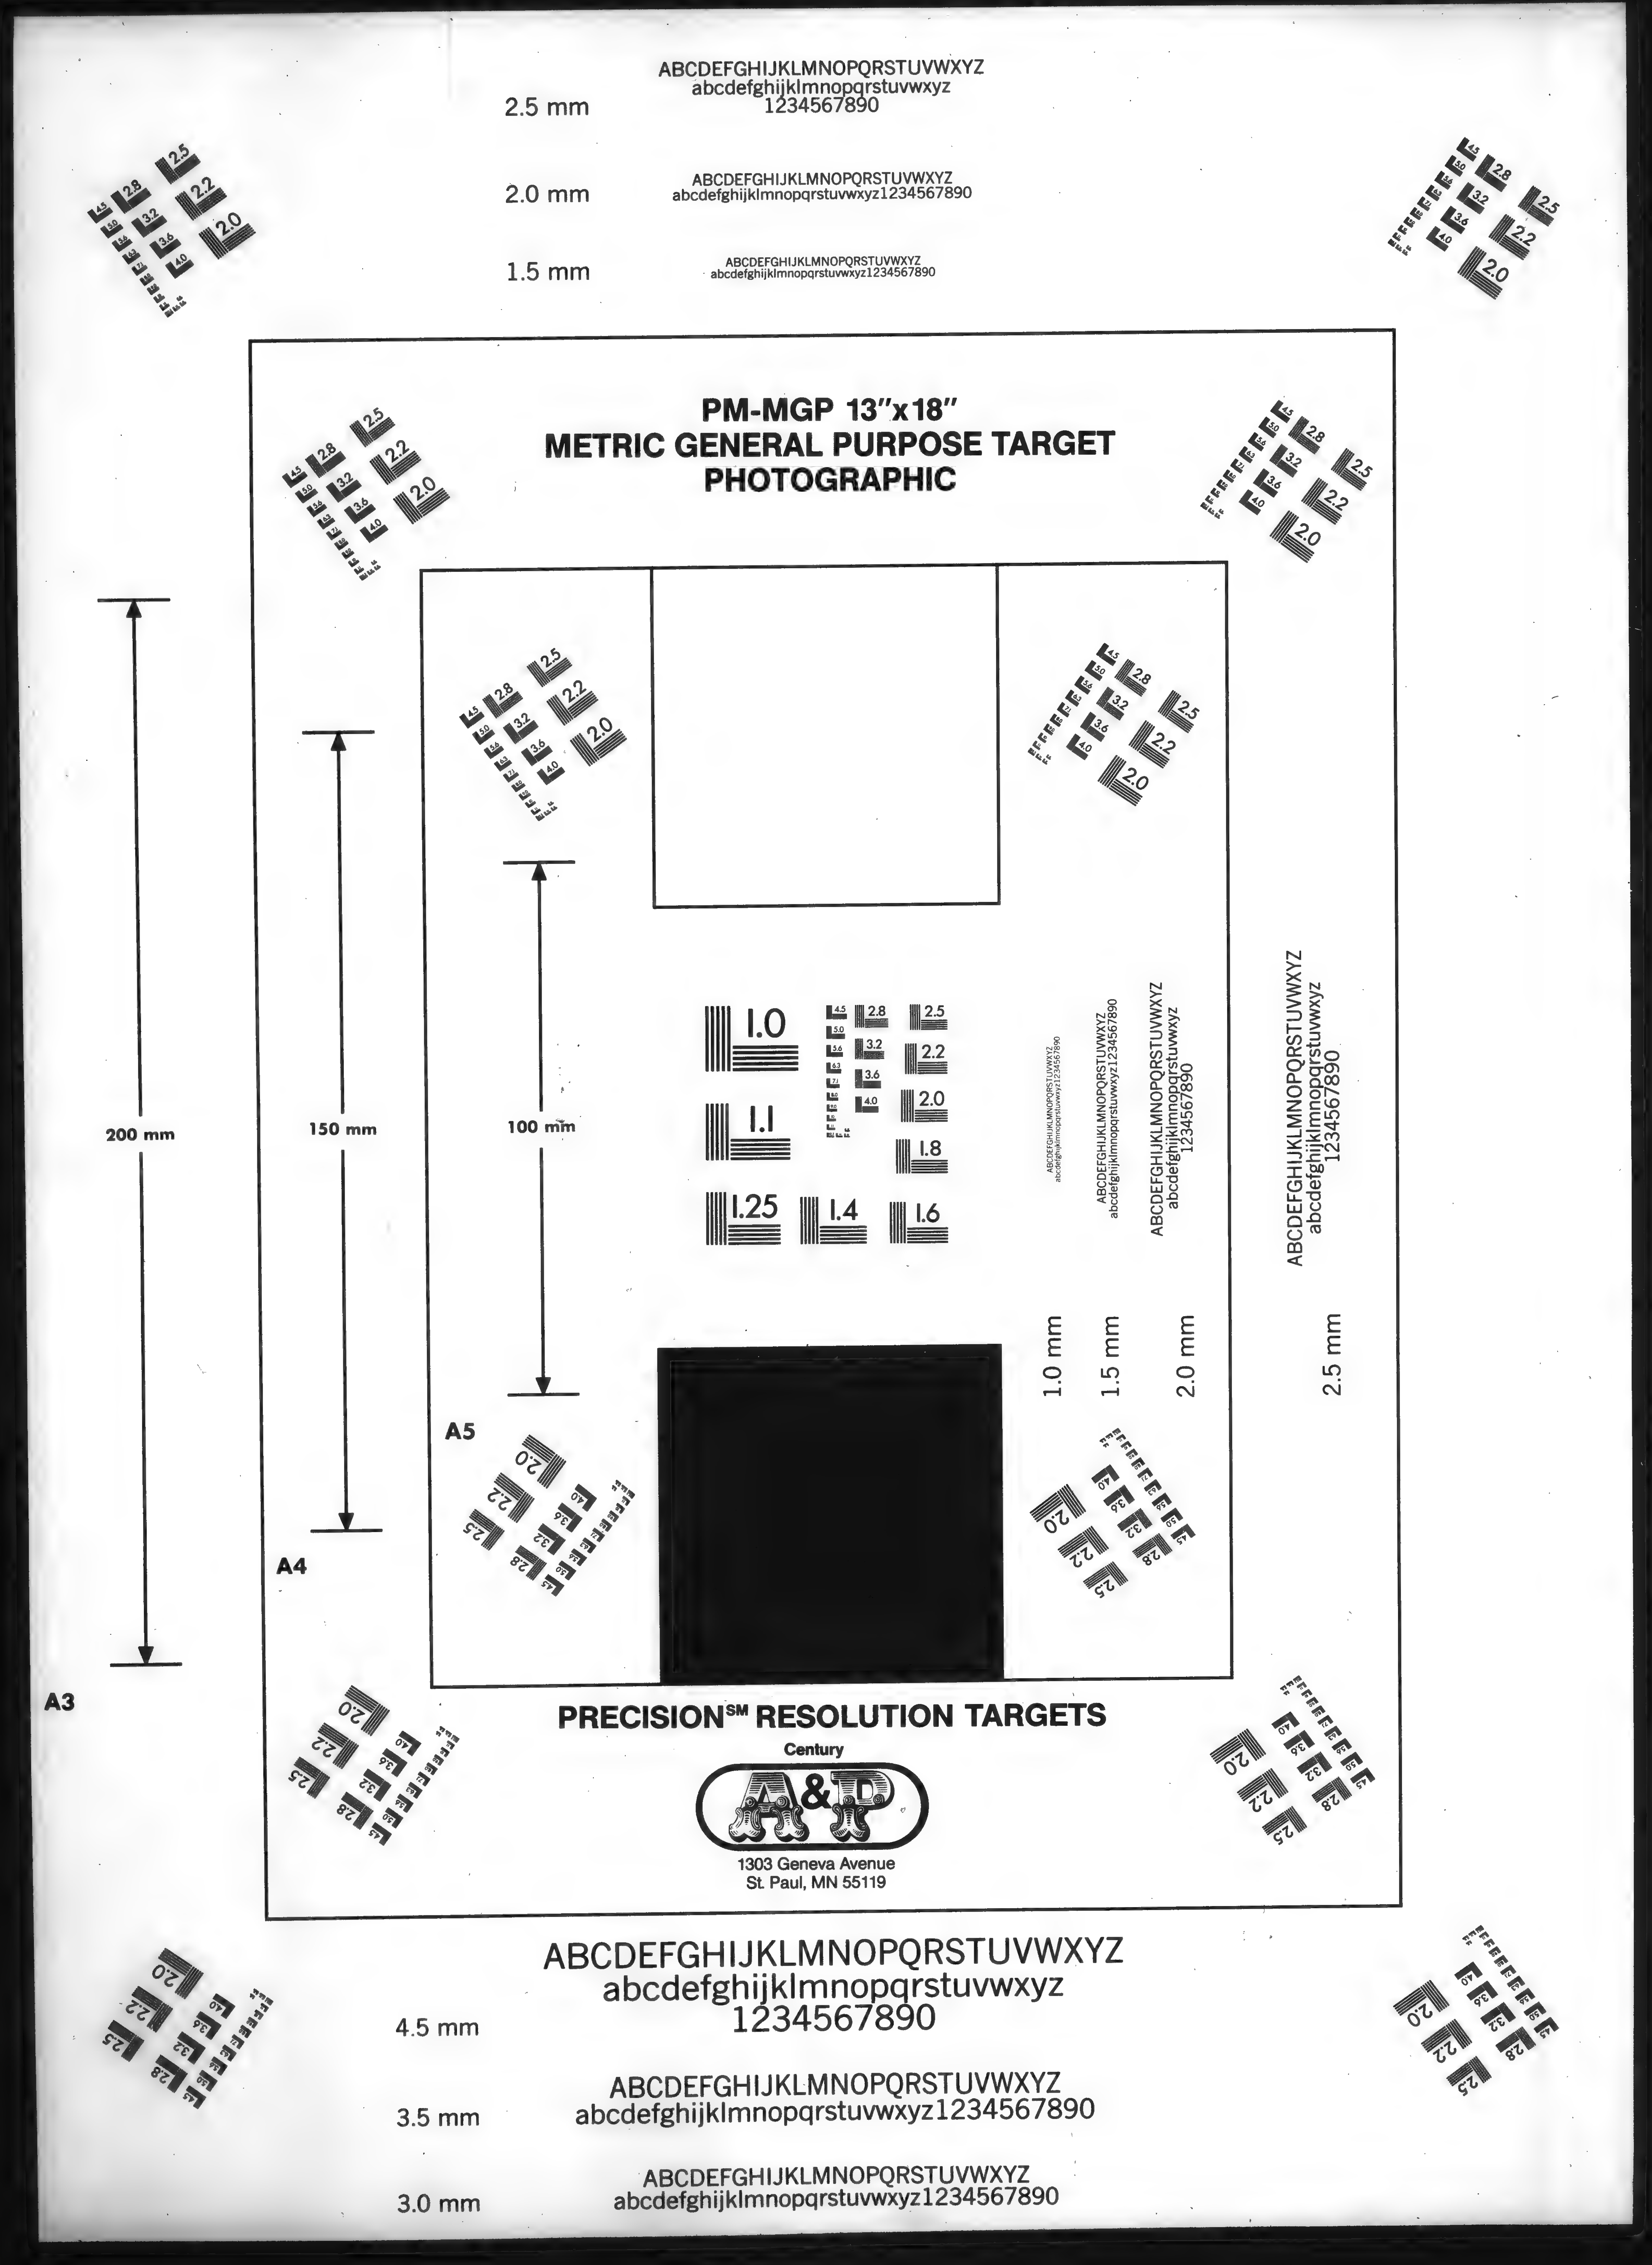
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra open their Providence concerts Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre. The program will include hearings for the first time in Providence of a work by Rachmaninoff and the conductor's reading of Brahms's Fourth Symphony. The symphony, considered one of Brahms's most masterly scores, was last performed locally by the Boston players in 1926, when Eugene Goossens was guest conductor. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation is rated one of his finest.

The Rachmaninoff piece—Providence will hear the composer himself on Dec. 2—is "Etudes Tableaux," five picture studies, originally written for piano. Respighi, the noted Italian composer recently completed an arrangement of the work for full orchestra and the score had its first public performance at Symphony concerts in Boston the past week. Completing the bill are a suite by Arcangelo Corelli, the 17th century Italian composer and the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe." These items have been set in the following order, the concert beginning at 8:15 o'clock.

Suite, Corelli, "Sarabande," "Gigue," "Badinerie"; Symphony in E-minor, No. 4, opus 98, Brahms, Allegro non troppo, Andante moderato, Allegro giocoso, Allegro energico e passionato; "Five Picture Studies" (arranged for orchestra by Ottorino Respighi), "The Sea and the Gulls," "Fair," "Funeral March," "Red Riding Hood and the Wolf," "March" (first performance in Providence); orchestral excerpts, "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite), Ravel, "Lever du Jour," "Pantomime," "Danse Generale."

REDUCTION RATIO

15x



2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitzky

Conducts Boston Symphony's First Providence Concert of Season Tuesday Night in Albee Theatre.

Fourth Symphony in Zestful Mood

Nov 15 Journal

Brahms Work, to Be Played Tuesday Evening, Seen in Altered Light.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is a truism that a work of music may be found cryptic and incomprehensible by many, or even by most, of those who first hear it, and yet become crystal-clear and emotionally stirring to succeeding generations.

Perhaps the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, which Dr. Koussevitzky has placed upon the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, was never actually incomprehensible, even to the most obstinate anti-Brahmsite, but the consensus of contemporary opinion was that this last of the composer's symphonies was an austere, forbidding, prevailingly ungenial and unlovely work, breathing a spirit of pessimism if not of actual misanthropy, suggesting decay and desolation and the sere and yellow leaf.

Some were disposed to read into the music a presentiment of approaching death and a terror of the grave. Riemann speaks of the "crisis of pain" that interrupts the progress of the first movement.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since the Fourth Symphony was put upon paper, and these intervening years have served to set the music in a quite different light. Its one-time harshn and austerity, its dismalness and fo boding, have given place to a heart ng warmth and glow. That much e loyed adjective autumnal may still pplicable to this music, but the autu its mood now seems the autumn, n o' bare branches, biting winds and lo ering clouds, but that season which the true climax of the year, when t trees are a blaze of color, the skies a blue, and there is a tang and even exhilaration in the air.

In short, the E-minor Symphony Brahms seems to us of today the ripe the mellowest of the four. Each of i predecessors has its moment of surpas ing eloquence; the magical horn tha calls so romantically in the finale of the First, the burgeoning of fresh and tender melody at the end of the first movement of the Second, the unforgettable proclamation of the chief theme of the corresponding movement in the Third, which cleaves the air like a shining sword. But even if it never quite rises to these heights the Fourth Symphony may unhesitatingly be pronounced th best sustained, the most continuousl satisfying of the four.

In each of the symphonies of Brahms the third movement is the weakest. Unlike Bruckner and Mahler he seemed unable to recapture the spirit of the Beethoven Scherzo, and in the first three symphonies he substitutes for it a pleasant intermezzo, insufficiently contrasted to the slow movement. The Fourth alone has a true Scherzo. And even here the note of gaiety is forced. There is more of bluster in the music than of robust jollity.

Properly, the last movement of a symphony should be the most impressive, the crown and capstone of the whole. This is true only of the Fourth among the symphonies of Brahms. In each of the others the first movement is the strongest. Structurally this Passacaglia of the Fourth, a series of eight-measure variations on a theme of that length, is Brahms's greatest achievement. In this "huge arch," as Richard Specht terms it, "a seemingly insignificant germ endlessly yields new shoots and blossoms."

The rest of a well-contrasted and promising program need not long detain us in anticipatory comment. The first number upon it, a suite of three movements for string orchestras made by Ettore Pinelli from the violin sonatas of Corelli, shows the depth of feeling and the capacity to charm possessed by the first great master of instrumental music. At the time these words are written the third item which stands on Dr. Koussevitzky's list, Respighi's orchestration of five of Rachmaninoff's Etudes Tableaux for the pianoforte, has not been heard in Boston. When the eminent Russian composer and pianist has played these picture-studies in recital here they have been designated merely by opus number and key, nor are there any titles in the published score. In the orchestral version, however, which in view of its authorship bids fair to be highly effective, the five pieces are entitled, respectively, "The Sea and the Gulls," "The Fair," "Funeral March," "Red Riding-Hood and the Wolf" and "March."

The concluding number of Tuesday's program, the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," consisting of three sections, "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance," displays the French composer's brilliant mastery of the orchestra, as well as his invention of fertile and salient musical motives. And few pieces so well display the virtuosity of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM MUSIC AT LIBRARY

The selections by Corelli, Brahms and Ravel, announced for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program Tuesday night, are represented in the Providence Public Library's music collection as follows:

The Suite by Corelli, consisting of "Sarabande," "Gigue" and "Badinerie," is taken from his "Solos,' opus 5. Czerney has arranged these "Solos" or "Sonatas" for the pianoforte under the title "Corelli's 12 Celebrated Solos." The "Sarabande" is from No. 7, the "Gigue" from No. 9, and "Badinerie," from No. 11.

There are two arrangements available of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, one, for piano solo, the other, for a piano duet (four hands). Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," is in the form of a miniature orchestral score, in addition to a transcription for piano duet, by Leon Roques.

For the better understanding and appreciation of this music, analytical guides and other works are available. Biographical accounts of Corelli are found in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," in Phipson's "Celebrated Violinists," in "Fiddlers Ancient and Modern," by Clarke, and in "Makers of Music" by Grew.

"Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp, and two volumes by Upton, "Standard Symphonies" and "The Standard Concert Guide," the latter in by of et l," rn cil ry i-

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience at Albee Theatre Delighted by Performance of Boston Symphony; Very Old and Newest Music Played

Prov. Journal Nov. 18

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace. may pale; with them as they were heard last night to the full, he rises to the highest planes of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency on the part of the orchestra. The flute solo with its richness of tone, accompanied by strings and a French horn, stood out like a glowing gem of unsurpassed radiance. We know of no other flutist whose tone compares with Mr. Laurent's, and, together with his fellows of the wood wind choir, he gives a tonal character that is well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Mousorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration—trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal; new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry. The thoughtful hearer must marvel at the exquisite beauties of music of which this concert may well be considered as representative, from the simple grace and beauty of line of Corelli on to the vaporous and langourous impressionisms of prophetic modern realists.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff..........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

65

NOV 18 1931

MUSIC

MASTER OF OLD AND NEW

Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow artists of the Boston Symphony came to the Albee Theatre last night for their first concert of the season in this city, and conquered, as is their wont. When we speak of "Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow-artists," we do not mean to imply that the orchestra was a communist republic, but the very reverse. The magnificent thing about Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership is that it never loses its magisterial air or its magisterial substance and that it yet gives one the impression of a perfection arrived at through mutual understanding rather than through the crack of the whip. He triumphs, one feels, not because he has driven anyone to accept his interpretation but because he has the far rarer spiritual power of convincing his men to accept his vision through a mutual exchange of genius. One does not—certainly last night one did not—get the feeling of a company of musicians who had been drilled to carry out a master's purpose. One got rather the idea of a company of musicians, each of whom gloried in his ability to understand the common purpose and the common ideal. The Boston Symphony is led, not driven.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky brought us a most interesting programme. There was the Corelli suite in which the twentieth century helped out the seventeenth, or, rather, acted as a guide for it, holding the advantage of new ways and means which Corelli did not know but which must have been in his sub-consciousness as the future of life lurks inside the tongue of the prophet. There was that hitherto most baffling symphony of Brahms—the fourth—played with an assurance and a loveliness of insight that makes it impossible to understand why Brahms ever doubted the splendor of his own work. There was the "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff as orchestrated by Respighi, which we must hear again before being certain of its musical authority or its musical independence. Finally there was the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet by Ravel—or, rather, part of it, of which we have no doubt whatsoever. It is the product of a musical genius not surpassed since Debussy, a genius so subtle, so colorful and yet so "pure-white" in its ability to reconcile the beauty of antiquity and the beauty of today that it creates a mood which seems universal both in time and space.

* * *

Taking the concert as a whole, we doubt if ever Dr. Koussevitzky has been in better form. The manner in which he brought out, sometimes through the sheer lyricism of his interpretation, (as Browning might have done), the irony of the Brahms symphony was superb. He looked last night as if he had taken all human emotion for his province and was determined to express it. His strings were magnificent, his wood-wind was as lovely as any we have ever heard—particularly, M. Laurent's playing of the flute, no new object of praise in these columns—and the ensemble never wavered.

Whether he was interpreting the lyrical skepticism of Brahms or the simple outlook of "Red Riding Hood" in the Rachmaninoff suite, the effect was the same. Dr. Koussevitzky is known as a modern, but last night we understood that in the essentials of art there is no such thing as a fundamental difference between the old and the new. Differences of methods, of course, there are, but one understands from this brilliant leader and his brilliant followers, that the old held the new in its arms and that the new is but its child, not always recognizable on the surface, to be sure, but always true to the blood.

M. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 18 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience at Albee Theatre Delighted by Performance of Boston Symphony; Very Old and Newest Music Played

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace. may pale; with them as they were heard last night to the full, he rises to the highest planes of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency on the part of the orchestra. The flute solo with its richness of tone, accompanied by strings and a French horn, stood out like a glowing gem of unsurpassed radiance. We know of no other flutist whose tone compares with Mr. Laurent's, and, together with his fellows of the wood wind choir, he gives a tonal character that is well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Mousorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration—trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal; new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry. The thoughtful hearer must marvel at the exquisite beauties of music of which this concert may well be considered as representative, from the simple grace and beauty of line of Corelli on to the vaporous and langourous impressionisms of prophetic modern realists.

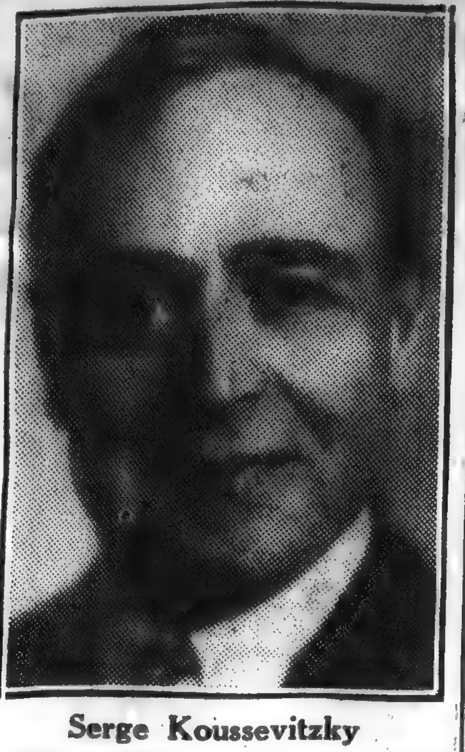
One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff..........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY



Serge Koussevitzky

Conducts Boston Symphony's First Providence Concert of Season Tuesday Night in Albee Theatre.

Fourth Symphony in Zestful Mood

Nov 15 Journal

Brahms Work, to Be Played Tuesday Evening, Seen in Altered Light.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is a truism that a work of music may be found cryptic and incomprehensible by many, or even by most, of those who first hear it, and yet become crystal-clear and emotionally stirring to succeeding generations.

Perhaps the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, which Dr. Koussevitzky has placed upon the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, was never actually incomprehensible, even to the most obstinate anti-Brahmsite, but the consensus of contemporary opinion was that this last of the composer's symphonies was an austere, forbidding, prevailingly ungenial and unlovely work, breathing a spirit of pessimism if not of actual misanthropy, suggesting decay and desolation and the sere and yellow leaf.

Some were disposed to read into the music a presentiment of approaching death and a terror of the grave. Riemann speaks of the "crisis of pain" that interrupts the progress of the first movement.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since the Fourth Symphony was put upon paper, and these intervening years have served to set the music in a quite different light. Its one-time harshness and austerity, its dismalness and foreboding, have given place to a heartening warmth and glow. That much employed adjective autumnal may still be applicable to this music, but the autumn of its mood now seems the autumn, not of bare branches, biting winds and lowering clouds, but that season which is the true climax of the year, when the trees are a blaze of color, the skies are blue, and there is a tang and even an exhilaration in the air.

In short, the E-minor Symphony of Brahms seems to us of today the ripest, the mellowest of the four. Each of its predecessors has its moment of surpassing eloquence: the magical horn that calls so romantically in the finale of the First, the burgeoning of fresh and tender melody at the end of the first movement of the Second, the unforgettable proclamation of the chief theme of the corresponding movement in the Third, which cleaves the air like a shining sword. But even if it never quite rises to these heights the Fourth Symphony may unhesitatingly be pronounced the best sustained, the most continuously satisfying of the four.

In each of the symphonies of Brahms the third movement is the weakest. Unlike Bruckner and Mahler he seemed unable to recapture the spirit of the Beethoven Scherzo, and in the first three symphonies he substitutes for it a pleasant intermezzo, insufficiently contrasted to the slow movement. The Fourth alone has a true Scherzo. And even here the note of gaiety is forced. There is more of bluster in the music than of robust jollity.

Properly, the last movement of a symphony should be the most impressive, the crown and capstone of the whole. This is true only of the Fourth among the symphonies of Brahms. In each of the others the first movement is the strongest. Structurally this Passacaglia of the Fourth, a series of eight-measure variations on a theme of that length, is Brahms's greatest achievement. In this "huge arch," as Richard Specht terms it, "a seemingly insignificant germ endlessly yields new shoots and blossoms."

The rest of a well-contrasted and promising program need not long detain us in anticipatory comment. The first number upon it, a suite of three movements for string orchestras made by Ettore Pinelli from the violin sonatas of Corelli, shows the depth of feeling and the capacity to charm possessed by the first great master of instrumental music. At the time these words are written the third item which stands on Dr. Koussevitzky's list, Respighi's orchestration of five of Rachmaninoff's Etudes Tableaux for the pianoforte, has not been heard in Boston. When the eminent Russian composer and pianist has played these picture-studies in recital here they have been designated merely by opus number and key, nor are there any titles in the published score. In the orchestral version, however, which in view of its authorship bids fair to be highly effective, the five pieces are entitled, respectively, "The Sea and the Gulls," "The Fair," "Funeral March," "Red Riding-Hood and the Wolf" and "March."

The concluding number of Tuesday's program, the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," consisting of three sections, "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance," displays the French composer's brilliant mastery of the orchestra, as well as his invention of fertile and salient musical motives. And few pieces so well display the virtuosity of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

MUSIC AT LIBRARY

The selections by Corelli, Brahms and Ravel, announced for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program Tuesday night, are represented in the Providence Public Library's music collection as follows:

The Suite by Corelli, consisting of "Sarabande," "Gigue" and "Badinerie," is taken from his "Solos,' opus 5. Czerney has arranged these "Solos" or "Sonatas" for the pianoforte under the title "Corelli's 12 Celebrated Solos." The "Sarabande" is from No. 7, the "Gigue" from No. 9, and "Badinerie," from No. 11.

There are two arrangements available of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, one, for piano solo, the other, for a piano duet (four hands). Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," is in the form of a miniature orchestral score, in addition to a transcription for piano duet, by Leon Roques.

For the better understanding and appreciation of this music, analytical guides and other works are available. Biographical accounts of Corelli are found in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," in Phipson's "Celebrated Violinists," in "Fiddlers Ancient and Modern," by Clarke, and in "Makers of Music" by Grew.

"Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp, and two volumes by Upton, "Standard Symphonies" and "The Standard Concert Guide," the latter in the new edition, brought up-to-date by Borowski, furnish excellent analyses of the Brahms symphony.

The plot of the ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," is given in "Debussy and Ravel," by F. H. Shera; likewise in "Modern French Music," by E. B. Hill, while Cecil Gray in his "Survey of Contemporary Music" furnishes an enthusiastic criticism of the music itself.

Of timely interest in connection with this concert is the biography of Koussevitzky received the past week. It is by Arthur Lourié and has been translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. The author writes of Koussevitzky's boundless enthusiasm for music, of the development of his career as a double-bass virtuoso soloist, of the foundation of his own orchestra and the concerts given under his leadership in Europe, and of his work in America, especially the reorganization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has through his directing been raised to a position higher than ever before attained.

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience at Albee Theatre Delighted by Performance of Boston Symphony; Very Old and Newest Music Played

Prov. Journal Nov. 18

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace, may pale; with them as they were heard last night to the full, he rises to the highest planes of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency on the part of the orchestra. The flute solo with its richness of tone, accompanied by strings and a French horn, stood out like a glowing gem of unsurpassed radiance. We know of no other flutist whose tone compares with Mr. Laurent's, and, together with his fellows of the wood wind choir, he gives a tonal character that is well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Moussorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration—trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal, new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry. The thoughtful hearer must marvel at the exquisite beauties of music of which this concert may well be considered as representative, from the simple grace and beauty of line of Corelli on to the vaporous and langourous impressionisms of prophetic modern realists.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff.........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

65

NOV 18 1931

-:- MUSIC -:-

MASTER OF OLD AND NEW

Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow-artists of the Boston Symphony came to the Albee Theatre last night for their first concert of the season in this city, and conquered, as is their wont. When we speak of "Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow-artists," we do not mean to imply that the orchestra was a communist republic, but the very reverse. The magnificent thing about Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership is that it never loses its magisterial air or its magisterial substance and that it yet gives one the impression of a perfection arrived at through mutual understanding rather than through the crack of the whip. He triumphs, one feels, not because he has driven anyone to accept his interpretation but because he has the far rarer spiritual power of convincing his men to accept his vision through a mutual exchange of genius. One does not—certainly last night one did not—get the feeling of a company of musicians who had been drilled to carry out a master's purpose. One got rather the idea of a company of musicians, each of whom gloried in his ability to understand the common purpose and the common ideal. The Boston Symphony is led, not driven.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky brought us a most interesting programme. There was the Corelli suite in which the twentieth century helped out the seventeenth, or, rather, acted as a guide for it, holding the advantage of new ways and means which Corelli did not know but which must have been in his sub-consciousness as the future of life lurks inside the tongue of the prophet. There was that hitherto most baffling symphony of Brahms—the fourth—played with an assurance and a loveliness of insight that makes it impossible to understand why Brahms ever doubted the splendor of his own work. There was the "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff as orchestrated by Respighi, which we must hear again before being certain of its musical authority or its musical independence. Finally there was the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet by Ravel—or, rather, part of it, of which we have no doubt whatsoever. It is the product of a musical genius not surpassed since Debussy, a genius so subtle, so colorful and yet so "pure-white" in its ability to reconcile the beauty of antiquity and the beauty of today that it creates a mood which seems universal both in time and space.

* * *

Taking the concert as a whole, we doubt if ever Dr. Koussevitzky has been in better form. The manner in which he brought out, sometimes through the sheer lyricism of his interpretation, (as Browning might have done), the irony of the Brahms symphony was superb. He looked last night as if he had taken all human emotion for his province and was determined to express it. His strings were magnificent, his wood-wind was as lovely as any we have ever heard—particularly, M. Laurent's playing of the flute, no new object of praise in these columns—and the ensemble never wavered.

Whether he was interpreting the lyrical skepticism of Brahms or the simple outlook of "Red Riding Hood" in the Rachmaninoff suite, the effect was the same. Dr. Koussevitzky is known as a modern, but last night we understood that in the essentials of art there is no such thing as a fundamental difference between the old and the new. Differences of methods, of course, there are, but one understands from this brilliant leader and his brilliant followers, that the old held the new in its arms and that the new is but its child, not always recognizable on the surface, to be sure, but always true to the blood.

M. J.

counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace, may pale; with them as they were heard last night to the full, he rises to the highest planes of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency on the part of the orchestra. The flute solo with its richness of tone, accompanied by strings and a French horn, stood out like a glowing gem of unsurpassed radiance. We know of no other flutist whose tone compares with Mr. Laurent's, and, together with his fellows of the wood wind choir, he gives a tonal character that is were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration—trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal, new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry. The thoughtful hearer must marvel at the exquisite beauties of music of which this concert may well be considered as representative, from the simple grace and beauty of line of Corelli on to the vaporous and langourous impressionisms of prophetic modern realists.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff.........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

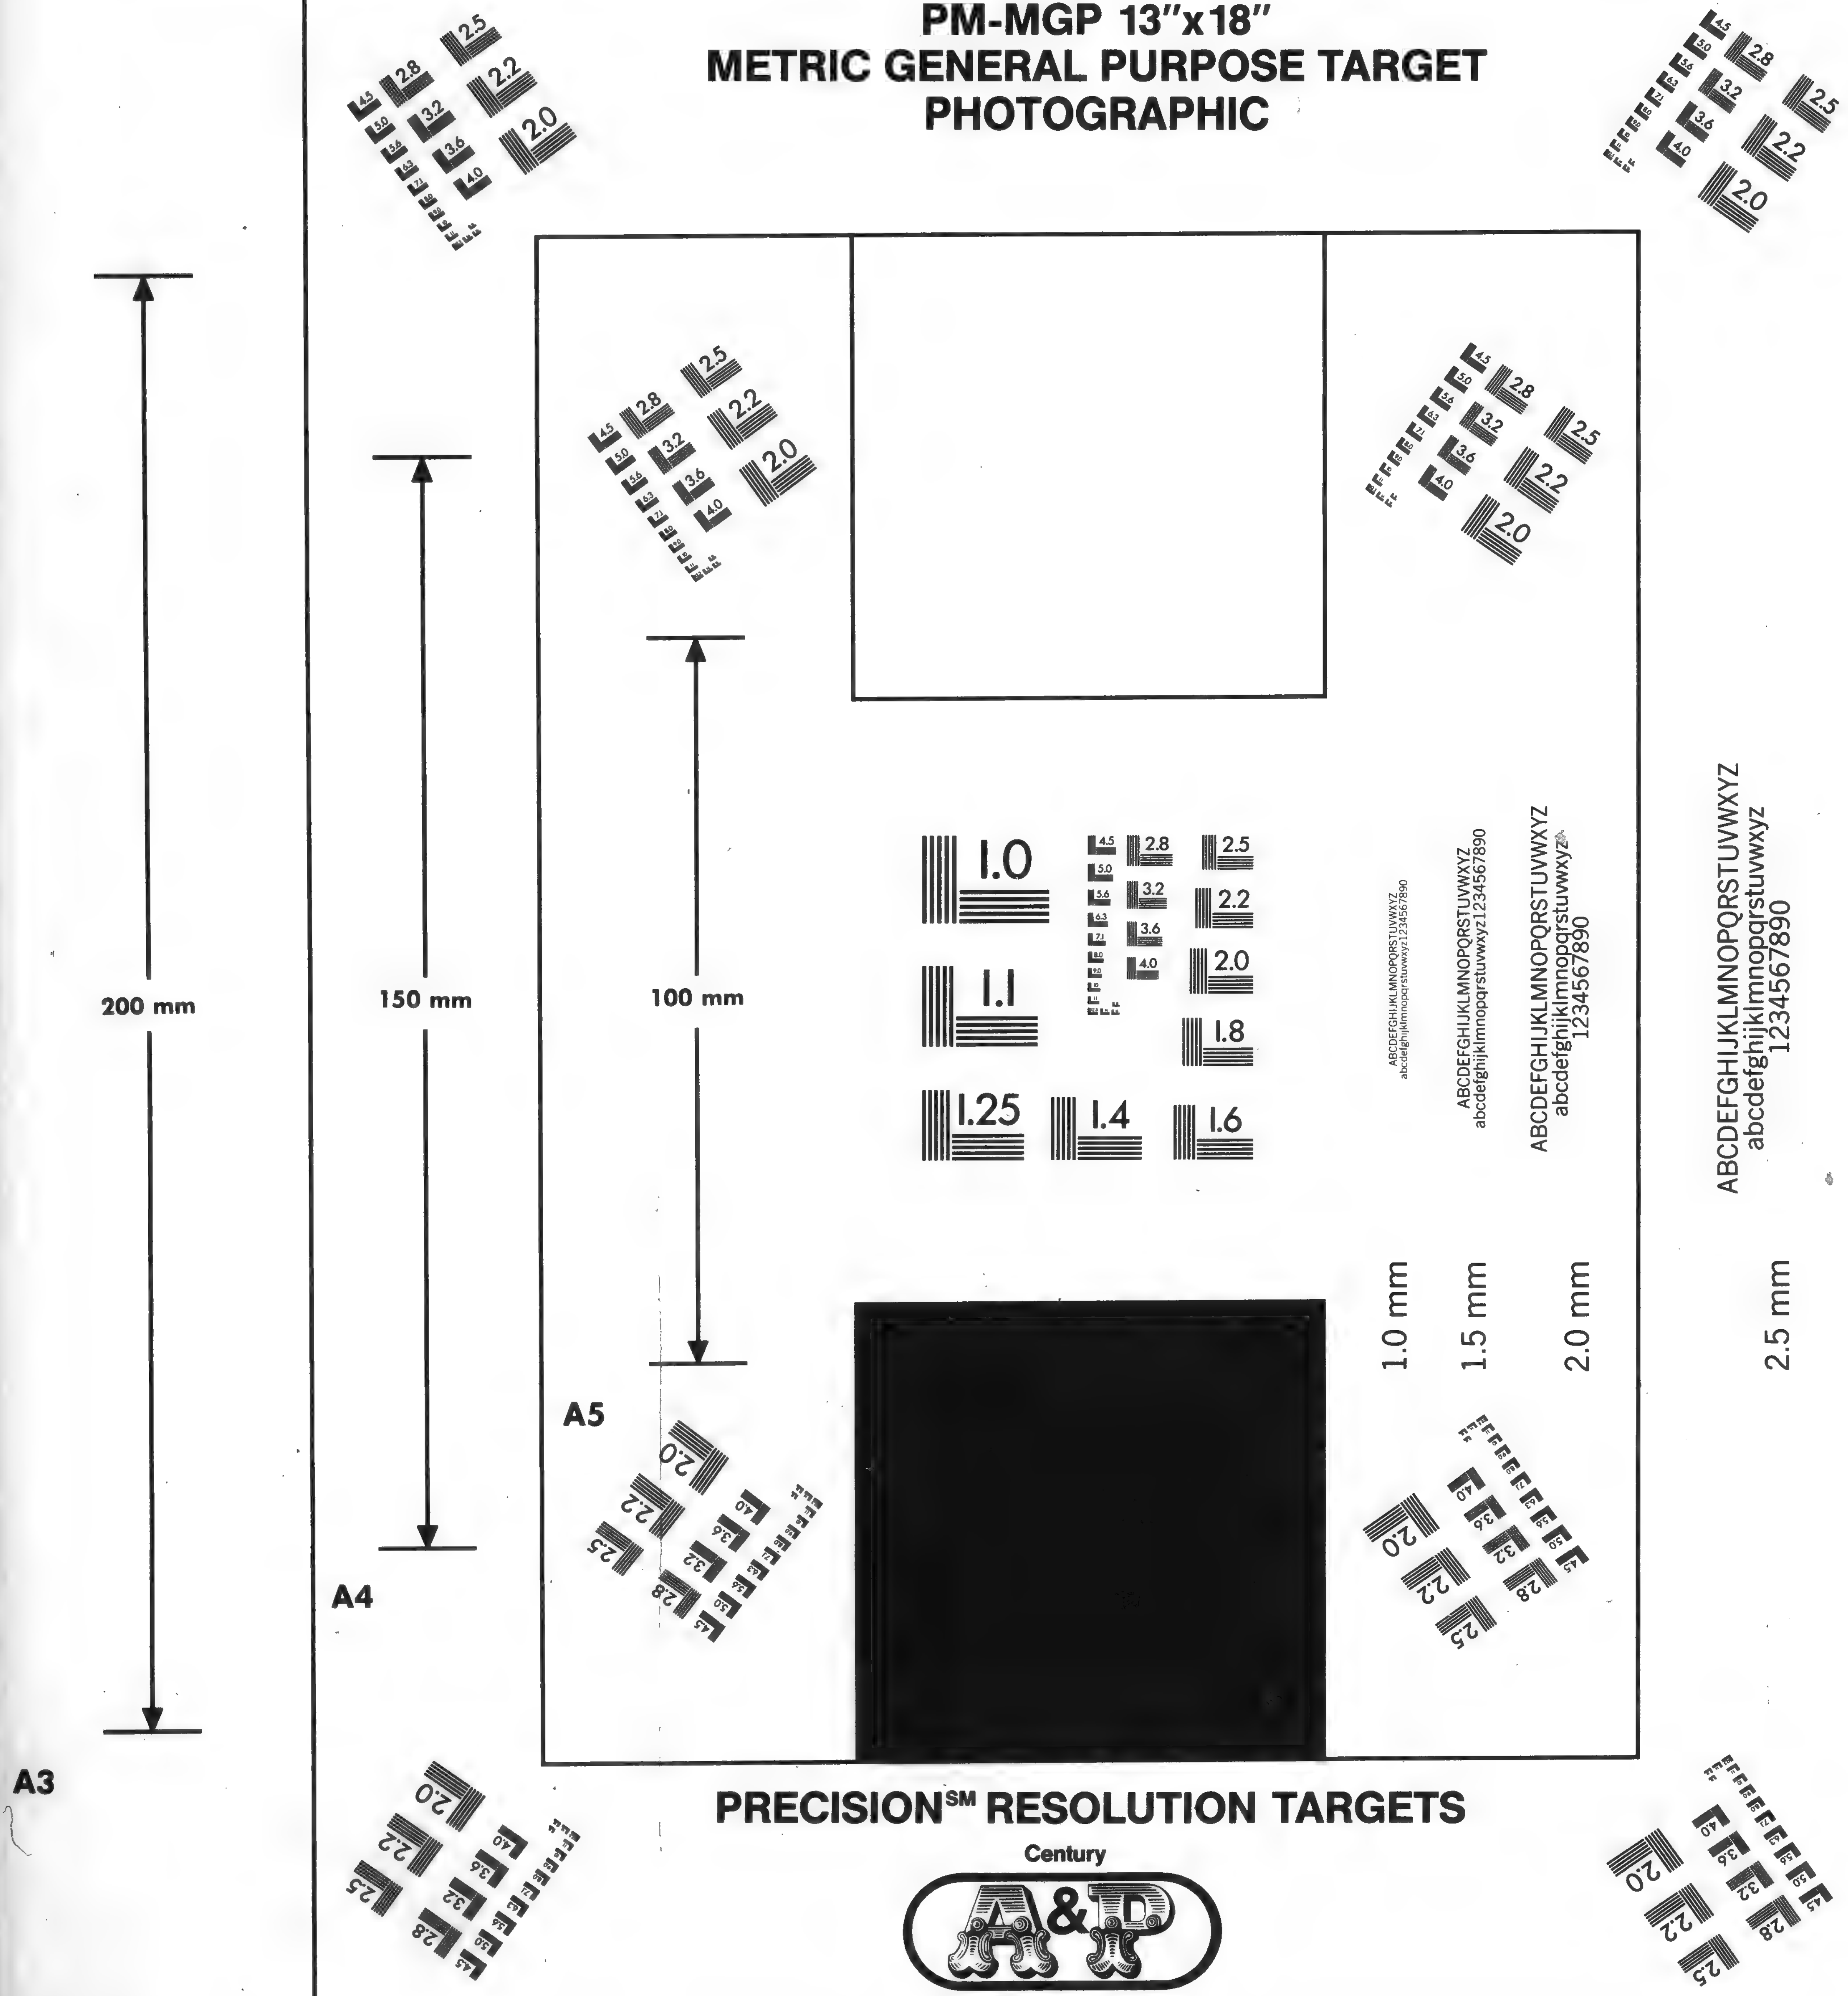
DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY

Serge Koussevitzky

Conducts Boston Symphony's First Providence Concert of Season Tuesday Night in Albee Theatre.

Fourth Symphony in Zestful Mood

Nov 15 ~~Journal~~

Brahms Work, to Be Played Tuesday Evening, Seen in Altered Light.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is a truism that a work of music may be found cryptic and incomprehensible by many, or even by most, of those who first hear it, and yet become crystal-clear and emotionally stirring to succeeding generations.

Perhaps the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, which Dr. Koussevitzky has placed upon the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, was never actually incomprehensible, even to the most obstinate anti-Brahmsite, but the consensus of contemporary opinion was that this last of the composer's symphonies was an austere, forbidding, prevailingly ungenial and unlovely work, breathing a spirit of pessimism if not of actual misanthropy, suggesting decay and desolation and the sere and yellow leaf.

Some were disposed to read into the music a presentiment of approaching death and a terror of the grave. Riemann speaks of the "crisis of pain" that interrupts the progress of the first movement.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since the Fourth Symphony was put upon paper, and these intervening years have served to set the music in a quite different light. Its one-time harsh and austerity, its dismalness and fo boding, have given place to a heart ng warmth and glow. That much loyed adjective autumnal may still plicable to this music, but the autu its mood now seems the autumn o bare branches, biting winds and lo ering clouds, but that season which the true climax of the year, when t trees are a blaze of color, the skies blue, and there is a tang and even exhilaration in the air.

In short, the E-minor Symphony Brahms seems to us of today the rip the mellowest of the four. Each of predecessors has its moment of surpa ing eloquence: the magical horn th calls so romantically in the finale of th First, the burgeoning of fresh and tende melody at the end of the first movemen of the Second, the unforgettable proc lamation of the chief theme of the cor responding movement in the Third, which cleaves the air like a shining sword. But even if it never quite rises to these heights the Fourth Symphon may unhesitatingly be pronounced th best sustained, the most continuous satisfying of the four.

In each of the symphonies of Brahms the third movement is the weakest. Unlike Bruckner and Mahler he seemed unable to recapture the spirit of the Beethoven Scherzo, and in the first three symphonies he substitutes for it a pleasant intermezzo, insufficiently contrasted to the slow movement. The Fourth alone has a true Scherzo. And even here the note of gaiety is forced. There is more of bluster in the music than of robust jollity.

Properly, the last movement of a symphony should be the most impressive, the crown and capstone of the whole. This is true only of the Fourth among the symphonies of Brahms. In each of the others the first movement is the strongest. Structurally this Passacaglia of the Fourth, a series of eight-measure variations on a theme of that length, is Brahms's greatest achievement. In this "huge arch," as Richard Specht terms it, "a seemingly insignificant germ endlessly yields new shoots and blossoms."

The rest of a well-contrasted and promising program need not long detain us in anticipatory comment. The first number upon it, a suite of three movements for string orchestras made by Ettore Pinelli from the violin sonatas of Corelli, shows the depth of feeling and the capacity to charm possessed by the first great master of instrumental music. At the time these words are written the third item which stands on Dr. Koussevitzky's list, Respighi's orchestration of five of Rachmaninoff's Etudes Tableaux for the pianoforte, has not been heard in Boston. When the eminent Russian composer and pianist has played these picture-studies in recital here they have been designated merely by opus number and key, nor are there any titles in the published score. In the orchestral version, however, which in view of its authorship bids fair to be highly effective, the five pieces are entitled, respectively, "The Sea and the Gulls," "The Fair," "Funeral March," "Red Riding-Hood and the Wolf" and "March."

The concluding number of Tuesday's program, the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," consisting of three sections, "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance," displays the French composer's brilliant mastery of the orchestra, as well as his invention of fertile and salient musical motives. And few pieces so well display the virtuosity of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM MUSIC AT LIBRARY

The selections by Corelli, Brahms and Ravel, announced for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program Tuesday night, are represented in the Providence Public Library's music collection as follows:

The Suite by Corelli, consisting of "Sarabande," "Gigue" and "Badinerie," is taken from his "Solos,' opus 5. Czerney has arranged these "Solos" or "Sonatas" for the pianoforte under the title "Corelli's 12 Celebrated Solos." The "Sarabande" is from No. 7, the "Gigue" from No. 9, and "Badinerie," from No. 11.

There are two arrangements available of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, one, for piano solo, the other, for a piano duet (four hands). Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," is in the form of a miniature orchestral score, in addition to a transcription for piano duet, by Leon Roques.

For the better understanding and appreciation of this music, analytical guides and other works are available. Biographical accounts of Corelli are found in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," in Phipson's "Celebrated Violinists," in "Fiddlers Ancient and Modern," by Clarke, and in "Makers of Music" by Grew.

"Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp, and two volumes by Upton, "Standard Symphonies" and "The Standard Concert Guide," the latter in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 18 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience at Albee Theatre Delighted by Performance of Boston Symphony; Very Old ~~and~~ Newest Music Played

Prov. Journal Nov. 18

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace, may pale with them as they were heard last night to the full, he rises to the highest planes of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Moussorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration - trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal, new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry. The thoughtful hearer must marvel at the exquisite beauties of music of which this concert may well be considered as representative, from the simple grace and beauty of line of Corelli on to the vaporous and langourous impressionisms of prophetic modern realists.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff..........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel..."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS TRIBUNE

65

NOV 18 1931

-:- MUSIC -:-

MASTER OF OLD AND NEW

Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow-artists of the Boston Symphony came to the Albee Theatre last night for their first concert of the season in this city, and conquered, as is their wont. When we speak of "Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow-artists," we do not mean to imply that the orchestra was a communist republic, but the very reverse. The magnificent thing about Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership is that it never loses its magisterial air or its magisterial substance and that it yet gives one the impression of a perfection arrived at through mutual understanding rather than through the crack of the whip. He triumphs, one feels, not because he has driven anyone to accept his interpretation but because he has the far rarer spiritual power of convincing his men to accept his vision through a mutual exchange of genius. One does not—certainly last night one did not—get the feeling of a company of musicians who had been drilled to carry out a master's purpose. One got rather the idea of a company of musicians, each of whom gloried in his ability to understand the common purpose and the common ideal. The Boston Symphony is led, not driven.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky brought us a most interesting programme. There was the Corelli suite in which the twentieth century helped out the seventeenth, or, rather, acted as a guide for it, holding the advantage of new ways and means which Corelli did not know but which must have been in his sub-consciousness as the future of life lurks inside the tongue of the prophet. There was that hitherto most baffling symphony of Brahms—the fourth—played with an assurance and a loveliness of insight that makes it impossible to understand why Brahms ever doubted the splendor of his own work. There was the "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff as orchestrated by Respighi, which we must hear again before being certain of its musical authority or its musical independence. Finally there was the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet by Ravel—or, rather, part of it, of which we have no doubt whatsoever. It is the product of a musical genius not surpassed since Debussy, a genius so subtle, so colorful and yet so "pure-white" in its ability to reconcile the beauty of antiquity and the beauty of today that it creates a mood which seems universal both in time and space.

* * *

Taking the concert as a whole, we doubt if ever Dr. Koussevitzky has been in better form. The manner in which he brought out, sometimes through the sheer lyricism of his interpretation, (as Browning might have done), the irony of the Brahms symphony was superb. He looked last night as if he had taken all human emotion for his province and was determined to express it. His strings were magnificent, his wood-wind was as lovely as any we have ever heard—particularly, M. Laurent's playing of the flute, no new object of praise in these columns—and the ensemble never wavered.

Whether he was interpreting the lyrical skepticism of Brahms or the simple outlook of "Red Riding Hood" in the Rachmaninoff suite, the effect was the same. Dr. Koussevitzky is known as a modern, but last night we understood that in the essentials of art there is no such thing as a fundamental difference between the old and the new. Differences of methods, of course, there are, but one understands from this brilliant leader and his brilliant followers, that the old held the new in its arms and that the new is but its child, not always recognizable on the surface, to be sure, but always true to the blood.

M. J.

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience at Albee Theatre Delighted by Performance of Boston Symphony; Very Old and Newest Music Played

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace, may pale with them as they were heard last night to well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Moussorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration—trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One

Serge Koussevitzky

Conducts Boston Symphony's First Providence Concert of Season Tuesday Night in Albee Theatre.

Fourth Symphony in Zestful Mood

Nov 15 Journal

Brahms Work, to Be Played Tuesday Evening, Seen in Altered Light.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is a truism that a work of music may be found cryptic and incomprehensible by many, or even by most, of those who first hear it, and yet become crystal-clear and emotionally stirring to succeeding generations.

Perhaps the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, which Dr. Koussevitzky has placed upon the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, was never actually incomprehensible, even to the most obstinate anti-Brahmsite, but the consensus of contemporary opinion was that this last of the composer's symphonies was an austere, forbidding, prevailingly ungenial and unlovely work, breathing a spirit of pessimism if not of actual misanthropy, suggesting decay and desolation and the sere and yellow leaf.

Some were disposed to read into the music a presentiment of approaching death and a terror of the grave. Riemann speaks of the "crisis of pain" that interrupts the progress of the first movement.

Nearly half a century has elapsed since the Fourth Symphony was put upon paper, and these intervening years have served to set the music in a quite different light. Its one-time harsh and austerity, its dismalness and fo boding, have given place to a heart ng warmth and glow. That much loyed adjective autumnal may still plicable to this music, but the autu its mood now seems the autumn, o bare branches, biting winds and lo ering clouds, but that season which the true climax of the year, when t trees are a blaze of color, the skies blue, and there is a tang and even exhilaration in the air.

In short, the E-minor Symphony Brahms seems to us of today the ripe the mellowest of the four. Each of predecessors has its moment of surpa ing eloquence: the magical horn th calls so romantically in the finale of th First, the burgeoning of fresh and tende melody at the end of the first movemen of the Second, the unforgettable proclamation of the chief theme of the corresponding movement in the Third, which cleaves the air like a shining sword. But even if it never quite rises to these heights the Fourth Symphony may unhesitatingly be pronounced the best sustained, the most continuous satisfying of the four.

In each of the symphonies of Brahms the third movement is the weakest. Unlike Bruckner and Mahler he seemed unable to recapture the spirit of the Beethoven Scherzo, and in the first three symphonies he substitutes for it a pleasant intermezzo, insufficiently contrasted to the slow movement. The Fourth alone has a true Scherzo. And even here the note of gaiety is forced. There is more of bluster in the music than of robust jollity.

each of the others the first movement is the strongest. Structurally this Passacaglia of the Fourth, a series of eight-measure variations on a theme of that length, is Brahms's greatest achievement. In this "huge arch," as Richard Specht terms it, "a seemingly insignificant germ endlessly yields new shoots and blossoms."

The rest of a well-contrasted and promising program need not long detain us in anticipatory comment. The first number upon it, a suite of three movements for string orchestras made by Ettore Pinelli from the violin sonatas of Corelli, shows the depth of feeling and the capacity to charm possessed by the first great master of instrumental music. At the time these words are written the third item which stands on Dr. Koussevitzky's list, Respighi's orchestration of five of Rachmaninoff's Etudes Tableaux for the pianoforte, has not been heard in Boston. When the eminent Russian composer and pianist has played these picture-studies in recital here they have been designated merely by opus number and key, nor are there any titles in the published score. In the orchestral version, however, which in view of its authorship bids fair to be highly effective, the five pieces are entitled, respectively, "The Sea and the Gulls," "The Fair," "Funeral March," "Red Riding-Hood and the Wolf" and "March."

The concluding number of Tuesday's program, the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," consisting of three sections, "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance," displays the French composer's brilliant mastery of the orchestra, as well as his invention of fertile and salient musical motives. And few pieces so well display the virtuosity of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

MUSIC AT LIBRARY

The selections by Corelli, Brahms and Ravel, announced for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program Tuesday night, are represented in the Providence Public Library's music collection as follows:

The Suite by Corelli, consisting of "Sarabande," "Gigue" and "Badinerie," is taken from his "Solos,' opus 5. Czerney has arranged these "Solos" or "Sonatas" for the pianoforte under the title "Corelli's 12 Celebrated Solos." The "Sarabande" is from No. 7, the "Gigue" from No. 9, and "Badinerie," from No. 11.

There are two arrangements available of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, one, for piano solo, the other, for a piano duet (four hands). Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," is in the form of a miniature orchestral score, in addition to a transcription for piano duet, by Leon Roques.

For the better understanding and appreciation of this music, analytical guides and other works are available. Biographical accounts of Corelli are found in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," in Phipson's "Celebrated Violinists," in "Fiddlers Ancient and Modern," by Clarke, and in "Makers of Music" by Grew.

"Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp, and two volumes by Upton, "Standard Symphonies" and "The Standard Concert Guide," the latter in

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 18 1931

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Capacity Audience at Albee Theatre Delighted by Performance of Boston Symphony; Very Old and Newest Music Played

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace, may pale; with them as they were heard last night to the full, he rises to the highest planes of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency on the part of the orchestra. The flute solo with its richness of tone, accompanied by strings and a French horn, stood out like a glowing gem of unsurpassed radiance. We know of no other flutist whose tone compares with Mr. Laurent's, and, together with his fellows of the wood wind choir, he gives a tonal character that is well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Mousorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration—trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal, new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry. The thoughtful hearer must marvel at the exquisite beauties of music of which this concert may well be considered as representative, from the simple grace and beauty of line of Corelli on to the vaporous and langourous impressionisms of prophetic modern realists.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff..........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

Comment in Season

Capacity Audience at Albee Theatre Delighted by Performance of Boston Symphony; Very Old and Newest Music Played

Prov. Journal Nov. 18

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolific time. It contains some of the most beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humor and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahms and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of the initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal developments and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which has never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahms demands the most perfect artistry of all choirs for esthetic and interpretative expression, and this was at all times forthcoming in the superb exposition of this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he is never commonplace, may pale; with them as they were heard last night to the full, he rises to the highest planes of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Mousorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music may be more intelligible to the average hearer than the Brahms, for it has explanatory notes and a libretto of sorts, which the Brahms has not, so it would be well not to pursue our analogy between words and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were received with the greatest warmth and cordiality. The "Sea" motive was most interesting, with its undulating surges, the plash of the screaming gulls was not hard to imagine and the melodic material slightly reminiscent of Mendelssohn was natural and easily flowing. The verve and trumpery of "The Fair" evoked a murmur of pleasure from the audience, which was quite captivated by the "Little Red Riding Hood." And why not? There were unmistakably the roar and whining of the wolf, his pawing patter as he approached and his sinister circling to seek a place of admission. This was one of the most remarkable pieces of music realism we have ever heard, and we venture to predict its immediate success and popularity in the world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" soon merged into the rhapsodic, only to return to thoughtful solemnity. The "March" was the most modernistic of all and introduced a figure quite novel in orchestration—trumpets in chords over bassoons, with interesting and telling effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal, new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry. The thoughtful hearer must marvel at the exquisite beauties of music of which this concert may well be considered as representative, from the simple grace and beauty of line of Corelli on to the vaporous and langourous impressionisms of prophetic modern realists.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff..........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

MUSIC

MASTER OF OLD AND NEW

Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow artists of the Boston Symphony came to the Albee Theatre last night for their first concert of the season in this city, and conquered, as is their wont. When we speak of "Dr. Koussevitzky and his fellow-artists," we do not mean to imply that the orchestra was a communist republic, but the very reverse. The magnificent thing about Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership is that it never loses its magisterial air or its magisterial substance and that it yet gives one the impression of a perfection arrived at through mutual understanding rather than through the crack of the whip. He triumphs, one feels, not because he has driven anyone to accept his interpretation but because he has the far rarer spiritual power of convincing his men to accept his vision through a mutual exchange of genius. One does not—certainly last night one did not—get the feeling of a company of musicians who had been drilled to carry out a master's purpose. One got rather the idea of a company of musicians, each of whom gloried in his ability to understand the common purpose and the common ideal. The Boston Symphony is led, not driven.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky brought us a most interesting programme. There was the Corelli suite in which the twentieth century helped out the seventeenth, or, rather, acted as a guide for it, holding the advantage of new ways and means which Corelli did not know but which must have been in his sub-consciousness as the future of life lurks inside the tongue, of the prophet. There was that hitherto most baffling symphony of Brahms—the fourth—played with an assurance and a loveliness of insight that makes it impossible to understand why Brahms ever doubted the splendor of his own work. There was the "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff as orchestrated by Respighi, which we must hear again before being certain of its musical authority or its musical independence. Finally there was the "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet by Ravel—or, rather, part of it, of which we have no doubt whatsoever. It is the product of a musical genius not surpassed since Debussy, a genius so subtle, so colorful and yet so "pure-white" in its ability to reconcile the beauty of antiquity and the beauty of today that it creates a mood which seems universal both in time and space.

* * *

Taking the concert as a whole, we doubt if ever Dr. Koussevitzky has been in better form. The manner in which he brought out, sometimes through the sheer lyricism of his interpretation, (as Browning might have done), the irony of the Brahms symphony was superb. He looked last night as if he had taken all human emotion for his province and was determined to express it. His strings were magnificent, his wood-wind was as lovely as any we have ever heard—particularly, M. Laurent's playing of the flute, no new object of praise in these columns—and the ensemble never wavered.

Whether he was interpreting the lyrical skepticism of Brahms or the simple outlook of "Red Riding Hood" in the Rachmaninoff suite, the effect was the same. Dr. Koussevitzky is known as a modern, but last night we understood that in the essentials of art there is no such thing as a fundamental difference between the old and the new. Differences of methods, of course, there are, but one understands from this brilliant leader and his brilliant followers, that the old held the new in its arms and that the new is but its child, not always recognizable on the surface, to be sure, but always true to the blood.

M. J.

66

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 18 1931

Boston Symphony Delights Capacity Audience at Albee

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzsky entered into th intimate spirit of the work and offerec it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as on of the choicest works of that prolifi time. It contains some of the mos beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humo and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzsky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahm and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of th initial theme, similar reluctance to over weight its contrapuntal development and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which ha never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahm demands the most perfect artistry of a choirs for esthetic and interpretativ expression, and this was at all time forthcoming in the superb exposition o this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he i never commonplace, may pale; wit them as they were heard last night t the full, he rises to the highest plane of artistic expression. Witness th 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency on the p of the orchestra. The flute solo with richness of tone, accompanied by strin and a French horn, stood out like a glowing gem of unsurpassed radiance. W know of no other flutist whose to compares with Mr. Laurent's, and, together with his fellows of the wood win choir, he gives a tonal character that well nigh indescribable. The wood win choir was also heard with particula pleasure in the flowing arupeggios o the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando o the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded Dr. Koussevitzsky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Moussorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer rather than obvious strivings for effect and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure guided by the accompanying libretto And it is interesting to contemplate th way in which composers seek to portra similar ideas. Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" an Rachmaninoff with his circling gull and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music m be more intelligible to the average hear than the Brahms, for it has explanato notes and a libretto of sorts, which t Brahms has not, so it would be well n to pursue our analogy between wor and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were r ceived with the greatest warmth a cordiality. The "Sea" motive was mo interesting, with its undulating surge the plash of the screaming gulls was n hard to imagine and the melodic mat rial slightly reminiscent of Mendelsso was natural and easily flowing. T verve and trumpery of "The Fa evoked a murmur of pleasure from t audience, which was quite captivated the "Little Red Riding Hood." And w not? There were unmistakably the ro and whining of the wolf, his pawi patter as he approached and his sinist circling to seek a place of admissi This was one of the most remarka pieces of music realism we have e heard, and we venture to predict immediate success and popularity in t world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" so merged into the rhapsodic, only to r turn to thoughtful solemnity. T "March" was the most modernistic of and introduced a figure quite novel orchestration—trumpets in chords ov bassoons, with interesting and telli effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzsky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal, new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. .Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff..........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. ."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestra Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CH PMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 18 1931

Symphony in First Providence Concert

Koussevitzky Leads Great Boston Orchestra in Notable Performance.

From Corelli of long ago to Rachmaninoff and Ravel of the present day. Thus did Serge Koussevitsky lead his great orchestra and an audience limited only by the capacity of the Albee Theatre through a programme of delight last evening. It was the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Providence. As usual, every seat was taken, and in addition a considerable number of patrons stood during the entire evening, which is not usual.

Corelli is a composer of the 17th century, who in his own day never enjoyed the interpretation he can now receive through the agency of modern orchestras. It has required the mastery of a Koussevitzky and the spirit of the Italian of long ago must rejoice at such treatment as his suite received last evening. It was wholly a joy.

For the symphony Dr. Koussevitzky chose the fourth of Brahms in E minor, not the most popular of Brahms' monumental works, but a glorious composition played with exquisite beauty under the baton of the Boston Symphony 1931-32 season a thoroughly happy ending. The programme in detail follows:

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere.
Brahms,
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
3. I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff....Five picture studies (Arranged for orchestra by Ottorino Respighi.)
1. The sea and the gulls.
2. The fair.
3. The funeral march.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence.)
Ravel. ."Daphnis et Chloe," ballet; orchestral excerpts (second suite).
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 20 1931

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

A First New York Performance of Mahler's Ninth Symphony by Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra

APPARENTLY Gustav Mahler is to be the latest protege of Mr. Serge Koussewitsky. For after conforming to contemporary fashion by completely ignoring the works of the Bohemian symphonist during the five seasons that he has been with us as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Koussewitsky inaugurates the sixth with performances not of one but of two of these neglected masterpieces—the Fourth and the Ninth. What this portends we can only imagine. [illegible] taken up by the Paris-Boston in-

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At Carnegie Hall last night.

THE PROGRAM

Mahler ....Ninth Symphony
Debussy ...."Nuages" and "Fetes"
Ravel ...."Daphnis et Chloe"

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 18 1931

Symphony in First Providence Concert

Koussevitzky Leads Great Boston Orchestra in Notable Performance.

From Corelli of long ago to Rachmaninoff and Ravel of the present day. Thus did Serge Koussevitsky lead his great orchestra and an audience limited only by the capacity of the Albee Theatre through a programme of delight last evening. It was the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Providence. As usual, every seat was taken, and in addition a considerable number of patrons stood during the entire evening, which is not usual.

Corelli is a composer of the 17th century, who in his own day never enjoyed the interpretation he can now receive through the agency of modern orchestras. It has required the mastery of a Koussevitzky and the spirit of the Italian of long ago must rejoice at such treatment as his suite received last evening. It was wholly a joy.

For the symphony Dr. Koussevitzky chose the fourth of Brahms in E minor, not the most popular of Brahms' monumental works, but a glorious composition played with exquisite beauty under the baton of the Boston Symphony director. Koussevitzky's reading of this particular Brahms has been declared to be among his greatest accomplishments, and the throng that heard it on this occasion could well believe this to be true.

From this point the programme marched straight to the moderns, first to Koussevitzky's countryman, Rachmaninoff. The great master of the piano has given to the world this beautifully dainty group of picture studies for its everlasting delight, and it is the fortune of the composer that there is a Boston Symphony Orchestra to play it. The director is a lover of the moderns, steeped though he is in the musical tradition, and no man living today has a finer conception of the wonders in music which men of his own era are producing. So he thrilled his audience with these pictures of the sea and the country fair, the two marches and the fanciful "Red Riding Hood" so familiar to all of us in song and story.

A delightful concert ended with another modern, Ravel in his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet. It is not too much to say that this orchestra and its director have introduced Ravel to America, and we cannot hear too much from the gifted Frenchman. It is needless to say that the suite was superbly played, giving to the story of the first symphony concert of the 1931-32 season a thoroughly happy ending. The programme in detail follows:

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere.
Brahms,
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
3. I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff....Five picture studies (Arranged for orchestra by Ottorino Respighi.)
1. The sea and the gulls.
2. The fair.
3. The funeral march.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence.)
Ravel. ."Daphnis et Chloe," ballet; orchestral excerpts (second suite).
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale.

---

point, it is fairly safe to say that he was, that he still is, one of the most gifted and influential figures in the music of our century.

* * *

How does it happen, then, that we have waited 22 years (the Ninth Symphony was completed in 1909) to hear one of his most important works? Echo answers. He has never had, in this city, an enthusiastic press, and for this reason, it may be, as well as for others more practical, conductors have been reluctant to perform it. As for the public, given the chance, it might express a preference for Mahler's music. (The reception last evening of the Ninth Symphony by its first New York audience did not suggest a disposition on the part of the many to follow the few in finding this music either tiresome or irritating.) But it has not had the chance in the past, and unless Mr Koussewitsky's sudden interest in Mahler is a phenomenon to be duplicated where other conductors are concerned, it will not have much more in the future.

* * *

Of Mahler's nine symphonies, five contain passages for solo voices and chorus. The Ninth is not among the number. In general, it more nearly approximates conventional symphonic form than do its predecessors; it has four movements, of which the first has the general characteristics of sonata form, while the third is a rondo. The tonality varies with each movement—D major in the opening Andante commodo, C in the Laendler-like second movement, A minor in the Rondo, D-flat in the Adagio finals. The scoring calls for a large orchestra with enlarged wind choirs. Approximately 65 minutes are required for a complete performance.

* * *

In various writings dealing with Mahler and his works we may read that the Ninth Symphony expresses the composer's premonition of his death. The somewhat contradictor evidence supplied by the existenc of Mahler's sketches for a Tent Symphony is thus blithely overlooked—but no matter; the idea i a good one, and if it assists anyon to a better understanding of th content of the work than the might achieve otherwise, it serves good purpose. The idea of deat preoccupied Mahler much of th time, as it does most artists, an the Ninth Symphony as much an possibly more than other of hi works expresses, it may be, hi dread, his protest, his final resignation to the common end of al humanity. The music hast he familiar defects of all of Mahler's works—it is structurally weak, it is prolix, the ideas that go into its making range from the utterly commonplace to the sublime. Only the finest pages of "Das Lied von der Erde" surpass the conclusions to the first and last movements of this symphony—and indeed, these first and last movements are on the whole as consistently elequent as anything that Mahler has given us. They are music of dreams and meditations; they are filled with "emotion recollected in tranquility," and one must have a leathern sensibility indeed not to be moved by them.

* * *

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky achieved of this work a performance which will doubtless be spoken of—as it was when he gave it in Boston—with the greatest admiration. And that, too, at times, it deserved. For where the simplicity of the music's structure, the clarity of its texture permitted him read it without confusion, Mr. Koussewitsky read it also with what seemed complete sympathy and sincerity. But there were times, in passages of a more complex character, when this conductor lost the line of the music, misplaced his accents, when the impression of insecurity given by his reading had one on the edge of one's seat in apprehension of disaster. The orchestra itself played superbly. It is a fine band, as fine perhaps as any in the East, a credit to Boston and Mr. Koussewitsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 18 1931

66

Boston Symphony Delights Capacity Audience at Albee

The first of its few concerts of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre last night. Every available seat was taken, and there were many persons standing.

Corelli with exquisite simplicities, Brahms in fullest panoply, Rachmaninoff in many hued tone pictures and Ravel in mystic and vibrant suggestiveness made up a program of large musical worth. Corelli, Martini, Porpora, Marin Marais and Vivaldi always bring to mind the compelling charm of the simple music of their time. They prepared the music way of Bach and Handel.

The orchestration of the Corelli numbers is a conspicuous addition to our musical literature and a part of the prevailing tendency to bring old music up to the musical and orchestral standards of our time, that they may be more often heard and their musical worth preserved and appreciated. This revision upward requires not only the most thorough knowledge of harmony, theory and counterpoint, but also native taste and musicianship that the arrangements may be musical and in the proper idiom of their time.

These points are most unsparingly observed in these arrangements and breathe the spirit of the 17th century though with the voice and instruments of the 20th. As might be expected of a violinist these fine old works of Corelli are far more orchestral than the powerful products of contemporaneous organists. Dr. Koussevitzsky entered into the intimate spirit of the work and offered it in the choicest modo antico.

The Brahms symphony of two hundred years later may be considered as one of the choicest works of that prolifi time. It contains some of the mos beautifully simple melodies, nobly suggestive musical thoughts, grim humo and caprice and solidity of musical significance, far above many of its fellows Dr. Koussevitzsky and his men have acquired especial proficiency and reputation in their interpretations of Brahm and this presentation may well be considered authoritative. One noted reserve of sentiment in the delivery of th initial theme, similar reluctance to overweight its contrapuntal development and none too much contrast in the entrances of the brass choir which ha never before been heard to better advantage than in this concert. Brahm demands the most perfect artistry of a choirs for esthetic and interpretativ expression, and this was at all time forthcoming in the superb exposition o this magnificent symphony.

Without these refinements of expression and tone color, Brahms, though he i never commonplace, may pale; with them as they were heard last night t the full, he rises to the highest plane of artistic expression. Witness the 'cellisongul in the andante and the purity and ecstacy of the answering violas and wood wind in the development of this beautiful "theme song".

There is nothing clumsy or grotesque in this conductor's conception of the "Allegro giocoso" with its jolly spontaneity and gay mood, nor is there any lack of vivacious fluency on the part of the orchestra. The flute solo with its richness of tone, accompanied by strings and a French horn, stood out like a glowing gem of unsurpassed radiance. We know of no other flutist whose tone compares with Mr. Laurent's, and, together with his fellows of the wood wind choir, he gives a tonal character that is well nigh indescribable. The wood wind choir was also heard with particular pleasure in the flowing arupeggios of the Ravel ballet, and the opening passages, together with the glissando of the harps, command attention by the unusual figure of musical speech and by its inherent richness of tone color.

The symphony was warmly applauded Dr. Koussevitzsky was recalled three times and the entire orchestra was called to its feet in acknowledgment.

The "Five Picture Studies" of Rachmaninoff delighted the audience. Perhaps lessons learned at the presentation of "Pictures at an Exhibition" of Moussorgsky of last season sharpened the mind for reception of such markedly "program music." Perhaps the thoughts were more musical as they represented the outflow of genius of the composer, rather than obvious strivings for effect, and were more natural and less studied.

The music is highly suggestive and one is pleased to be, in a measure, guided by the accompanying libretto. And it is interesting to contemplate the way in which composers seek to portray similar ideas, Debussy with his "Goldfish" and Ravel with his "Fountain" and Rachmaninoff with his circling gulls, and perhaps Dvorsky with his "Penguin."

Now, this ultra-modernistic music ma be more intelligible to the average hea than the Brahms, for it has explanato notes and a libretto of sorts, which t Brahms has not, so it would be well n to pursue our analogy between wor and the music too closely.

The Rachmaninoff Studies were r ceived with the greatest warmth a cordiality. The "Sea" motive was mo interesting, with its undulating surge the plash of the screaming gulls was n hard to imagine and the melodic mat rial slightly reminiscent of Mendelsso was natural and easily flowing. T verve and trumpery of "The Fa evoked a murmur of pleasure from t audience, which was quite captivated the "Little Red Riding Hood." And w not? There were unmistakably the ro and whining of the wolf, his pawi patter as he approached and his sinist circling to seek a place of admissi This was one of the most remarka pieces of music realism we have e heard, and we venture to predict immediate success and popularity in t world of orchestral music.

The lugubrious "Funeral March" so merged into the rhapsodic, only to turn to thoughtful solemnity. T "March" was the most modernistic of and introduced a figure quite novel orchestration—trumpets in chords o bassoons, with interesting and telli effect.

Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" brought this remarkable evening to a close. One heard not only orchestral wizardry of the most remarkable type but also its employment to create mystic atmosphere and emotional stress. Hardly any other composition shows better the endless resources and consummate virtuosity of this magnificent orchestra. It would be hard to resist the urge and appeal of this music of our time as played by this orchestra; it would be absurd to deny the possibilities of modern thought and its orchestration, and the interest of the audience was a guarantee of its acceptance and understanding. At Dr. Koussevitzsky's hands the orchestra was a thing of palpitating life and action, creating atmosphere, charm and esthetic appeal, new and suggestive moods of poetic imagination, and opening a whole world of possibilities of musical expression.

This concert will be remembered as one of progressing historical interest with the very old and the newest, each faithfully portrayed with consummate skill and artistry.

One of the best concerts we have ever heard.

PROGRAM

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere
Brahms. .Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff..........Five Picture Studies
(Arranged for Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi)
1. The Sea and the Gulls.
2. The Fair.
3. The Funeral March.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence)
Ravel. . "Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestra Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

DR. W. LOUIS CH PMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 18 1931

Symphony in First Providence Concert

Koussevitzky Leads Great Boston Orchestra in Notable Performance.

From Corelli of long ago to Rachmaninoff and Ravel of the present day. Thus did Serge Kousseviteky lead his great orchestra and an audience limited only by the capacity of the Albee Theatre through a programme of delight last evening. It was the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Providence. As usual, every seat was taken, and in addition a considerable number of patrons stood during the entire evening, which is not usual.

Corelli is a composer of the 17th century, who in his own day never enjoyed the interpretation he can now receive through the agency of modern orchestras. It has required the mastery of a Koussevitzky and the spirit of the Italian of long ago must rejoice at such treatment as his suite received last evening. It was wholly a joy.

For the symphony Dr. Koussevitzky chose the fourth of Brahms in E minor, not the most popular of Brahms' monumental works, but a glorious composition played with exquisite beauty under the baton of the Boston Symphony director. Koussevitzky's reading of this particular Brahms has been declared to be among his greatest accomplishments, and the throng that heard it on this occasion could well believe this to be true.

From this point the programme marched straight to the moderns, first to Koussevitzky's countryman, Rachmaninoff. The great master of the piano has given to the world this beautifully dainty group of picture studies for its everlasting delight, and it is the fortune of the composer that there is a Boston Symphony Orchestra to play it. The director is a lover of the moderns, steeped though he is in the musical tradition, and no man living today has a finer conception of the wonders in music which men of his own era are producing. So he thrilled his audience with these pictures of the sea and the country fair, the two marches and the fanciful "Red Riding Hood" so familiar to all of us in song and story.

A delightful concert ended with another modern, Ravel in his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet. It is not too much to say that this orchestra and its director have introduced Ravel to America, and we cannot hear too much from the gifted Frenchman. It is needless to say that the suite was superbly played, giving to the story of the first symphony concert of the 1931-32 season a thoroughly happy ending. The programme in detail follows:

Corelli .... Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinere.
Brahms.
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
3. I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.
Rachmaninoff....Five picture studies
(Arranged for orchestra by Ottorino Respighi.)
1. The sea and the gulls.
2. The fair.
3. The funeral march.
4. Red Riding Hood and the Wolf.
5. March.
(First performance in Providence.)
Ravel. . "Daphnis et Chloe," ballet; orchestral excerpts (second suite).
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale.

Crash Table Covers . . . 54 inch less Sheets . . . Size 81x99 inches t Values
Pajamas . . one-piece style . . . of es . . . in plain or fancy prints tures of the sea and the country fair, the two marches and the fanciful "Red Riding Hood" so familiar to all of us in song and story.

A delightful concert ended with another modern, Ravel in his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet. It is not too much to say that this orchestra and its director have introduced Ravel to America, and we cannot hear too much from the gifted Frenchman. It is needless to say that the suite was superbly played, giving to the story of the first symphony concert of the

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKYLN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 20 1931

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

A First New York Performance of Mahler's Ninth Symphony by Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At Carnegie Hall last night.

THE PROGRAM

Mahler ....Ninth Symphony
Debussy ...."Nuages" and "Fetes"
Ravel ...."Daphnis et Chloe"

APPARENTLY Gustav Mahler is to be the latest protege of Mr. Serge Koussewitsky. For after conforming to contemporary fashion by completely ignoring the works of the Bohemian symphonist during the five seasons that he has been with us as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Koussewitsky inaugurates the sixth with performances not of one but of two of these neglected masterpieces—the Fourth and the Ninth. What this portends we can only imagine. Possibly that Mahler is about to be taken up by the Paris-Boston intellectuals—for Mr. Koussewitsky is, one might almost say officially, their conductor, and as his baton points, so blows the wind in their world.

* * *

In the meantime, thanks to Mr. Koussewitsky, we have heard the Ninth. The performance given at Carnegie Hall last evening, at the opening concert of the Boston Orchestra's local season, was the first in New York. The fact is worthy of rather more attention than is usually given these days to the announcement of a premiere. For Mahler, after all, is not a contemporary to whom, by way of encouraging a dubious talent, one vouchsafes an occasional hearing. Mahler died a score of years ago, at the age of 50, the author of nine symphonies and numerous other works imposing both in intention and effect, and though unanimity of opinion has not yet been reached on the point, it is fairly safe to say that he was, that he still is, one of the most gifted and influential figures in the music of our century.

* * *

How does it happen, then, that we have waited 22 years (the Ninth Symphony was completed in 1909) to hear one of his most important works? Echo answers. He has never had, in this city, an enthusiastic press, and for this reason, it may be, as well as for others more practical, conductors have been reluctant to perform it. As for the public, given the chance, it might express a preference for Mahler's music. (The reception last evening of the Ninth Symphony by its first New York audience did not suggest a disposition on the part of the many to follow the few in finding this music either tiresome or irritating.) But it has not had the chance in the past, and unless Mr Koussewitsky's sudden interest in Mahler is a phenomenon to be duplicated where other conductors are concerned, it will not have much more in the future.

* * *

Of Mahler's nine symphonies, five contain passages for solo voices and chorus. The Ninth is not among the number. In general, it more nearly approximates conventional symphonic form than do its predecessors; it has four movements, of which the first has the general characteristics of sonata form, while the third is a rondo. The tonality varies with each movement — D major in the opening Andante commodo, C in the Laendler-like second movement, A minor in the Rondo, D-flat in the Adagio finals. The scoring calls for a large orchestra with enlarged wind choirs. Approximately 65 minutes are required for a complete performance.

* * *

In various writings dealing with Mahler and his works we may read that the Ninth Symphony expresses the composer's premonition of his death. The somewhat contradictory evidence supplied by the existence of Mahler's sketches for a Tenth Symphony is thus blithely overlooked—but no matter; the idea is a good one, and if it assists anyone to a better understanding of the content of the work than they might achieve otherwise, it serves a good purpose. The idea of death preoccupied Mahler much of the time, as it does most artists, and the Ninth Symphony as much and possibly more than other of his works expresses, it may be, his dread, his protest, his final resignation to the common end of all humanity. The music hast he familiar defects of all of Mahler's works—it is structurally weak, it is prolix, the ideas that go into its making range from the utterly commonplace to the sublime. Only the finest pages of "Das Lied von der Erde" surpass the conclusions to the first and last movements of this symphony—and indeed, these first and last movements are on the whole as consistently elequent as anything that Mahler has given us. They are music of dreams and meditations; they are filled with "emotion recollected in tranquility," and one must have a leathern sensibility indeed not to be moved by them.

* * *

Last evening Mr. Koussewitsky achieved of this work a performance which will doubtless be spoken of—as it was when he gave it in Boston—with the greatest admiration. And that, too, at times, it deserved. For where the simplicity of the music's structure, the clarity of its texture permitted him read it without confusion, Mr. Koussewitsky read it also with what seemed complete sympathy and sincerity. But there were times, in passages of a more complex character, when this conductor lost the line of the music, misplaced his accents, when the impression of insecurity given by his reading had one on the edge of one's seat in apprehension of disaster. The orchestra itself played superbly. It is a fine band, as fine perhaps as any in the East, a credit to Boston and Mr. Koussewitsky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM AUSTIN, TEXAS
TEXAN

NOV 19 1931

TEXAS LOST AT FOOTBALL, BUT WON A MUSIC VICTORY

"In the October invasion of Boston, Texas lost in football, but won a dramatic, a heroic victory in music, a field never before won so completely," says an article in the new issue of Alcalde, by a Texas ex.

The performer was Harold Morris, B. A. '10, who played for the first time his own piano concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra and won ~~the applause~~ of two audiences, one Friday, October 23, the other Saturday, October 24. Even more completely than the audience, Mr. Morris won that discriminating critic of music, Horatio T. Parker of the Boston Transcript. Mr. Parker, recognized as one of the foremost critics in the world, is known to the musical world as "Hard to Please Parker. He bestowed with affluent gestures his entire praise on this Texas ex-student.

Picked Hard Job

"Mr. Morris picked a hard job for himself. For one thing, piano concertos are now out of fashion, yet Mr. Morris wrote a concerto," said Parker. "Into the symphony concert yesterday, out of Texas by way of New York, came Mr. Harold Morris to upset all these notions. He was modestly placed at the middle of the program with no more than a slender line to signal him. Modestly he preceded Dr. Koussevitzky to the pianoforte, tall, seemly self-possessed, uncommonly youthful. He was not too warmly received, since next to no one remembered that he had given a rather notable recital in Boston six years ago. Before he and the orchestra had proceeded through a hundred measures, he was in full possession of the audience," Parker continued.

"And with reason. For here was no piano-concerto written because the pianist-composer wished to groom and ride his own battlehorse. Mr. Morris had something to say musically and individually; knew how to say it in such fashion; chose the form because it suited his purpose, bent it to his ends; said his saying with communicating ardor and impetus."

Saved Day for Texas

"The reception was that dreamed of by all musicians: an outstanding audience, a famous conducter, a brilliant and large audience (each time about 4,000), an inauspicious beginning, and complete, magnificent victory. Mr. Morris was overjoyed, especially next day when he discovered the exurberance of Mr. Parker in his praise. Mr. Morris wrote his University friends, Dr. Benedict, Dr. Schoch, and Dr. Penick to tell them of his joy. He had saved the day for Texas in Boston.

"A typical American product is Mr. Morris, just as typical as his work is genuine. He was born in San Antonio, took his bachelor's degree at The University of Texas, and continued his musical study at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music and in New York. He is now a member of the piano faculty at the Juillard School of Music in New York.

"He cannot follow the pattern for modern composers in striving for originality at all costs; he works merely for natural expression of musical thought; he deals in moods and unities of moods and coherence of expression rather than with novel technical devices. The concerto, then, is orthodox in form, evolving from an ordered beginning and attaining a foreseen end.

"As a background for the concerto, Mr. Morris chose a negro spiritual, "The Pilgrim Song." The first movement, the Negro in his native state, opens with the solo-piano announcing an African drum beat as the motto. The second movement is devoted most obviously to a treatment of the spiritual itself. This brings the Negro in his contact with civilization, a condition in which the spiritual was born as a musical form. In the third movement the modern Negro at play comes to life in a lively syncopated rhythm.

"No thin blood runs in Mr. Morris," Mr. Parker concluded, "none of the hesitating, refugee-seeking temperament that too often dulls American music-making. He speaks out. Yesterday his audience could not choose but hear. Some of us made bold to fancy that we were 'sitting in' at an event."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 20 1931

MUSIC

Brilliant Orchestral Concert.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The most brilliant orchestral concert thus far this season in New York was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, last night in Carnegie Hall. There is no blinking the fact. There may be divergences of opinion regarding the quality of the orchestra itself, compared with others in this city, which is fortunate in hearing the finest orchestras. The writer believes that the Boston Symphony, as an orchestra, surpasses all its rivals in beauty and brilliancy of tone and suppleness of technic.

It is true that the effect of an orchestra depends so much upon the qualities of the conductor that exact comparisons are difficult. The playing last night surpassed any earlier achievement of the season. No conductor of whom we have memory, except possibly Mr. Koussevitzky himself, has equaled his performance of the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," which concluded the program. Mahler's Ninth Symphony, which opened the concert, was interpreted with an eloquence, a conviction, a richness of color which may well have given the music fictitious significance.

Mahler's symphony, played for the first time here, is too long. It lasted two or three minutes beyond an hour, and forty minutes would certainly have sufficed to convey everything of significance in the composer's mind. Granted this, the symphony appears as a whole a more coherent and better-knit work than most of Mahler's scores. There are thematic relationships between the movements. There is no avowed program, no title to give the listener a clue to the composer's meaning. If anything, we are so much the better off. And surely the general import of the symphony, with the lugubrious opening, and the dramatic passion which flares up in certain pages of the first movement, only to lapse back into an expression which borders on despair, is clear. The symphony progresses through three other movements to a conclusion which is serene and, if tragic in vein, exalted. The middle movements come nearer the quality of folk-music than the first and the last. The second movement, "In tempo eines Gemächlichen Ländlers," has the undercurrent of popular song that was strong in Mahler; the ideas are well worked out, though always at inordinate length. The Rondo in the burlesque vein is probably in the sheerly musical sense of the word the best movement. The noble breadth of the chorale theme which begins the finale has a deeper import, though a commoner line. But here again we may well have been deceived by the incomparable singing of this passage by Mr. Koussevitzky's strings!

The long and short of a first impression of this Ninth Symphony, without previous knowledge of the score, is of a composition that has unquestionably Mahler's familiar faults, of which the worst is a commonness and banality of melodic outline, but also sufficient musical and emotional continuity and depth of feeling to lead to a desire to hear the work again, and gain a better perspective of it before further discussion. The performance added further laurels to the orchestra's record, and it is easy to believe that it would have met with the heartiest approval of the composer.

The program of this concert was exceptionally well made. Its novelty was the Mahler symphony. Then came precisely the compositions needed as foil to Mahler's length and turgidness, in the instance of the two Debussy nocturnes for orchestra and the Ravel music already mentioned. What had preceded served to throw into the stronger relief the incomparable richness, economy and originality of Debussy's genius and his impeccable technic and sense of color. They never fail to enchant the ear afresh by the subtlety of technic and the wholly unique instrumental scheme, as well as the quite unprecedented character of the ideas. Here the reverse of what has been said of Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestral presentations could apply: the nocturnes are so exquisitely scored that the tonal result would probably defy even an incompetent conductor!

Nevertheless that would not be pleasant to contemplate. Mr. Koussevitzky again made gorgeous effect, though the first of the two Nocturnes, "Nuages," may have appeared a little deliberate and self-conscious. The second was orchestral magic. The "Daphnis and Chloe" music carried away the audience by the glow of the tone, the blinding brilliancy of the climaxes, ~~when Mr. Koussevitzky met Ravel half-way in that composer's wonderful employment of percussion instruments for purposes of sonority. In what other score do percussive instruments so refract the shimmer and blaze of the brass choir?~~ This was a performance in which magnificent orchestral playing and complete mastery and élan on the part of the conductor made play of a task that could not have been so carried off by any other hands. By the side of this performance other treatments of the score seem crude or dull. Needless to say, the reception of Mr. Koussevitzky and his men was one of immense enthusiasm. After Debussy's second Nocturne the orchestra rose at the conductor's behest. But no gesture on his part could convey the gratification he must have felt at the result of his concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Standard Union

NOV 20 1931

High Notes of the MUSIC WORLD

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

NEW YORK never considers its music season really open until the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given its first concert. Dr. Koussevitzky having brought ~~his great~~ band to Carnegie Hall last night, it can be said now that the season is at last completely, wholly, definitely and finally under way. That is, except for the fact that Mr. Toscanini does not appear until Thursday.

Various orchestras have their heated partisans, no less than baseball teams and poets. Your true, dyed-in-the-wool New Yorker knows that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Arturo Toscanini is the last word in symphonic music and that the world holds nothing to compâre with it. There are, however, dissident elements who concede a certain amount of technical skill to that organization and who admit that Mr. Toscanini beats time very nicely, but who somehow contrive to make the partisans of our own orchestra feel a little cheap when they speak of the Philadelphia orchestra or the Boston orchestra, as though they were, in fact, the only real orchestras in the field.

Specifically, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Stokowski have adherents who can see no one but their favorites, who become moist-eyed and delirious when they speak of them. They need not be Philadelphians or Bostonians to be such partisans; they have taken their stand for one or another of the orchestras, and there they stand—God willing, they can do nought else.

When a timid music-lover suggests that maybe all three are pretty good bands they usually reply with a snort. Of course the New York orchestra is a pretty good band to listen to between visits by the Boston or the Philadelphia as the case may be, but that's all.

We set these facts down as a good reporter, without attempting to judge as between the organizations that cause all the excitement. Aud we further report that Mr. Koussevitzky was in town last night and the Boston enthusiasts were at Carnegie Hall with unrestrained enthusiasm. May a mere non-Bostonian be permitted to report that it was a great concert, greatly played?

The orchestra comes to Brooklyn tonight, and we will have a report on its playing in this place tomorrow.

68

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 20 1931

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

A First Performance of a Mahler Symphony by the Boston Orchestra

First New York concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Carnegie Hall:

PROGRAM

1 Mahler..................Symphony No. 9
(First time in New York)
2. Debussy........Two Orchestral Nocturnes
3. Ravel..."Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2

MR. KOUSSEVITSKY burned symphonic incense to the spirit of Gustav Mahler last night at the Boston Orchestra's opening New York concert of the season. Mahler's Ninth Symphony had the place of honor upon the program, and it occupied more than half the concert's temporal extent; for this symphony, though it is fairly brief compared with certain others of Mahler's cyclopean scores, is, nevertheless, no trifle. The first movement alone is longer than many complete symphonies of Haydn, and the entire work consumes more than an hour's time.

It was Mahler's conviction that no symphony could be too long, provided he was the composer. He believed that when one of his symphonies was played it should fill the entire program, without aid, comfort, contrast or alleviation from competitive music-makers. Doubtless he would have said of himself, quite simply and sincerely, as Beethoven is supposed to have said concerning his "Eroica": "If I write a symphony an hour long, it will be found short enough!"

* * *

But length in music is, after all, a relative thing. "Die Meistersinger" is almost twice a long as "Thaïs"; but not everyone would believe it without a stopwatch.

And so it makes no difference at all whether Mahler's Ninth is traversible in an hour or in twenty minutes: let us, as Emerson said, "leave hurry to slaves." We are logical and reasonable as esthetic appraisers only when we ask ourselves, in this case, How absorbing is Mahler's discourse? Does it seize and engross us, or does it bore and weary us? This, to be sure, is altogether a personal matter; but so is every sort of critical reaction—to a necktie, or a goulash, or a climate, or a symphony, or a woman's face.

* * *

It is odd that Mahler's Ninth Symphony, which was composed in 1909, two years before his death, and published in 1912, should have had to wait almost twenty years for a hearing in New York—especially as it requires no such vast and complex apparatus of performance as do his Second, Third and Eighth Symphonies, all of which have been played here. Mahler's instrumental demands in this score are considerable, but they are not exorbitant, and any one of our major orchestras could have met them without turning any grayer than usual the hair of the trustees.

But the symphony has reached us finally, via that great orchestra to which we are indebted for so many consequential works. It should be added to the repertoire of other symphonic bodies, and it should be heard again; for it is a remarkable score. It is not consistently fine and distinguished in musical thought. None of Mahler's symphonic scores is that; for Mahler had no inward censor: he never knew when he was saying something memorable and choice, and when he was delivering himself of platitudes and banalities. Yet the genuineness of his feeling, his burning and indubitable sincerity as an artist, give even his most portentous futilities at times a kind of impressiveness, and soften one's resentment of their triteness.

* * *

Mahler, they say, was obsessed by premonitory thoughts of death when he composed this music. One of Mahler's apostles, Richard Specht, has called it "a symphonic grave-song." Mahler's biographer, Paul Stefan, sees in its concluding movement a farewell to earth, a "farewell without bitterness," as sequel to earlier pages in which Mahler storms and weeps and mocks, savagely deriding the life that men are given here to lead. In the final Adagio, music that at the last is murmurous with peace, Mahler is said to have found music for the ultimate act of reconciliation.

Yet what of this alleged serenity, this deep and final reconciliation, in the face of Mahler's later symphonic utterance, his last and uncompleted symphony, the Tenth? Those who have seen a facsimile of the score tell us that the manuscript is annotated as by one in an agony of terror and foreboding, scribbled over with exclamations, appeals, imprecations, in which the composer sobs and cries to God, and to the fiends of that tormenting hell with which his own sick mind companioned him. For Mahler was usually either scaling the heights of his apocalyptic visions or groveling miserably in the depths.

* * *

The truth appears to be that Mahler the artist never in all his tragic inner life outran his fears and his morbidities. With him, as with Tchaikovsky, spiritual valor was a thing glimpsed rather than a thing achieved. He might have regarded as his own the fate decreed by the incomparable Sonneteer—"So shalt thou feed on Death." Mahler the artist fed, he banquetted, on death. His terrible despair cries to us again and again out of his music—a vehement, cataclysmal thing, mounting to the skies in an ecstasy of passionate protest and lamentation, tearing at the keyless iron door with bleeding fingers, as did Ygraine in the dreadful play of Maeterlinck.

* * *

His utterance of this obsessing mood is not so extraordinary in the Ninth Symphony as it is in the Fifth, where that amazing B-flat minor passage breaks in upon the measured tread of the Funeral March like an uncontrollable outburst of shattering, maniacal, wild-visaged grief. Yet those pages of the Ninth Symphony in which Mahler utters his fears and woes and lamentations are, musically, the most memorable in the score. They occur in certain pages of the first movement (though as a whole this is the least original and impressive movement of the symphony). They are at the bottom of the savage and ironic mockery of the brilliant Rondo-Finale. But they are most moving in the final Adagio.

* * *

Mahler has erected this Adagio, with admirable skill, upon the conventional "turn," that gruppetto which for so many years has served composers chiefly as an ornament; though sometimes it has been put to profoundly expressive use, as by Bach in a choral prelude ("Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland") and by Wagner in "Tristan" and "Götterdämmerung." Bach made it the voice of devotional revery; Wagner the voice of ecstasy and love.

Mahler has made it in this Adagio the voice both of grieving and of peace. From the opening of the movement, when the unison violins stab us with the intensity of sorrow that it conveys, to the last serene and acquiescent pages in which the muted violas sing it quietly in augmentation, this ancient device is made to carry the diminishing burden of the poet's grief, until that burden is lifted, for a time at least, from his spirit, and the music becomes tranquil and gentle and assuaging, as if it were folding the hands of the poor agonist, telling him that "nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail . . . nothing but well and fair" . . .

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted last night's Boston Symphony concert

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

NOV 20 1931

Boston Symphony Plays Here

Opens Forty-sixth Session in New York With Ninth Symphony of Gustave Mahler.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The ever welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town yesterday and last evening in Carnegie Hall began its forty-sixth season in this city. The organization is in its fifty-first season of its ministrations to the æsthetic delight of the citizens of the Hub. Serge Koussevitsky, urbane, cosmopolitan, but with certain idiosyncrasies, still directs the musical proclamations of the orchestra and is the maker of its programs.

He decanted upon us last evening the ninth symphony of Gustave Mahler. He lately revealed it in Boston, where it evoked comments of epic length and style. The composition had not previously been heard in this country, wherefore Mahlerites bitterly reproached American bigotry for its unfairness. Now the symphony is unveiled. We have stood uncovered in its presence. The brotherhood can no longer complain. Mahler's musical relationship to Bruckner, his prodigious prolixity, his occasional flights into the empyrean of beauty, all have made him an object of adoration and the victim of misplaced propaganda among the confraternity of Brucknerites and their sympathizers. But enormous plans, ponderous masses of structure and openly exhausting effort do not make compositions great. Schubert's "Erl Koenig" is a more unassailable masterpiece than any of Mahler's symphonies. It should, however, be noted that the ninth possesses qualities which appear in smaller dimensions and weaker force in some of his earlier works.

This symphony was composed in his later years when he concerned himself less with the petty wire pullings and artistic shams of opera houses. His mind was more serene, more attuned to the finer accords of independent music. The work was published in 1912 and produced in the same year in Vienna under the direction of Bruno Walter. Nineteen years crossing the western ocean! Lief Ericsson and Columbus did better.

Now that it has come to the port of missing symphonies, to wit, New York, let us rejoice in that in fundamental matter and in much of the treatment it is Mahler at his best. The melodic ideas are not trivial, as they so often have been in this composer's music, though they might easily betray a greater tenuosity if bared of their instrumental verbiage The developments are well planned, though in no one of the movements was Mahler able to avoid that episodic treatment which made so many of his longest creations seem short of breath. The orchestration is more consistently idiomatic and germane to the musical thought and the rounding out of the scheme made more effective thereby.

The first movement is the best of the four. It is an andante comodo resting on a simple songlike melody of folk-music type, which is soon interrupted by a stormy outbreak. After that the theme returns in slightly modified form and is subjected to expansions, harmonic resettings and other working out, but not in the old manner of the classic symphonies. The development is entirely Mahler's own conception. The stormy interruptions recur and the movement concludes with a lingering coda of considerable beauty.

The second movement is entitled "In tempo eines Gemaechlichen Laendlers." Perhaps this means "In the tempo of a comfortable laendler." There is much promise in the humorous peasant dance with which the movement opens, but the piling up of effects makes the purpose of the movement as a whole rather difficult to conjecture. The third movement is called "Rondo, burleske." It is a pretentiously written, but heavy footed attempt at comedy, with some good bits in it. The last movement is an adagio which, for about one-half its length, is admirable. Indeed, Mahler wrote no more beautiful and dignified symphonic music than this, but he spoiled it by stretching its richly spun web to the breaking point. And the coda, made in the worst Berlioz style of prolonged antiphonal chanting among groups of instruments, killed whatever impression the earlier pages had made.

That the symphony was worth hearing is beyond question. That it revealed once more all the individual traits of Mahler's art, the plain melodic speech, the tremendous effort of the developments and the inability to condense and be pointed, is also not to be gainsaid. The work was superbly performed. Nothing was lost under the baton of Mr. Koussevitzky or the virtuoso playing of the great orchestra from Boston. The other numbers on the program were the familiar "Fetes" and "Nuages" of Debussy and orchestral excerpts from the second "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet of Ravel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

NOV 20 1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY INTRODUCES GUSTAV MAHLER'S MUSIC HERE

Koussevitsky's Talented Organization Marks Its Return by Offering Compositions Not Heard in New York Heretofore —Its Performance Magnificent from Technical Viewpoint.

By PITTS SANBORN.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra signalized their return to New York and Carnegie Hall last night by acquainting us with the Ninth symphony of Gustav Mahler. That is to say, a part of the symphony was performed. So considerable were the cuts made in the first three of the four movements that the presentation cannot be regarded as complete. The finale, an adagio, was, however, done without curtailment.

Mahler began work on this symphony in 1906. Yet it was not produced until more than a year after his death, when Bruno Walter, late in June, 1912, conducted the first performance of it at Vienna. It was not Mahler's last symphony. A tenth, begun in 1909, he left unfinished.

To this reviewer the Ninth symphony was totally unknown until last evening. His reaction to it, therefore, is based entirely on this somewhat fragmentary presentation.

The first movement ("Andante commodo") begins in a distinctly Straussian vein. One even thinks of "Der Rosenkavalier" and the high-bred sorrow of the Marschallin.

The music grows in intensity, eventually to die away in one of the finest expressions of that ineffable loneliness and yearning which was inseparable from the tortured spirit of Mahler.

The second movement, with its rudeness and its peasant Laendler quality, is a revolt from what had preceded. It is followed by a "rondo burleske" which resounds with Mahler's gargoyle laughter. These movements may conceivably be the best of the symphony, though at a single hearing they impressed the writer less than their companions.

The concluding adagio might have unfolded its meaning more clearly if Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the tempo had not smacked rather of an andante. Nevertheless the closing pages possessed last night a peculiar and healing beauty.

As the music faded into the silence of eternity, the high receding violins spoke of the ultimate consolation which is complete surcease from pain, from thought; the last sleep which is our inalienable birthright.

The symphony is scored for an enromous orchestra, scored with the utter mastery that was Mahler's, and technically the Bostonians performed it magnificently.

To round out the program Mr. Koussevitzky and his excellent band treated a large and enthusiastic audience to Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the second suite of orchestral excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL
NOV 20 1931

Mahler Symphony Premiere Opens Boston Orchestra Season In Carnegie Hall

By IRVING WEIL.

Serge Koussevitzky, bringing his Boston Orchestra to Carnegie Hall last night for their first concert of the season, also brought with him a Mahler symphony that New York had never heard before. It was the Bohemian composer's ninth in his list of ten, it played for nearly an hour and a quarter on end and, in spite of the enormous quantity of music enclosed within it, it failed to convince at least one listener that it was a hitherto overlooked masterpiece.

We don't know how much or how little of a minority we happen to be in this respect, for there was the heartiest kind of applause from the houseful of subscribers after the symphony was at last finished. It is one of the hardest things in the world to know just what applause means. Last night certainly the heartiness of it seemed to be as much in recognition of the beautiful performance given by the orchestra as it was for the work itself.

This Ninth Symphony has no programmatic explanation attached to it, but in listening to it one feels that Mahler had one in the back of his mind, and it is not unlikely that the music would gain something in force and point if this had not been withheld.

DIFFERENT PROCEDURE.

The symphony ends with a determinedly, aspiring, yearning, impassioned adagio cantabile, expressed almost wholly by the throbbing strings, and it begins with a restrained andante. This in itself is radically different from customary symphonic procedure, whilst the two middle movements are also unusually placed, the second being a scherzo in the form of a gentle landler (rustic cousin of the waltz) and the third a rondo-burlesque.

Here alone is already a hint of programmatic intent, and the progression of the whole of the music itself is such as to make the hint something stronger. But Mahler distrusted and detested literal explanation or description of any music and provided none for his own. The ironic aspect of his attitude is that his output has aroused as much of it—often fantastic enough—as that of any twentieth century composer.

SOMETHING LACKING.

But the real trouble with Mahler's Ninth Symphony lies deeper than the mere lack of an expressed program. Its musical ideas, its melodic strands, are of inferior quality. All his skill in manipulating them fails to alter that, just as they and their development fail to give voice to what he wanted to say. In the final adagio, the best part of the work, one feels as though one were watching a smouldering fire, waiting and waiting for an inner spark to ignite it into a blaze. But there is never anything but smoke.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented the symphony in clear-cut outlines and quite evidently with conviction, the letter seeming at times a bit hard-worked and once or twice touched with a sort of theatrical eloquence. But perhaps that, on the whole, did no harm, for Mahler's music not impossibly needs something of over-emphasis. The latter half of the conductor's evening had to do with Debussy's two

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 21 1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON IN BORO

Program Includes Respighi Orchestration of Rachmaninoff's "Etudes Tableaux"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, paying its first Brooklyn visit of the season, introduced the initial rendition in this borough of the recent Respighi orchestration of Rachmaninoff suite, as newly arranged, was presented recently in Boston. Originally, the work was composed for the piano. Respighi, the Italian composer, has rearranged it for full orchestra. It was easy to listen to and was meticulously done and satisfied fully the lrage audience present.

Besides "Etudes Tableaux," Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony, led the orchestra in a program that included a suite by Arcangelo Corelli, seventeenth-century composer; the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, and the second suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

Brahms' symphony was played with such prodigality of vim and vigor that it brought everyone up sharply in their seats and was alone worth a trip to the Academy of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVE. POST
NOV 20 1931

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky Begins Boston Symphony's Series With Dazzling Concert—Mahler's Ninth Symphony

ORCHESTRAL playing of the highest finish and dazzling in its virtuosity was lavished upon the audience which applauded Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at their first New York concert of the season, given in Carnegie Hall last night. Seldom has Mr. Koussevitzky been so brilliantly successful, from first to last. With all due respects to the other technicians who have earned our admiration by some vital and glowing performances, this concert was the orchestral tour-de-force of the season to date. The character of the program was not one to stir the profounder emotions. But it offered opportunities for baton wizardry that the Boston conductor seized upon, as a born thaumaturge and worker of miracles.

Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to New York Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony, a work begun before Mahler came to America in 1907, but not performed until a year after his death in 1911. Bruno Walter, who will return to these shores later in the season to lead the Philharmonic, conducted the first performance in Vienna in 1912. The reception it evoked at last night's concert was as generally favorable, we believe, as any Mahler symphony has had in this city. The playing was so fine as almost to win over some of us who have grown weary of the efforts of successive conductors to acclimatize Mahler to our soil.

As it came to our ears at this concert, the Mahler Ninth has many beauties of detail, though by no means unmixed with those weaknesses, inconsistencies and palpable artifices that so generally have tipped the critical scales against Mahler in this country. For us, Mr. Koussevitzky succeeded in minimizing the characteristic Mahler defects, the while he ensnared his listeners with serenities, tendernesses and exaltations such as have been brought home to us in Mahler's music only in some memorable performances of the "Lied von der Erde" and the "Kindertotenlieder."

TRUE to Mahler, the symphony is irregular and unusual as to form, opening with an Andante and closing with an Adagio, with a Laendler-like dance movement and a Rondo-Burleske intervening. Also true to Mahler, there is an alternation of the simple and the grandiose, with a characteristic lack of discrimination between themes good, bad and indifferent. But the bad seemed to us not as bad and the indifferent not as indifferent as in some of the other symphonies. The good are not of the highest beauty, purely as themes, but they are worked into episodes that often assert a distinctive and personal charm. Though not a great work, this is one to give pleasure. Its liabilities include its length. Last night's performance required about an hour and a quarter.

Other numbers were the Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, music with which Mr. Koussevitzky's name has been glowingly identified here and abroad. We have yet to hear another conductor or another orchestra achieve similarly the hushed fantasy of the visional procession midway in "Fetes" or the color irisations of the opening "Lever du Jour" of the Ravel masterpiece; for that is what "Daphnis et Chloe" is—a supreme accomplishment of its kind. The applause after the breath-taking Dance Generale was that of an audience genuinely excited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. REVIEW

BEREZOWSKY WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Composer Will Play His Own Violin Concerto Dec. 4 and 5

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has been invited by Serge Koussevitsky to apear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, on the 4th and 5th of December. Mr. Berezowsky will play his own violin concerto. This is the second time Berezowsky will make his bow to Boston music devotees. Last season he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing his own symphony. Berezowsky has had a full and colorful career for a young composer who has just reached the age of thiry. When he was twelve, he made his debut as a violinist in Russia. His later musical development in America, however, turned him more towards the field of composition. He held a double fellowship at the Juilliard Graduate School for four years, studying composition with Rubin Goldmark and violin with Paul Kochanski. During the last three years Berezowsky has had compositions performed by the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, by the Flonzaly Quartet and the Juilliard Graduate School String Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN
NOV 21 1931

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

GUSTAVE MAHLER'S ninth symphony came to New York on Thursday night by way of Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, industrious seeker for variety of interest, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a memorable performance of the work. The symphony has the noble merit of being not drawn to such heavenly length as some of the distinguished composer's other works. It has additional merits which may perchance be mentioned with respect. For the moment let us make apology for our existence.

In his always incomparable program notes Philip Hale reprints a letter of Aaron Copland written in 1925 to the Times of this city. Mr. Copland is a modernist composer of talent and learning. It behooves music lovers to give consideration to him when he speaks of his art or of a fellow artist. In his letter he complained that New York critics seemed to be unanimous in the conclusion that as a composer Mahler was quite hopeless.

Mr. Copland did not quarrel with us for what we said so much as for what we left unsaid. He himself admitted a few weaknesses in the composer's art, but felt that the beauties far outweighed them. What has always seemed to this writer to be the basis of local critical regret about Mahler was that he so frequently used trivial themes and so often was prolix and pretentious in his working out. These are two serious faults and, if established, are sufficient to prevent the inclusion of most of Mahler's works in the first rank.

Mr. Copland held that "Das Lied von der Erde" has in it the "stuff of living music." We grant that heartily. It is not all of the vital kind, but some of it is. Mahler not infrequently attained beauty and eloquence. But this music lover found in him a composer whose visions were much greater than his powers of musical invention or his skill in construction. The things he tried to do in symphonic form sometimes overmastered him and left him prostrate and breathless. Furthermore, he was apparently unable to view his own work with any perspective. Perhaps this accounted for one of his bad habits.

He breakfasted in bed. After the meal he propped himself up and had sheets of score paper spread on his knees. Then he wrote and wrote and wrote till luncheon. No doubt, his mind was in a fine glow throughout the morning. In the language of the street, he was having the time of his life. But he undoubtedly lost all consciousness of the extent of his production, and the fact that he was spreading the butter very thin. He failed to blue pencil his long-winded scores. The thoughts were precious to him. He forgot that the public was not a subject to command, but a disinterested looker-on in Vienna, who had to be won. An ancient matter, indeed, about which one Bobby Burns said the obvious thing in the most memorable way. But Mahler, for whom this writer had a strong personal liking, cannot be said to have suffered from critical indifference or from sweeping condemnation.

* * *

Mahler the Aspirer.

INABILITY to say concisely what they had to say and to perceive the innate worthlessness of certain thematic subjects was what stood in the way of the attainment of their ideals by both Mahler and his admired Bruckner. Those who point out such defects in their work are always censured by the devotees who demand that criticism shall ignore such shortcomings. If there is such a thing as genuine criticism—and this writer believes there is—it is and must always be indifferent to special pleadings. It is not for or against any person. It is for good art and against bad art; and that is its beginning, its end, and its only reason for existence.

Mahler's was never bad art. It was sincere. The man was striving with all his ability to express his vague conceptions, his undefined, but nonetheless agonizing aspirations. He was not aiming at those superficial effects which quickly gain approval from the ready hands of an audience, yet seldom remain fixed in the minds. But he fell short of preeminence in music because he could not attain that perfect amalgamation of matter and form which Walter Pater, with his habitual critical sagacity, declared to be the triumphant differentiation of music from other arts.

Mahler's music should be performed from time to time. To bury it because it is imperfect would be to deprive concertgoers of some interesting hours. For the same reason Bruckner should be heard. There is sufficient loftiness of idea and felicity of expression in the scores of both composers to make us willing to plod through the dusty paths of the barren places. Both men had their moments when they saw the promised land. But the vision was almost always obscure.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL
NOV 21 1931

BEREZOWSKY TO PLAY OWN MUSIC

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has been invited by Serge Koussevitzky to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month in his own concerto. Last season he conducted the Boston Orchestra in his symphony. In the last three years he has had compositions performed by the Philharmonic, the League of Composers and the Juilliard String Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Standard Union

NOV 21 1931

High Notes of the MUSIC WORLD

By JOSEPH A. MILLER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BROOKLYN

BROOKLYN was honored last night by the appearance at the Academy of Music of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the first of the annual series of five visits arranged for this borough by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

In return for the esteem in which they are held here, the Boston musicians gave the audience that packed the Academy one of the most beautiful, one of the noblest concerts it has been our pleasure ever to hear. This, it must be explained, is not the expression of treasonable sentiments by an ardent admirer of Mr. Toscanini's orchestra, but a sober statement of cold fact.

Dr. Koussevitsky prepared a program in which the old and the new, the classic and the modern, the beautiful and tender, and the wild and stirring were so mingled that the audience went out into the streets in something of a daze, stunned by the grandeur and the beauty of the music and the playing.

There were four numbers on the program, selections by Corelli, one of the late seventeenth century pioneers; by Brahms; by Rachmaninoff and by Ravel. And thougn we be blasted for our temerity, we are obliged to report that it was Ravel who carried off the major honors with excerpts from his "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

Arcangelo Corelli, who was born in 1653, was represented by an exquisite Suite played exquisitely by the string sections, one of the lovely, almost heavenly things the early Italians did when what we know as music was quite young. But the concert really got under way with a superb playing of the Brahms Fourth Symphony, one of the noblest of the compositions of the great master. While we personally prefer the First Symphony of all the symphonic works of this musician, the most modern of the three great B.'s, we must admit that the Fourth is great music, too, and the audience was stirred to profound enthusiasm.

Rachmaninoff was represented by five piano pieces arranged for orchestra by that indefatigable arranger, Ottorino Respighi, sweet and pleasing and even amusing music, but not particularly noteworthy; but for us the high spot was the playing of the Ravel number, which rose to a high emotional pitch in the finale, the "Danse General." Such music and such playing are unforgettable.

THI' CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK MIRROI

NOV 21 1931

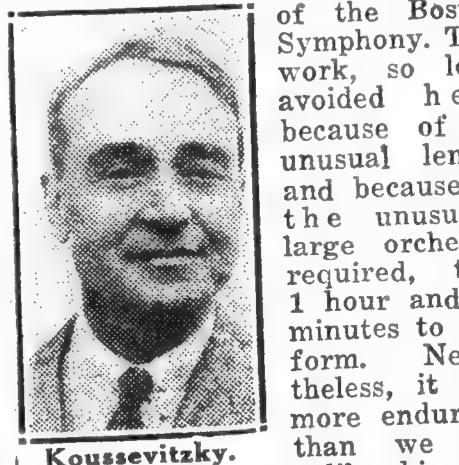
Music

By GUSTAV DAVIDSON.

(Reprinted from yesterday's Daily Mirror.)

Koussevitzky Returns.

Serge Koussevitzky gave New York a first performance of Mahler's Ninth Symphony at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony. This work, so long avoided here because of its unusual length and because of the unusually large orchestra required, took 1 hour and 10 minutes to perform. Nevertheless, it was more endurable than we had anticipated, for, unlike his neo-classic contemporaries, Brahms and Bruckner, Mahler lives in his symphonies.



Koussevitzky.

With his overwrought climaxes, frequent employment of brass for melodies, and his general sensuous line, Mahler reminds us of the Russian Tschaikowsky. Like him, too, Mahler, always an ardent admirer of philosophers, voices his philosophy of life in his music. But Mahler adds to it a distinctly Teutonic feeling for structure, which will make his works live where the former's have failed.

Mahler's material is often reminiscent. In the third movement, the contrapuntal section recalled the last movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" in theme and workmanship. The last movement more than suggested the "Liebestod" of Wagner, in the employment of the characteristic melodic turn of the Bayreuth composer. Here, too, the strings were scored in an unmistakably Wagnerian manner.

The performance last evening was richly romantic and inspiring. Special mention should be made of Mr. Ritter's playing of the timpani part. Dr. Koussevitzky's rendition was characteristically vital, for, like Mahler himself, this Russian lives in his interpretations.

A. V. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 22 1931

MUSIC

Morris's Concerto Brilliant.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The novelty of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was Harold Morris's Piano Concerto of which the composer played the solo part. This concerto is very brilliantly written. It has an encouraging ardor and enthusiasm and a modern tang. It is a symphonic conception and the piano part is matched by seas of heavy orchestration. To this rivalry the composer-pianist was thoroughly equal. Mr. Morris played with extreme brilliancy and aplomb and he was superbly assisted by Mr. Koussevitzky, so that the new work was given more than an adequate performance.

What are its essential qualities? They seem to us to be principally youth and swing, and a modern nervousness and a good grasp of form. The most valuable movement in the sheerly musical sense is, no doubt, the slow movement, a set of variations on a Negro Pilgrim song. Mr. Morris, born at San Antonio, Texas, knows the South and has been subjected to its musical influences. Referring to the presence of the African Negro drum beat in the first and last movements and the slave song upon which the variation is woven, he expresses his hope that this material is "the natural and logical result of growing up with, and studying folk music as we have it in the South. But I do not mean this to imply that I believe in leaning entirely on folk music or that it should in any way limit or hamper our modern musical expression; but rather that it should be the basis, as it was with composers in the past."

The curious part of all this is that in spite of negroid influences, if such they could be called, the flavor of the music is decidedly Russian and is measured, in spite of the advanced musical idioms, which are remindful of Tchaikovsky. For the rest, one is impressed anew by the development of modern harmonic and orchestral technic and also the rapidly advancing technical resources of present-day American composers. This concerto appears, at a first hearing, to be conspicuous more for a lively and nervous temperament and technical values than for a creative substance. But the audience gave the piece a cordial greeting, justified by the virtuosity and spirit of the performance and the music's swing.

The program opened with the twelfth of the Handel Concerto Grossi for String Orchestra, a work in the noble Handelian vein which provides such superb music for orchestral programs, and it came to an end with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleven," and Strauss is one of the many composers of whom Mr. Koussevitzky has shown brilliant understanding. Purists might feel that in the first and second of the slow movements the interpretation was a little self-conscious and, therefore, permannered. As a whole, this performance was of the exceptionally high standard which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has set in this and recent seasons and again there was an occasion to admire the precision and the golden color of the Boston Orchestra's strings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

NOV 23 1931

Morris in Own Concerto

The feature of the second concert of the Boston Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall was a new piano concerto by Harold Morris, one of the better known among American composers. This was its premiere here, although it had been performed in Boston a month ago.

The work is founded entirely on Negro rhythms and the Negro spiritual known as the "Pilgrim's Song." It is well made music and was brilliantly played as to its piano part by the composer himself.

The rest of Mr. Koussevitzky's program dealt with the B minor concerto grosso of Handel and Richard Strauss's "A Hero's Life."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 22 1931

NEW CONCERTO BY AMERICAN WINS PRAISE

Boston Orchestra Features Morris Composition; Critic Finds It Clever, Appealing

By GRENA BENNETT.

Carnegie Hall went "symphony" yesterday with three orchestral concerts within twelve hours. New York's own Philharmonic played twice for young music lovers—the children's concert in the morning and a program for student subscribers at night.

Between these two the visiting Boston Orchestra featured a new concerto by Harold Morris, with the composer at the piano. Mr. Morris is a native of Texas and went to the elemental negro tunes remembered in his youth for his inspiration.

CLEVERLY CONTRIVED.

The concerto is a cleverly contrived composition, with parts deftly distributed and adroitly orchestrated. The original appeal of simple tunes was quite obscured in its cerebral environment.

The performance of the solo part, however, was scholarly, and Serge Koussevitzky's conducting was considerate and authortative.

The opening number on the program was Haendel's B minor Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, and Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" ended the concert.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. SUN

NOV 23 1931

Harold Morris's Concerto Heard

Boston Symphony Orchestra Includes His Work in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee concert enlivened Saturday at Carnegie Hall. It provided a compact and interesting program for the satisfaction of an amiable audience. The numbers were Handel's concerto grosso, No. 12, B minor, Harold Morris's concerto for orchestra and piano, with the composer as the soloist, and Richard Strauss's imposing paean of self-adulation called "Ein Heldeleben." Mr. Morris is a native of San Antonio, Tex., is a resident of this city, and a member of the faculty of the Institute of Musical Art. Possibly these are reasons why he had to go to Boston to get his composition produced.

We have denominated this composition a concerto for orchestra and piano. The maker of the score labeled it concerto for piano, but the orchestra stands in the foreground throughout the musical picture. The piano is, for the most part, a commentator, and at times an explicator. Leading thematic materials are of that Afro-American species which grows in the South and has discolored the musical thought of the entire country. Mr. Morris comes to these naturally, because he was born in the South and lived where Negro song and dance and religious ecstasy were among his daily contacts.

In elaborating this concerto, he has employed the melodic line of the "Pilgrim's Song," which begins, "I'm a poor wayfarin' stranger." This, and music of a savage character suggesting the origins of the black slave, are used with a confident method of musical architecture. The folksong ideas are employed chiefly as sources from which new and interesting thematic matter is drawn. The music of this concerto is the composer's, not the Southern Negro's. Indeed it may be said that the developments of the melodic suggestions show not only musical skill, but frequently imagination and poetic warmth.

The slow movement is a set of variations on the Negro spiritual, excellently written, with engaging solos for orchestral instruments, and with better opportunities for the pianist than the other movements offer. But there are not anywhere "brilliant" piano passages of the accepted kind and no cadenzas. The fact is that the piano part is too much subordinated to meet the long-established conception of a concerto, and without doubt audiences will feel a certain disappointment before adjusting themselves to the plan of the work. Accepted as a symphonic composition, in which the piano plays an important obbligato, and which is glowingly orchestrated, it should win the approval of those to whom music means more than a mere vehicle for the display of virtuosity. Viewed as a whole, the concerto is an addition of worth and dignity to the American repertory of the piano. That the piece will be welcomed by other pianists, we doubt, since they may prefer the spotlights of Tschaikowsky and Liszt, to the modest irradiation of Mr. Morris. When his composition is repeated, he will probably have to play it himself.

The Handel concerto grosso gave the string body of the Boston orchestra field for a delightful exhibition of its precision, sonority and finish of style. As for "Ein Heldeleben," it is always welcome and always evokes long continued applause. Strauss wrote gorgeously indeed when he wrote about himself. There is a deal of very fine music in this tone poem. This writer particularly loves the part about the critics, because it speaks for all Mr. Strauss's brothers in art. The audience of Saturday returned a verdict in favor of the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 22 1931

Morris Plays His Concerto With Boston Symphony

Young American Pianist Makes Use of Negro Spiritual

Mr. Howard Morris, the talented American composer, was the star of yesterday's matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Morris appeared not only as pianist but as composer, playing the solo part in his own Concerto for piano and orchestra. At its conclusion, the large and cordial audience recalled Mr. Morris several times to the stage.

The Concerto had not before been heard in New York. It was performed in Boston last month, for the first time anywhere, by Mr. Morris and the Symphony Orchestra.

The repertoire of American piano concertos is small and in need of enlargement. Mr. Morris has, in this work made a welcome addition to the list. A Southerner, he has remembered and made use of the folk-material of the Negroes—especially the beautiful and touching Spiritual, "Pilgrim's Song," upon which he has based a series of variations as the slow movement of his Concerto. This is the most poetic and immediately appealing section of the composition; yet there is music of vitality and rhythmic charm in the other two movements—music in which the individual voice of the composer is heard.

Mr. Morris played the solo part with infectious dash and assurance, and his modesty and obvious sincerity won the favor of the responsive audience.

Mr. Koussevitzky began the afternoon's program with a Handel Concerto Grosso for strings and ended it with Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

Among those present in the audience was Arturo Toscanini, who called upon Mr. Koussevitzky during the intermission.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 22 1931

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, has been invited by Serge Koussevitzky to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Dec. 4 and 5. Mr. Berezowsky will play his own violin concerto. This is the second time he will appear in Boston with his own work. Last year he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of his symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 22 1931

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer, conductor and violinist, will appear in the last of these capacities as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 4 and 5, playing his own concerto. Mr. Berezowsky was for several years a member of the New York Philharmonic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brooklyn Standard Uni

NOV 23 193

High N

HAROLD MORRIS

Harold Morris, pianist and composer, featured the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last of the three concerts in its current invasion of New York. Mr. Morris played the solo parts of his own piano concerto, a brilliantly written composition, and one that appeared with striking beauty before the background of the playing of the orchestra.

The concerto, those who heard it said, is likely to become a fovorite with concert audiences, in that it combines technical musical skill with a strictly American background. There are Negro elements, as well as reminiscences of Russian music, and the audience gave it a great reception.

The remainder of the program consisted of the Haendel Concerto Grossi for strings, and Strauss' "Ein Heldenlegen."

THI' CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 24 1931

Harold Morris's Concerto.

Harold Morris's piano concerto, performed here for the first time by the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, with the composer at the piano, proved to be a significant addition to American music. Employing an ultra-polytonal style, the composer approaches Charles Ives in the idea of blocks of tone, although scarcely as modern. Mr. Morris uses negro folk tunes, but, as he explains in the program, he does not believe in leaning entirely on folk music or letting it hinder our modern musical expression. His orchestration is brilliant and effective, but often overshadows the piano part, at least as performed on Saturday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

NOV 22 1931

* * * *

A defict of $197,811 is reported by the Boston Symphony for the fiscal year ended July 31, and that after meeting this loss with money from endowment funds, guarantors' subscriptions, and a surplus, the surplus is reduced from a handsome $46,950.54 to the modest sum of $6,411,86.

* * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MUSICAL AMERICA

An English Critic Views Some American Orchestras

On Flying Trip to the United States, London Reviewer Gives Impressions of Concerts by Boston, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Ensembles, Heard on Successive Days

By Basil Maine

LONDON, Nov. 15.—Through the courtesy of the various managers, I recently had the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, each in its own way and on successive days. The editor of MUSICAL AMERICA has asked me to give my impressions of the three orchestras, to compare them, giving reasons (as the examination papers say) for my preference.

Impressions I can certainly give, as well as any man in the street; comparisons I shall avoid as far as possible, and as for preference, this I consider to be well-nigh impossible to give. For, even if I were willing to indulge in that most obnoxious occupation, the splitting of hairs, a judgment based on a single program by each orchestra, each list vastly different from the others, would be unjust and valueless. There is also this to consider: I arrived in America at the beginning of the concert season and heard the orchestras, so to say, playing themselves in. It would be just as foolish to judge them summarily as to compare football teams in preliminary matches.

Therefore I forbear to rush in where many a devil has dared to tread, and with your editor's permission will concentrate upon mere impressions, unheedful of Ernest Newman's recent denunciations of "personal reactions."

A Bostonian Matinee

I heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one of a Friday afternoon audience, an elderly and, for the most part, feminine audience. I was given to understand that an audience entirely different in nature assembles every Saturday night—students and young, keen musical amateurs. If that is so, give me Saturday night in Boston. The Friday audience was aloof, polite and, as it seemed to me, determined to make the concert a social affair.

Koussevitzky conducted. He has certainly impressed his personality upon the orchestra and made it his own. The players understood thoroughly, that is, understood his conceptions in detail and as unities. This was the more remarkable in that his beat is sometimes inclined to be more fanciful than definite. He gave a brilliant performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" (the second suite). The climax was mighty, yet there was never a danger of the composite whole breaking up into confusion and noise. Each tone was telling. His Brahms Fourth Symphony, too, was convincing, especially in the matter of just phrasing.

It was enlightening to note how the manner of phrasing was changed for the playing of César Franck's "Les Eolides." Not every conductor would have appraised the subtle difference between (say) the opening phrases of the Fourth Symphony and the chief theme and its derivations in Franck's symphonic poem.

To discuss the merits of individual players is not the best way to write of an orchestra's achievement, yet the works in the program compelled me to notice the excellence of certain players—the first flute, for example, the first horn and the first clarinet, who, I understand, was recently brought over from the Vienna Philharmonic.

But the dazzling ensemble in the performance of the "Daphnis et Chloé" suite permitted no analysis, no singling out of the component parts, for they had been fused by the sudden and fierce heat of one man's vision. This was not so much an interpretation as a moment of transfiguration. I experienced nothing like it at any other concert, although this is not to say that the other orchestras could not convey such an experience. It is merely saying that the experience is rare, and that I was lucky enough to hear Koussevitzky and his players in a divine frenzy of sheer inspiration.

Sees Stokowski as "Purist"

The Philadelphia concert was an experience of an entirely different kind. For one thing, the program was entirely of sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth century music. For another. Stokowski's attitude, alike toward the music, the orchestra and the audience, was in every respect unlike that of Koussevitzky.

Doubtless there is much to commend in the Philadelphian conductor's purist ideas and ideals. His habit, for instance, of beginning a work almost before he has reached his desk, and of playing right through each half of the program with no perceptible pause between the works, is an admirable plea for "Music for music's sake." So, too, is his earnest desire (expressed on this occasion in a rebuking speech at the end of the concert) of giving his concerts without the interruption of applause. Admirable, that is, in a perfect world of perfect musicians.

But in our own world, where there are, alas, many who go to concerts with a scanty knowledge of the music of Monteverdi, Lulli, Rameau, etc., it would perhaps be advisable, and not altogether undignified, to make an appreciable pause between the work of one composer and that of another, especially when the works are suites made up of various operatic excerpts. A suite of six movements followed without a break by one of five movements could, with excuse, be mistaken by the "ordinary listener" for a suite of eleven movements.

The "No Applause" Ideal

And as for the "no applause" ideal, I can find no rational excuse for agreeing with Stokowski any more than with Dolmetsch on this point. If anything, there is more to be said in favor of Dolmetsch here, for, generally speaking, chamber music induces a mood of reverie and self-abnegation more readily than does orchestral music.

However, I do not allow these considerations to stand in the way of my full appreciation of the fine performance of this uncompromising program. Especially impressive were the Concerto Grosso in D Minor of Vivaldi (that which for long was known as an organ concerto by W. F. Bach) and the "Water Music" of Handel.

A "Beneficent Tyranny"

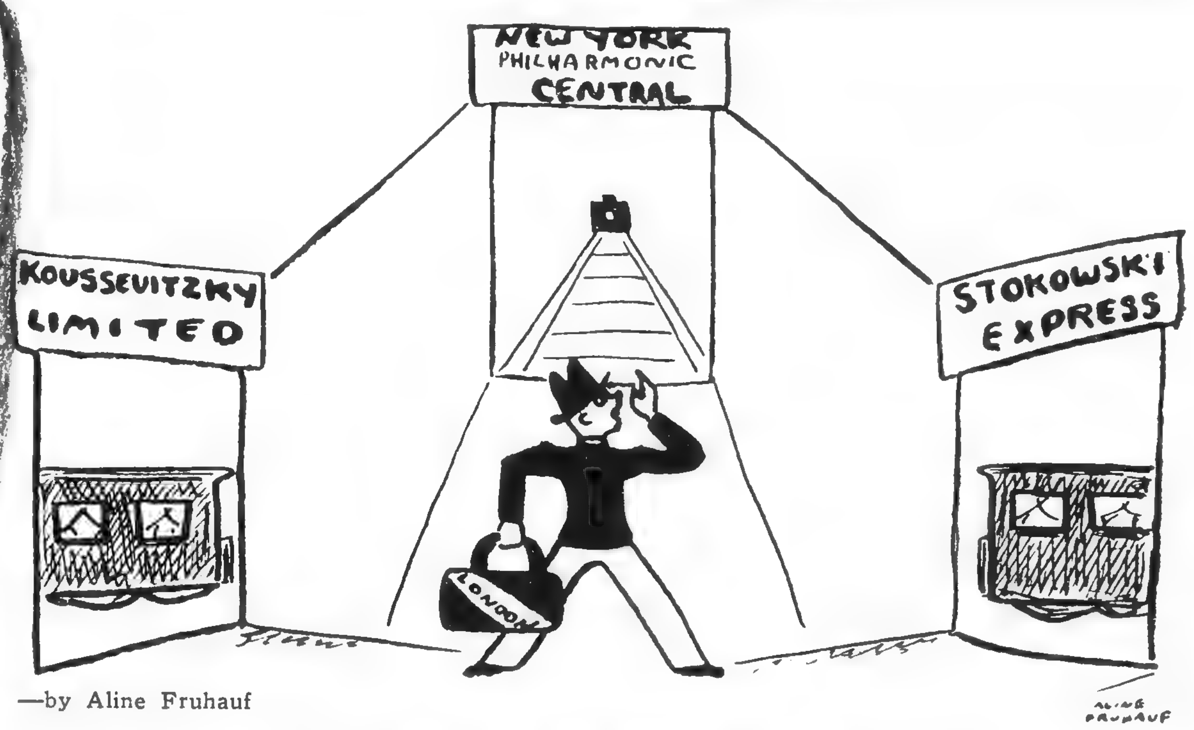
There are those critics who profess that if they heard the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra each behind a screen, they could discern which was the non-union orchestra and which the union orchestra with a two million dollar endowment fund. This hyper-criticism, I confess, is beyond me. I should never think of attempting to translate music into terms of finance. I grant that the union and non-union mentality might conceivably be reflected in performance, and perhaps I did catch something of that reflection in the Philadelphia Orchestra's playing of the renowned transcription of Bach's D Minor Toccata and Fugue. But, this apart, the unanimity of this orchestra, its forcefulness and the inevitability of its crescendos were quite remarkable. All these things spoke of the influence of a beneficent tyranny.

Kleiber's "Sane" Conducting

Erich Kleiber conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concert. His straightforward methods enabled one to realize how great, how fine-thinking a musician he is. His view of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was persuasive because of its utter sanity. There was no underlining of any point (by way of contrast, I recalled at once the exaggeration of the violas' phrases in the second movement whenever Furtwängler plays the work), no distortion, no coldness and yet no untoward emphasis. The climax of the last movement, for example, arrived in the na-

BASIL MAINE, noted British music critic, and London correspondent for "Musical America," recently made a brief visit to the United States to participate in the Worcester Festival. In the accompanying article, Mr. Maine describes his impressions of concerts by three leading American symphony orchestras, which he attended in the same week. Embodying the fresh point of view of a disinterested European visitor, his recorded experiences are of especial interest.

Editor, MUSICAL AMERICA



—by Aline Fruhauf

Traveler's Choice: Basil Maine Manages to Make It Three

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN
NOV 25 1931

sudl'ng
the :acy sur-
; in

Words and Music

—By Deems Taylor—

THE Boston Symphony began its season here last week, playing twice. One conclusion these concerts left that is inescapable: It is time we realized that Boston has regained her old place in the sun and has, once more, one of the world's great orchestras.

This may seem like a [illegible] statement, but I doubt whether [illegible] of us have grasped its truth. During the war, and the succeeding seasons under Mr. Rabaud's hopelessly handicapped leadership, the ruin of the organization was almost complete. Mr. Monteux, who followed him, was a brilliant program maker and in many respects a fine conductor; but even he was not a stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

For nearly a decade, therefore, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and muttering, "Dear, dear. What a great orchestra that used to be. How sad!" Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra last week played with technical brilliance, tonal beauty, and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it. Which is high praise.

Which is also another way of saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modelled readings of the Debussy Nuages and Fetes on Thursday evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe that was the high point of the program.

* * *

THE evening was also marked by a first performance here of Mahler's Ninth Symphony. In it are all the characteristics that have made Mahler a bone of contention in the world's musical kennels. There is no question of the genuine merit of many of Mahler's musical ideas, nor even of their occasional loftiness and nobility. Nor, on the other hand, will even his most convinced apostles deny that his work is flawed by a considerable alloy of commonplace and downright triviality, whatever the pretentiousness of his methods.

But the thing that handicaps Mahler most heavily is his incorrigible long-windedness. Time and again he reaches a point where, having proved his musical point up to the hilt, he is obviously about to stop. Whereupon, like an orator fascinated by his own eloquence, he says: "And twelfthly, my dear friends—" and begins all over again. The Ninth Symphony, as he wrote it, lasts a few minutes short of an hour. Prune it down until nothing is left save Mahler's musical ideas and the amount of development that they are worth, and the Ninth Symphony would last about twenty minutes.

Some day, some real friend of Mahler's will do just that— take a pruning knife and reduce his works to the length that they would have been if the composer had not stretched them out of shape; and then the great Mahler war will be over.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM MUSICAL AMERICA
NOV 25 1931

An English Critic Views Some American Orchestras

On Flying Trip to the United States, London Reviewer Gives Impressions of Concerts by Boston, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Ensembles, Heard on Successive Days

By BASIL MAINE

LONDON, Nov. 15.—Through the courtesy of the various managers, I recently had the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic - Symphony, each in its own city and on successive days. The editor of MUSICAL AMERICA has asked me to give my impressions of the three orchestras, to compare them, giving reasons (as the examination papers say) for my preference.

Impressions I can certainly give, as well as any man in the street; comparisons I shall avoid as far as possible, and as for preference, this I consider to be well-nigh impossible to give. For, even if I were willing to indulge in that most obnoxious occupation, the splitting of hairs, a judgment based on a single program by each orchestra, each list vastly different from the others, would be unjust and valueless. There is also this to consider: I arrived in America at the beginning of the concert season and heard the orchestras, so to say, playing themselves in. It would be just as foolish to judge them summarily as to compare football teams in preliminary matches.

Therefore I forbear to rush in where many a devil has dared to tread, and with your editor's permission will concentrate upon mere impressions, unheedful of Ernest Newman's recent denunciations of "personal reactions."

A Bostonian Matinee

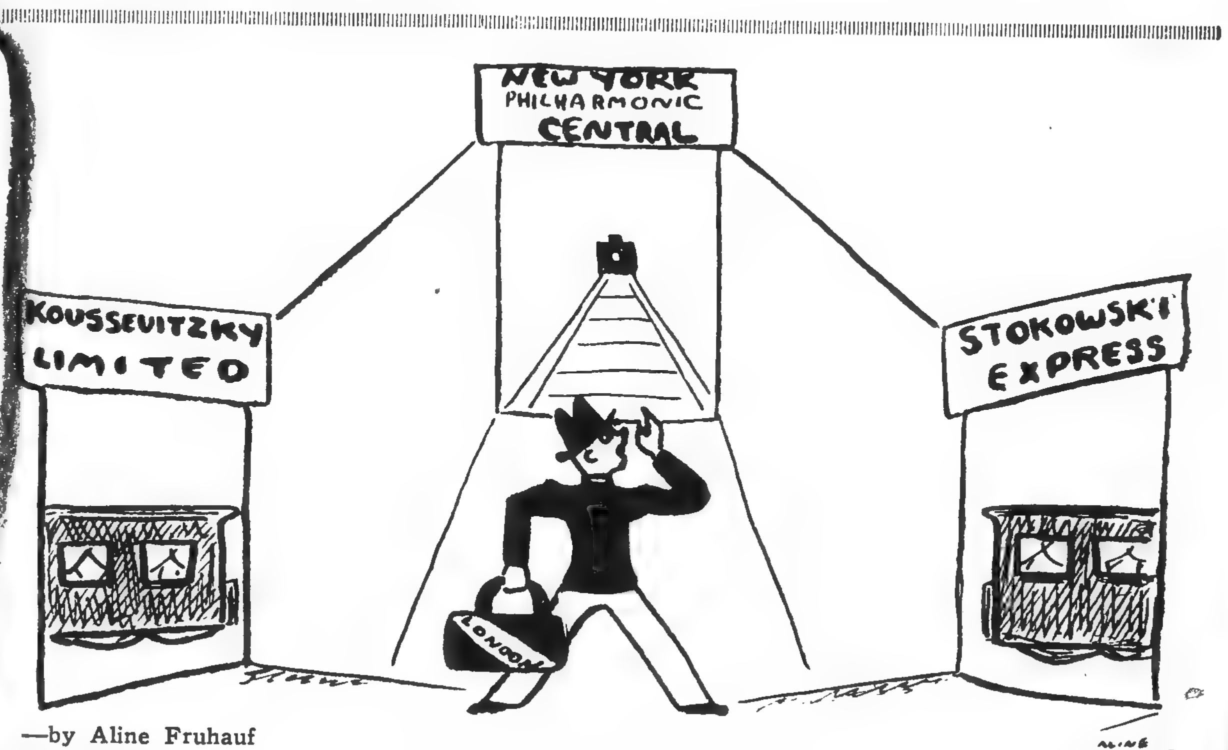
I heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra as one of a Friday afternoon audience, an elderly and, for the most part, feminine audience. I was given to understand that an audience entirely different in nature assembles every Saturday night—students and young, keen musical amateurs. If that is so, give me Saturday night in Boston. The Friday audience was aloof, polite and, as it seemed to me, determined to make the concert a social affair.

~~Koussevitzky~~ conducted. He has certainly impressed his personality upon the orchestra and made it his own. The players understood thoroughly, that is, understood his conceptions in detail and as unities. This was the more remarkable in that his beat is sometimes inclined to be more fanciful than definite. He gave a brilliant performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" (the second suite). The climax was mighty, yet there was never a danger of the composite whole breaking up into confusion and noise. Each tone was telling. His Brahms Fourth Symphony, too, was convincing, especially in the matter of just phrasing.

It was enlightening to note how the manner of phrasing was changed for the playing of César Franck's "Les Eolides." Not every conductor would have appraised the subtle difference between (say) the opening phrases of the Fourth Symphony and the chief theme and its derivations in Franck's symphonic poem.

To discuss the merits of individual players is not the best way to write of an orchestra's achievement, yet the works in the program compelled me to notice the excellence of certain players—the first flute, for example, the first horn and the first clarinet, who, I understand, was recently brought over from the Vienna Philharmonic.

But the dazzling ensemble in the performance of the "Daphnis et Chloé" suite permitted no analysis, no singling out of the component parts, for they had been fused by the sudden and fierce heat of one man's vision. This was not so much an interpretation as a moment of transfiguration. I experienced nothing like it at any other concert, although this is not to say that the other orchestras could not convey such an experience. It is merely saying that the experience is rare, and that I was lucky enough to hear Koussevitzky and his players in a divine frenzy of sheer inspiration.



—by Aline Fruhauf

Traveler's Choice: Basil Maine Manages to Make It Three

Sees Stokowski as "Purist"

The Philadelphia concert was an experience of an entirely different kind. For one thing, the program was entirely of sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth century music. For another. Stokowski's attitude, alike toward the music, the orchestra and the audience, was in every respect unlike that of Koussevitzky.

Doubtless there is much to commend in the Philadelphian conductor's purist ideas and ideals. His habit, for instance, of beginning a work almost before he has reached his desk, and of playing right through each half of the program with no perceptible pause between the works, is an admirable plea for "Music for music's sake." So, too, is his earnest desire (expressed on this occasion in a rebuking speech at the end of the concert) of giving his concerts without the interruption of applause. Admirable, that is, in a perfect world of perfect musicians.

But in our own world, where there are, alas, many who go to concerts with a scanty knowledge of the music of Monteverdi, Lulli, Rameau, etc., it would perhaps be advisable, and not altogether undignified, to make an appreciable pause between the work of one composer and that of another, especially when the works are suites made up of various operatic excerpts. A suite of six movements followed without a break by one of five movements could, with excuse, be mistaken by the "ordinary listener" for a suite of eleven movements.

The "No Applause" Ideal

And as for the "no applause" ideal, I can find no rational excuse for agreeing with Stokowski any more than with Dolmetsch on this point. If anything, there is more to be said in favor of Dolmetsch here, for, generally speaking, chamber music induces a mood of reverie and self-abnegation more readily than does orchestral music.

However, I do not allow these considerations to stand in the way of my full appreciation of the fine performance of this uncompromising program. Especially impressive were the Concerto Grosso in D Minor of Vivaldi (that which for long was known as an organ concerto by W. F. Bach) and the "Water Music" of Handel.

A "Beneficent Tyranny"

There are those critics who profess that if they heard the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra each behind a screen, they could discern which was the non-union orchestra and which the union orchestra with a two million dollar endowment fund. This hyper-criticism, I confess, is beyond me. I should never think of attempting to translate music into terms of finance. I grant that the union and non-union mentality might conceivably be reflected in performance, and perhaps I did catch something of that reflection in the Philadelphia Orchestra's playing of the renowned transcription of Bach's D Minor Toccata and Fugue. But, this apart, the unanimity of this orchestra, its forcefulness and the inevitability of its crescendos were quite remarkable. All these things spoke of the influence of a beneficent tyranny.

Kleiber's "Sane" Conducting

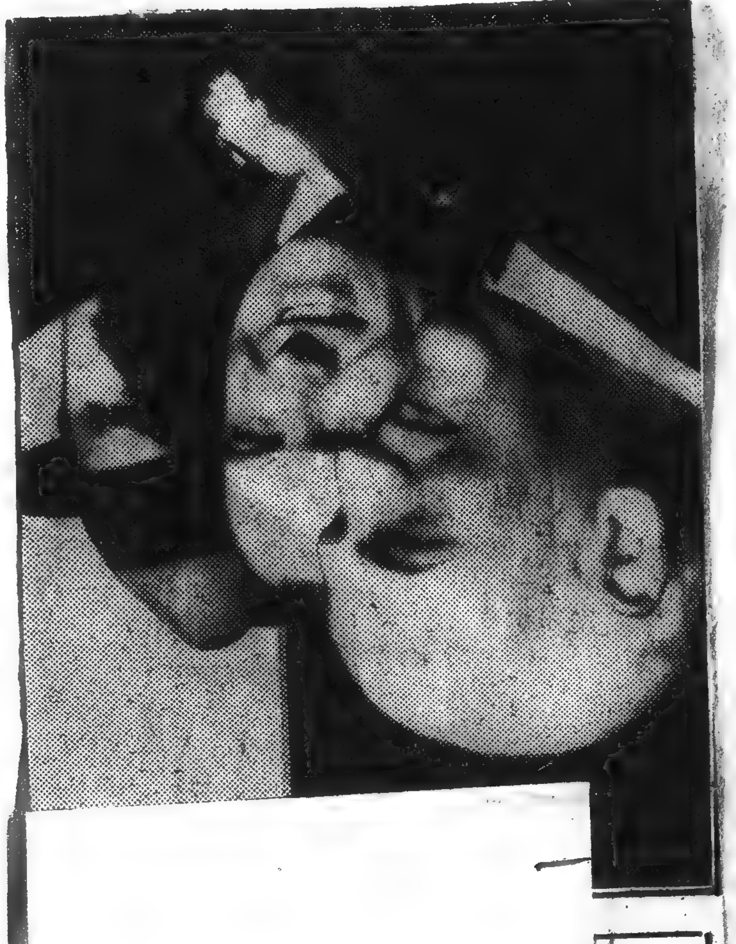
Erich Kleiber conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concert. His straightforward methods enabled one to realize how great, how fine-thinking a musician he is. His view of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was persuasive because of its utter sanity. There was no underlining of any point (by way of contrast, I recalled at once the exaggeration of the violas' phrases in the second movement whenever Furtwängler plays the work), no distortion, no coldness and yet no untoward emphasis. The climax of the last movement, for example, arrived in the nature of things, not by means of a sudden, frantic rushing and reassembling of forces to cover a weakness in the line. Then, again, for mingled delicacy and strength I have never heard surpassed the phrasing of the strings in the "Euryanthe" Overture. I did not discover much purpose in the "Three Symphonic Dances" of Reznicek for all the ingenuity of the music; but the beautiful and austere Suite of Telemann (extracts from the "Tafelmusik," Max Seiffert's edition) left a deep impression, the more so since herein was found the very counterpart of Klieber's qualities as a conductor.

On this occasion, Mishel Piastro was the concertmaster of the orchestra. He has just been acquired from San Francisco and was given an opportunity to make his individual bow in the Czardas of the Reznicek work. The assistant leader, Remo Bolognini, is also in his first season with this orchestra.

These and other acquirements supply one of the reasons (but not the most important) why the attainment of orchestral playing in America is so high. All things are possible to them who can buy. England cannot compete in this matter. It remains to be seen if the tidal wave of patriotism which is now sweeping over Great Britain, and is likely to exclude a great number of foreign musicians, will compel us to produce a higher standard in native orchestral players.

BASIL MAINE, noted British music critic, and London correspondent for "Musical America," recently made a brief visit to the United States to participate in the Worcester Festival. In the accompanying article, Mr. Maine describes his impressions of concerts by three leading American symphony orchestras, which he attended in the same week. Embodying the fresh point of view of a disinterested European visitor, his recorded experiences are of especial interest.

Editor, MUSICAL AMERICA



---

point oint up stop.
ted by lfthly, over wrote hour.
Prune it down until nothing is left save Mahler's musical ideas and the amount of development that they are worth, and the Ninth Symphony would last about twenty minutes.

Some day, some real friend of Mahler's will do just that— take a pruning knife and reduce his works to the length that they would have been if the composer had not stretched them out of shape; and then the great Mahler war will be over.

72

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

NOV 27 1931

Words and Music

—By DEEMS TAYLOR—

The Boston Symphony began its season ~~here~~ last week, playing twice: One conclusion these concerts left that is inescapable: It is time we realized that Boston has regained her old place in the sun, and has, once more, one of the world's great orchestras.

This may seem like a fairly obvious statement, but I doubt whether all of us have grasped its truth. During the war, and the succeeding seasons under Mr. Rabaud's hopelessly handicapped leadership, the ruin of the orgaization was almost complete. Mr. Monteux, who followed him, was a brilliant program maker and in many respects a fine conductor; but even he was not a stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

For nearly a decade, therefore, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and muttering, "Dear, dear. What a great orchestra that used to be. How sad!" Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra last week played with techical brilliance; tonal beauty, and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it. Which is high praise.

Which is also another way of saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modelled readings of the Debussy Nuages and Fetes of Thursday evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's Daphnis et Chole that was the high point of the program.

* * *

The evening was also marked by a first performace here of Mahler's Ninth Symphony. In it are all the characteristics that have made Mahler a bone of contention in the world's musical kennels. There is no question of the genuine merit of many of Mahler's musical ideas, nor even of their occasional loftiness and nobility. Nor, on the other hand, will even his most convinced apostles deny that his work is flawed by a considerable alloy of commonplace and downright triviality, whatever the pretentiousness of his methods.

But the thing that handicaps Mahler most heavily is his incorrigible long-windedness. Time and again he reaches a point where, having proved his musical point up to the hilt, he is obviously about to stop. Whereupon, like an orator fascinated by his own eloquence, he says, "And twelfthly, my dear friends—" and begins all over again. The Ninth Symphony, as he wrote it, lasts a few minutes short of an hour. Prune it down until nothing is left save Mahler's musical ideas and the amount of development that they are worth, and the Ninth Symphony would last about 20 minutes.

Some day, some real friend of Mahler's will do just that— take a pruning knife and reduce his works to the length that they would have been if the composer had not stretched them out of shape; and then the great Mahler war will be over.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

NOV 29 1931

THE REALM OF MUSIC

By W. J. HENDERSON

GUSTAVE MAHLER'S ninth symphony came to New York a few nights ago by way of Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, industrious seeker for variety of interest, conducted the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra through a memorable performance of the work. The symphony has the noble merit of being not drawn to such heavenly length as some of the distinguished composer's other works. It has additional merits which may perchance be mentioned with respect. For the moment let us make apology for our existence.

In his always incomparable program notes Philip Hale reprints a letter of Aaron Copeland, written in 1925 to the Times of this city. Mr. Copeland is a modernist composer of talent and learning. It behooves music lovers to give consideration to him when he speaks of his art or of a fellow artist. In his letter he complained that New York critcs seemed to be unanimous in the conclusion that as a composer Mahler was quite hopeless.

Mr. Copland did not quarrel with us for what we said so much as for what we left unsaid. He himself admitted a few weaknesses in the composer's art, but felt that the beauties far outweighed them. What has always seemed to this writer to be the basis of local critical regret about Mahler was that he so frequently used trivial themes and so often was prolix and pretentious in his working out. These are two serious faults and, if established, are sufficient to prevent the inclusion of most of Mahler's works in the first rank.

Mr. Copland held that "Das Lied von der Erde" has in it the "stuff of living music." We grant that heartily. It is not all of the vital kind, but some of it is. Mahler not infrequently attained beauty and eloquence. But this music lover found in him a composer whose visions were much greater than his powers of musical invention or his skill in construction. The things he tried to do in symphonic form sometimes overmastered him and left him prostrate and breathless. Furthermore, he was apparently unable to view his own work with any perspective. Perhaps this accounted for one of his bad habits.

He breakfasted in bed. After the meal he propped himself up and had sheets of score paper spread on his knees. Then he wrote and wrote and wrote till luncheon. No doubt his mind was in a fine glow throughout the morning. In the language of the street, he was having he time of his life. But he undoubtedly lost all consciousness of the extent of his production, and the fact that he was spreading the butter very thin. He failed to blue pencil his long-winded scores. The thoughts were precious to him. He forgot that the public was not a subject to command, but a disinterested looker-on in Vienna, who had to be won. An ancient matter, indeed, about which one Bobby Burns said the obvious thing in the most memorable way. But Mahler, for whom this writer had a strong personal liking, cannot be said to have suffered from critical indifference or from sweeping condemnation.

Mahler the Aspirer.

Inability to say concisely what they had to say and to perceive the innate worthlessness of certain thematic subjects was what stood in the way of the attainment of their ideals by both Mahler and his admired Bruckner. Those who point out such defects in their work are always censured by the devotees who demand that criticism shall ignore such shortcomings. If there is such a thing as genuine criticism—and this writer believes there is—it is and must always be indifferent to special pleadings. It is not for or against any person. It is for good art and against bad art, and that is its beginning, its end and its only reason for existence.

Mahler's was never bad art. It was sincere. The man was striving with all his ability to express his vague conceptions, his undefined, but nonetheless agonizing aspirations. He was not aiming at those superficial effects which quickly gain approval from the ready hands of an audience, yet seldom remain fixed in the minds. But he fell short of pre-eminence in music because he could not attain that perfect amalgamation of matter and form which Walter aPter, with his habitual critical sagacity, declared to be the triumphant differentiation of music from other arts.

Mahler's music should be performed from tiem to time. To bury it because it is imperfect would be to deprive concertgoers of some interesting hours. For the same reason Bruckner should be heard. There is sufficient loftiness of idea and felicity of expression in the scores of both composers to make us willing to plod through the dusty paths of the barren places. Both men had their moments when they saw the promised land. But the vision was almost always obscure.

Mr. Kleiber Goes East.

Erich Kleiber lays down the baton of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, which is now to be taken up by the illustrious Arturo Toscanini. Mr. Kleiber will return to Germany whence he came trailing garments of glory. He carries with him the good wishes of local music lovers and their players for a long and refreshing repose in his native land. His American experiences have apparently not deeply affected him. He came, he conducted and he kept on conducting till he lulled into apathy a peculiar enthusiasm which fell upon him the instant he mounted the podium.

Mr. Kleiber is a good conductor, but his arrangement of programs do not feed popular enthusiasm year after year. Few conductors are invariably makers of good programs and few invariably make bad ones; but Mr. Kleiber made a strong bid for the championship in the latter class. Perhaps when he returns to this country he may find it worth while to consider the fact that we are not all Germans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 29 1931

CURRENT MUSIC

TOSCANINI BACK

By MARGARET REGAL

Boston Symphony

Last week the Boston Symphony orchestra made its first visit of the season to Carnegie hall. Thursday evening Mr Koussevitzky conducted the first New York performance of Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony. There was general agreement that nearly 20 years was too long to have waited for this work to be played here, that it contains many pages of genuinely inspired music and that, while it is too long and uneven in merit, it has not the fault of prolixity in as great a degree as the others of his symphonies that had preceded it here. Two Debussy orchestra Nocturnes and the second Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" suite completed the program, which demonstrated anew that the Boston orchestra is one of the supremely fine organizations.

Saturday afternoon they played the 12th Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor, Harold Morris's new piano concerto and the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Mr Morris comes from Texas and has derived much of his thematic material from the Negro spirituals; he has developed these into an interesting orchestral composition, with a modestly subordinated piano part.

The regular Thursday concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony was given on Wednesday. It was the first of three performances of Erich Kleiber's final New York program. Mr Kleiber is conceded to be a good conductor, but to lack the gift of good program making, and the rather heterogeneous assortment of works he assembled for this occasion did nothing to acquit him of the charge. There were the Schubert "Rosamunde" overture, two serenades from the Mahler seventh symphony, four minor German dances by Beethoven, Haydn's "Concertante" symphony and the "Beautiful Blue Danube." Mr Kleiber proved, however, that he has few peers as a conductor of the Viennese waltz.

Another orchestra concert was given at the Waldorf-Astoria Sunday night. It was the season's second concert by the Manhattan Symphony, Henry Hadley, conductor. The principal work of the evening was the Brahms third symphony, which was given a musicianly reading; there was also Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra and the Smetana "Bartered Bride" overture. In addition two soloists appeared, a 14-year-old soprano, Sylvia Berman, who sang Mozart's aria, "L'Amero," from "Il Re Pastore" in promising fashion and the 'cellist, Maurice Marechale, who gave the first local performance of the Honegger 'cello concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony last year and which is dedicated to him. It is a fairly interesting but ungrateful composition. The audience was cordial to all concerned.

Herald Dec 1

WERRENRATH TO SING 'DANNY DEEVER' HERE

Reinald Werrenrath, famous operatic and concert baritone, will make his first appearance at popular prices when, on Sunday night, he presents a popular program in the Boston Garden at the first of the Civic Symphony concerts. In addition there will be a concert by the Civic Symphony orchestra, Thompson Stone, director. This orchester numbers 105 musicians, recruited from the leading symphony orchestras of America. The concert is being sponsored by the National Civic Federation, women's department, Massachusetts section.

Werrenrath, finown as "the most entertaining vocalist" on the stage, will include "Danny Deever" in his program, according to word received yesterday by Mayor Curley, co-sponsor of the concerts. The singer will allow the people of Boston to dictate his program to as far an extent as possible.

Post Dec. 1

FIEDLER TO BE GUEST LEADER

Werrenrath to Sing at Civic Concerts

Arthur Fiedler, who conducted the concerts last summer on the Esplanade, and who has been heard by thousands, has been selected as guest conductor of the first Sunday night Civic Symphony concert at the Boston Garden. The concert will begin at 8:30. All seats are reserved.

Fiedler starts his rehearsals today with the 105-piece Civic Symphony Orchestra. He will present some of his most popular Esplanade numbers.

Reinald Werrenrath, soloist, will arrive in Boston Saturday according to present plans. He will include "Danny Deever" and "Mandalay" in his programme. The demand for those two pieces, which he made famous, was overwhelming. The rest of his programme has not yet been decided upon

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 29 1931

Nicolai Berezowsky will play the solo part in his violin concerto at its first American performance to be given by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky Dec. 4.

Julienne Jaume-Bild, French diseuse, will give a costume recital of Breton and other folk songs at the Community Church, Dec. 2 at 8 P. M. Marcel M. Bild will accompany.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 30 1931

SYMPHONY TO PLAY TWO COMPOSITIONS

Boston Orchestra Program, However, Will Be of Normal Length

Only two compositions will be played at the second Providence concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre a week from tomorrow night. The program announced yesterday from Symphony Hall, Boston, will, however, be of normal length, since each of the two symphonic works is a major composition.

The evening will open with Beethoven's B-flat major symphony, No. 4, opus 60, in four movements: I, Adagio; allegro vivace. II, Adagio. III, Allegro vivace; trio, un polo meno allegro, and IV, finale: allegro, ma non troppo.

After the interval the performance will conclude with Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), opus 35. The program of the work includes: I, the sea and Sindbad's shop; II, the story of the Kalander Prince; III, the young Prince and the young Princess; IV, festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 29 1931

The next two concerts of the Boston Symphony in Boston on Dec. 4 and 5 will be conducted by Richard Burgin. The program includes two études by Vogel, Toch's Little Theatre Suite, Berezowsky's concert for violin with the composer as soloist, and Chausson's symphony in B flat major.

72

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

NOV 27 1931

Words and Music

—By DEEMS TAYLOR—

The Boston Symphony began its season ~~here~~ last week, playing twice: One conclusion these concerts left that is inescapable: It is time we realized that Boston has regained her old place in the sun, and has, once more, one of the world's great orchestras.

This may seem like a fairly obvious statement, but I doubt whether all of us have grasped its truth. During the war, and the succeeding seasons under Mr. Rabaud's hopelessly handicapped leadership, the ruin of the orgaization was almost complete. Mr. Monteux, who followed him, was a brilliant program maker and in many respects a fine conductor; but even he was not a stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

For nearly a decade, therefore, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and muttering, "Dear, dear. What a great orchestra that used to be. How sad!" Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra last week played with techical brilliance; tonal beauty, and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it. Which is high praise.

Which is also another way of saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modelled readings of the Debussy Nuages and Fetes of Thursday evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's Daphnis et Chole that was the high point of the program.

* * *

The evening was also marked by a first performace here of Mahler's Ninth Symphony. In it are all the characteristics that have made Mahler a bone of contention in the world's musical kennels. There is no question of the genuine merit of many of Mahler's musical ideas, nor even of their occasional loftiness and nobility. Nor, on the other hand, will even his most convinced apostles deny that his work is flawed by a considerable alloy of commonplace and downright triviality, whatever the pretentiousness of his methods.

But the thing that handicaps Mahler most heavily is his incorrigible long-windedness. Time and again he reaches a point where, having proved his musical point up to the hilt, he is obviously about to stop. Whereupon, like an orator fascinated by his own eloquence, he says, "And twelfthly, my dear friends—" and begins all over again. The Ninth Symphony, as he wrote it, lasts a few minutes short of an hour. Prune it down until nothing is left save Mahler's musical ideas and the amount of development that they are worth, and the Ninth Symphony would last about 20 minutes.

Some day, some real friend of Mahler's will do just that— take a pruning knife and reduce his works to the length that they would have been if the composer had not stretched them out of shape; and then the great Mahler war will be over.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 29 1931

The next two concerts of the Boston Symphony in Boston on Dec. 4 and 5 will be conducted by Richard Burgin. The program includes two études by Vogel, Toch's Little Theatre Suite, Berezowsky's concert for violin with the composer as soloist, and Chausson's symphony in B flat major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

NOV 29 1931

THE REALM OF MUSIC

By W. J. HENDERSON

GUSTAVE MAHLER'S ninth symphony came to New York a few nights ago by way of Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, industrious seeker for variety of interest, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a memorable performance of the work. The symphony has the noble merit of being not drawn to such heavenly length as some of the distinguished composer's other works. It has additional merits which may perchance be mentioned with respect. For the moment let us make apology for our existence.

In his always incomparable program notes Philip Hale reprints a letter of Aaron Copeland, written in 1925 to the Times of this city. Mr. Copeland is a modernist composer of talent and learning. It behooves music lovers to give consideration to him when he speaks of his art or of a fellow artist. In his letter he complained that New York critcs seemed to be unanimous in the conclusion that as a composer Mahler was quite hopeless.

Mr. Copland did not quarrel with us for what we said so much as for what we left unsaid. He himself admitted a few weaknesses in the composer's art, but felt that the beauties far outweighed them. What has always seemed to this writer to be the basis of local critical regret about Mahler was that he so frequently used trivial themes and so often was prolix and pretentious in his working out. These are two serious faults and, if established, are sufficient to prevent the inclusion of most of Mahler's works in the first rank.

Mr. Copland held that "Das Lied von der Erde" has in it the "stuff of living music." We grant that heartily. It is not all of the vital kind, but some of it is. Mahler not infrequently attained beauty and eloquence. But this music lover found in him a composer whose visions were much greater than his powers of musical invention or his skill in construction. The things he tried to do in symphonic form sometimes overmastered him and left him prostrate and breathless. Furthermore, he was apparently unable to view his own work with any perspective. Perhaps this accounted for one of his bad habits.

He breakfasted in bed. After the meal he propped himself up and had sheets of score paper spread on his knees. Then he wrote and wrote and wrote till luncheon. No doubt his mind was in a fine glow throughout the morning. In the language of the street, he was having he time of his life. But he undoubtedly lost all consciousness of the extent of his production, and the fact that he was spreading the butter very thin. He failed to blue pencil his long-winded scores. The thoughts were precious to him. He forgot that the public was not a subject to command, but a disinterested looker-on in Vienna, who had to be won. An ancient matter, indeed, about which one Bobby Burns said the obvious thing in the most memorable way. But Mahler, for whom this writer had a strong personal liking, cannot be said to have suffered from critical indifference or from sweeping condemnation.

Mahler the Aspirer.

Inability to say concisely what they had to say and to perceive the innate worthlessness of certain thematic subjects was what stood in the way of the attainment of their ideals by both Mahler and his admired Bruckner. Those who point out such defects in their work are always censured by the devotees who demand that criticism shall ignore such shortcomings. If there is such a thing as genuine criticism—and this writer believes there is—it is and must always be indifferent to special pleadings. It is not for or against any person. It is for good art and against bad art, and that is its beginning, its end and its only reason for existence.

Mahler's was never bad art. It was sincere. The man was striving with all his ability to express his vague conceptions, his undefined, but nonetheless agonizing aspirations. He was not aiming at those superficial effects which quickly gain approval from the ready hands of an audience, yet seldom remain fixed in the minds. But he fell short of pre-eminence in music because he could not attain that perfect amalgamation of matter and form which Walter aPter, with his habitual critical sagacity, declared to be the triumphant differentiation of music from other arts.

Mahler's music should be performed from tiem to time. To bury it because it is imperfect would be to deprive concertgoers of some interesting hours. For the same reason Bruckner should be heard. There is sufficient loftiness of idea and felicity of expression in the scores of both composers to make us willing to plod through the dusty paths of the barren places. Both men had their moments when they saw the promised land. But the vision was almost always obscure.

Mr. Kleiber Goes East.

Erich Kleiber lays down the baton of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, which is now to be taken up by the illustrious Arturo Toscanini. Mr. Kleiber will return to Germany whence he came trailing garments of glory. He carries with him the good wishes of local music lovers and their players for a long and refreshing repose in his native land. His American experiences have apparently not deeply affected him. He came, he conducted and he kept on conducting till he lulled into apathy a peculiar enthusiasm which fell upon him the instant he mounted the podium.

Mr. Kleiber is a good conductor, but his arrangement of programs do not feed popular enthusiasm year after year. Few conductors are invariably makers of good programs and few invariably make bad ones; but Mr. Kleiber made a strong bid for the championship in the latter class. Perhaps when he returns to this country he may find it worth while to consider the fact that we are not all Germans.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES

NOV 29 1931

Nicolai Berezowsky will play the solo part in his violin concerto at its first American performance to be given by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky Dec. 4.

Julienne Jaume-Bild, French diseuse, will give a costume recital of Breton and other folk songs at the Community Church, Dec. 2 at 8 P. M. Marcel M. Bild will accompany.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 30 1931

SYMPHONY TO PLAY TWO COMPOSITIONS

Boston Orchestra Program, However, Will Be of Normal Length

Only two compositions will be played at the second Providence concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Albee Theatre a week from tomorrow night. The program announced yesterday from Symphony Hall, Boston, will, however, be of normal length, since each of the two symphonic works is a major composition.

The evening will open with Beethoven's B-flat major symphony, No. 4, opus 60, in four movements: I, Adagio; allegro vivace. II, Adagio. III, Allegro vivace; trio, un polo meno allegro, and IV, finale: allegro, ma non troppo.

After the interval the performance will conclude with Rimsky-Korsakov's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), opus 35. The program of the work includes: I, the sea and Sindbad's shop; II, the story of the Kalander Prince; III, the young Prince and the young Princess; IV, festival at Bagdad. The sea. The ship goes to pieces on a rock surmounted by a bronze warrior. Conclusion.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 29 1931

CURRENT MUSIC

TOSCANINI BACK

By MARGARET REGAL

Boston Symphony

Last week the Boston Symphony orchestra made its first visit of the season to Carnegie hall. Thursday evening Mr Koussevitzky conducted the first New York performance of Gustav Mahler's Ninth Symphony. There was general agreement that nearly 20 years was too long to have waited for this work to be played here, that it contains many pages of genuinely inspired music and that, while it is too long and uneven in merit, it has not the fault of prolixity in as great a degree as the others of his symphonies that had preceded it here. Two Debussy orchestra Nocturnes and the second Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" suite completed the program, which demonstrated anew that the Boston orchestra is one of the supremely fine organizations.

Saturday afternoon they played the 12th Handel Concerto Grosso in B minor, Harold Morris's new piano concerto and the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Mr Morris comes from Texas and has derived much of his thematic material from the Negro spirituals; he has developed these into an interesting orchestral composition, with a modestly subordinated piano part.

The regular Thursday concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony was given on Wednesday. It was the first of three performances of Erich Kleiber's final New York program. Mr Kleiber is conceded to be a good conductor, but to lack the gift of good program making, and the rather heterogeneous assortment of works he assembled for this occasion did nothing to acquit him of the charge. There were the Schubert "Rosamunde" overture, two serenades from the Mahler seventh symphony, four minor German dances by Beethoven, Haydn's "Concertante" symphony and the "Beautiful Blue Danube." Mr Kleiber proved, however, that he has few peers as a conductor of the Viennese waltz.

Another orchestra concert was given at the Waldorf-Astoria Sunday night. It was the season's second concert by the Manhattan Symphony, Henry Hadley, conductor. The principal work of the evening was the Brahms third symphony, which was given a musicianly reading; there was also Arthur Foote's Suite in E major for string orchestra and the Smetana "Bartered Bride" overture. In addition two soloists appeared, a 14-year-old soprano, Sylvia Berman, who sang Mozart's aria, "L'Amero," from "Il Re Pastore" in promising fashion and the 'cellist, Maurice Marechale, who gave the first local performance of the Honegger 'cello concerto, which he played with the Boston Symphony last year and which is dedicated to him. It is a fairly interesting but ungrateful composition. The audience was cordial to all concerned.

Herald Dec 1

WERRENRATH TO SING 'DANNY DEEVER' HERE

Reinald Werrenrath, famous operatic and concert baritone, will make his first appearance at popular prices when, on Sunday night, he presents a popular program in the Boston Garden at the first of the Civic Symphony concerts. In addition there will be a concert by the Civic Symphony orchestra, Thompson Stone, director. This orchester numbers 105 musicians, recruited from the leading symphony orchestras of America. The concert is being sponsored by the National Civic Federation, women's department, Massachusetts section.

Werrenrath, flnown as "the most entertaining vocalist" on the stage, will include "Danny Deever" in his program, according to word received yesterday by Mayor Curley, co-sponsor of the concerts. The singer will allow the people of Boston to dictate his program to as far an extent as possible.

Post Dec. 1

FIEDLER TO BE GUEST LEADER

Werrenrath to Sing at Civic Concerts

Arthur Fiedler, who conducted the concerts last summer on the Esplanade, and who has been heard by thousands, has been selected as guest conductor of the first Sunday night Civic Symphony concert at the Boston Garden. The concert will begin at 8:30. All seats are reserved.

Fiedler starts his rehearsals today with the 105-piece Civic Symphony Orchestra. He will present some of his most popular Esplanade numbers.

Reinald Werrenrath, soloist, will arrive in Boston Saturday according to present plans. He will include "Danny Deever" and "Mandalay" in his programme. The demand for those two pieces, which he made famous, was overwhelming. The rest of his programme has not yet been decided upon

The Audiences for Three Orchestras

Basil Maine, English Visitor To Boston and Other Cities Continues His Report

Transcript

IN a previous article [sent to the London Morning Post and reprinted a fortnight ago in The Transcript] I have set down impressions of the three great orchestras of Boston, New York and Philadelphia, impressions gathered from a single program played by each. It may be profitable to discuss here the audiences on these and other occasions, since the audience is an integral part of one's experience of the event, whether it be concert, play or lecture.

The Boston concert I heard as one of a Friday-afternoon audience, an elderly and, for the most part, feminine assembly. An authority informed me that an entirely different set of people came to the Saturday evening concerts, students and young, keen amateurs. "If that is so," I said, "give me Saturday evening in Boston." He smiled and agreed.

Being a guest, I did not say that I thought the Friday afternoon audience seemed aloof, demure, polite, and set upon making the concert a social affair, but I concluded from his subsequent remarks that without the social background, the concerts would not be possible. Without Friday afternoon there could be no Saturday evening—in Boston.

After the concert I was taken to meet Koussevitzky. His room was filled with admirers, many women and a few men, all eager to welcome him back after the summer vacation. For a discreet interval he kept them waiting; then entered, like an actor of the old school, with a black cloak thrown loosely about his shoulders. With well-simulated pleasure and with dignity he received their welcome; then, after a few words to each, quietly and effectively dismissed them.

The subject of music and music-making in England greatly interested him, and I spoke of the beneficent influence of the British Broadcasting Corporation, a factor not even suspected at the time when he appeared more or less regularly in this country. Then came the question which for some reason I always find embarrassing, "And your opera?"—as if I were responsible for the good and the bad of it! Before I could speak he gave answer to himself: "I tell you, no opera scheme will succeed in your country without the active help of Sir Thomas Beecham." I said no more, for clearly he knew as much about the subject as I could tell him.

It was at Philadelphia that I was one of a Saturday night audience. But the atmosphere which I had expected was not there. Everybody was suffering from an inferiorty complex. A deep repression, emanating from somewhere near the conductor's desk, was all-pervading. It was as if we had anticipated the speech which Stokowski made at the end of the concert. He asked the audience to refrain from applause at future concerts: and this, in spite of the fact that a referendum on the question had previously been taken and had gone against him. It was gratifying to see that the audience was in no mood to accede to his request. Some, indeed, as if in irony, began to applaud the speech!

Let us hope that no musician will attempt a like contravention of ordinary human impulse in this country. Arnold Dolmetsch, of course, insists on silence after the performances at his festivals. But a Dolmetsch Concert is unique, and, in any case, applause does seem a little out of place after the still, small voice of the clavichord. The conditions of an orchestral concert are entirely otherwise. After the grandeur of the transcribed Toccata and Fugue of Bach in D minor, silence would give the feeling that a serious hitch had occurred, or even something catastrophic, as if the whole audience had suddenly been stricken with total deafness. Applause is a human and rational need, and must remain so until we have evolved so far as to be able, at will, to translate our bodies from concert-hall to house merely by thinking about it. And that will be after television, not before.

The audience in the Carnegie Hall for the New York Philharmonic Concert was the most alert and invigorating of the three. It was Sunday afternoon, but not the kind we know so well in the Albert Hall; not the kind that is redolent of beef and boredom, of drowsy indigestion and dutiful inertia. These were eager, attentive, and, as I discovered by eavesdropping during the interval, intelligently critical people. The management there has provided a comfortable withdrawing-room, large enough to accommodate, not the whole audience of course, but any who wish to settle some little argument which cannot be carried on in the corridors. That is an idea which can be commended to our own managers; and also the fact that none of the concerts I attended contained more than seventy-five minutes of actual playing. This with an interval of twelve or fifteen minutes was ideal, a heavenly length. . . .

For conclusion, I make this general observation derived from these recent experiences. Orchestral concerts are becoming so numerous in London, the programs so long, that there is a real danger that the public's appetite may sicken and so die. The British Broadcasting Corporation is a gift-horse no musician should look in the mouth—for long. Let us then glance quickly, even if it should embarrass. Are there not too many British Broadcasting Corporation symphony concerts in a season? Are the designs and duration of the programs well enough considered from the public's point of view? Is there not a danger that a fine orchestra will be overworked and become stale? In America I found that the healthiest conditions invariably existed where there was a genuine concern for the needs of the general public. In Philadelphia, conditions are less favorable than elsewhere. Philadelphia should be a warning to London. Autocratic Stokowski, flourishing as he is at the moment, like a green bay-tree, should be a warning to the British Broadcasting Corporation.

At last Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra are ready with "Don Quixote," the one tone-poem of Strauss (save only the seldom played "Macbeth"), in which the conductor has not been heard at Symphony Hall. It is announced for the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 11 and 12. Mr. Bedetti will play Sancho Panza's violoncello.

Full Program Of Unfamiliar Or New Music

TRANS. DEC. 3

Two Modernists, One Russian, And Chausson in Prospect Symphony Hall

TO RECITE the novel pieces on the program for the Symphony Concerts this week is to list all the numbers of that program itself. Mr. Burgin, as conductor, is in no wise being outdone by his illustrious chief and friend, Dr. Koussevitzky. The list begins with two Studies for Orchestra (not transcriptions of studies for piano) by the young Russian, Vladimir Vogel. These two Studies, "Ritmica funebra" and "Ritmica scherzosa" were introduced to America this fall in that remarkable modernist program of Leopold Stokowski which included also works by Ferroud, Stravinsky, Golestan, San Juan, Tansman, von Webern, Mossolov, and Bennett. For second number stands Ernest Toch's "Little Theater Suite," Opus 54, played by Mr. Kleiber and the Philharmonic Society in New York on Nov. 8, last. The suite runs through the following movements: 1. Overture; 2. Bashful Wooing; 3. Dance; 4. Nocturne; 5. Finale: Presto. Following the suite Nicolai Berezovsky's Violin-Concerto, Opus 14, will also present the composer as solo-violinist. At a Monday Concert last spring Mr. Berezovsky was introduced to Boston as conductor in his own symphony. He is still new to the Friday and the Saturday concerts. After intermission comes one of those new-old pieces which are resurrections rather than novelties, but which as such cannot entirely escape the hand of the chronicler of things unusual—Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, Opus 20. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Vincent d'Indy introduced it to America at a concert in Philadelphia in 1905. It has had four performances at Symphony Hall but none since 1923.

Mr. Vogel

Vlaimir Rudolfovitsch Vogel was born at Moscow, Feb. 29, 1896, of a German father and a Russian mother. As a sixteen-year-old boy he was led to the study of musical composition through contact with Skriabin. During the years of the war (specifically, 1915-18) he was a civil prisoner in Russia. After the war Vogel became a pupil of Heinz Tiessen (1918) in Berlin, and studied with Busoni from 1920 to 1924. More recently he is described as a follower of Schönberg. Riemann's list of Vogel's compositions includes the following: Symphonic Prelude, 1921; a suite drawn from music composed for a "symbolical film," for string orchestra and kettle drums (1922); a string quartet (1924); Sinfonia fugato (1926); a chorus for mixed voices, solos, saxophone-ensemble (1928).

The score of the "Two Studies" is dedicated to the City of Königsberg in East Prussia. Though the copy of the score at Symphony Hall bears the date 1930, it also bears the imprint "Second Edition." Mr. J. M. Sanromá gives information that he heard it over the radio during his stay in Germany some three years ago, thus tending to question the assertion that it was "composed and published in 1930." The work was accounted "among the most successful" of the orchestral pieces done at the Oxford-London Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music in the summer of 1931.

In the program-book of the Philadelphia Orchestra, the brilliant editor, Mr. Lawrence Gilman, wrote: "The two Studies are contrasted. The first is a dirge, entitled 'Ritmica funebra.' The second is a scherzo, entitled, 'Ritmica scherzosa.'" Then he quotes Edwin Evans's comment after the English festival: "The main interest of the Studies is not so much thematic as inherent in the rhythms used and in the interplay of timbres, which suffice to create very definite moods. They are Studies in the real sense of the word, excursions on purely orchestral technique." To which one may add only that the orchestra is strong in percussion (including a Chinese drum); that the slow funereally paced first Study opens with a duet between kettle-drum and bass drum. The rhythm here outlined persists through the first portion of the work in full strings; returns again, somewhat less insistently, toward the end, in the final summary of the Study. The title is evidently no misnomer. It is a study on a rhythm. An English horn soon enters above the strings, at first merely joining in the rhythm, later gradually suggesting a tune of its own, which leads to a complex contrapuntal web of melodies in various wind instruments. Of course the idiom is the modern German, dissonant idiom, the style thoroughly "maschinenmässig." When strings cease with the fundamental rhythm, drums take it up, and strings take their place in the melodic web. Their section, the main contrast section of the piece, is somewhat less dissonant than that of the winds . . . The second Study begins with wild surges up and down the range of muted strings. There are trumpet-solos in thirds. The piece is alive with rhythmic interest and sparkle.

Mr. Toch

There was biographical matter about Ernest Toch in these columns when Mr. Sanromá played his Piano-Concerto two years ago. One may summarize here that he was educated for the profession of medicine; that he also engaged in general studies at Vienna and received the degree Doctor of Philosophy in 1921 upon writing a thesis, "Contributions to the Study of Melodic Style"; that he is self-taught in musical composition; that he has won numerous prizes therein; that he is living at present in Berlin.

The impending Suite dates—as far as publication is concerned—from the present year, 1931. The music, by word of the composer, is neither specifically "programmatic" nor entirely "absolute." The so-called "Theater-Situationen" refer to certain general episodes and situations familiar in the theater. The background is Viennese—present-day Viennese; titles or general character, according to the composer, sufficiently indicate the mood of the particular piece. Again the orchestra is the large modern one; again it is rich in percussion. The percussion choir is evidently much in the mind of the composer, for he writes in the score: "The composer entreats a loving ['liebevolle'] and differentiated handling of the percussion. It must be rhythmically precise, but as to sonority must guard its secret. A little key, a thin pencil, a knitting needle, thumbs, the balls of the hand, finger tips, finger nails may prove more serviceable than any specially prepared hammers or drum-sticks." The composer dispenses with the usual tempo indications, but substitutes metronome marks. Thus we learn that of the five numbers only one, the nocturne, moves at a slow pace. The quotations in the following synopsis are again from Mr. Gilman, this time writing in the program book of the New York Philharmonic Society:

I.—"The Overture, in 4-4 time, with its merry theme and its 'wienerisch' 'cello cantilena, evokes the setting for the imaginary episodes." A bustlingly rhythmed music, at the first in strings, at the last in wood-winds, with the running 'cello melody between.

II.—"'Bashful Wooing': a movement in triple time, in the style of a passacaglia, conveying a mood bucolic and idyllic." There is nothing shrinking in this bashfulness, for the tempo is rather fast, the music, full of piquant devices—pizzicati, xylophone solos and a style thereby suggested.

III.—"Dance: 'This movement, in 3-4 time, is intended,' says the composer, 'as a gay contrast to the idyllic mood of the preceding one.'" An exceedingly active movement with continually shifting meter.

IV.—"Nocturne: Ruhig (zart, innig) 3-4 time. This night-piece, scored with delicate fantasy and a daring frugality of means, begins with an oboe-solo of thirty-one measures, followed by a rhythmical pizzicato figure in the strings and a brief solo for the timpani. The oboe's song is heard again, and the voices of clarinet and bassoon are added to it. The pizzicati in the strings recur, followed by a passage for solo violin, solo viola, solo 'cello. The movement ends with a solo for violin accompanied very softly by percussion instruments." To which there is nothing to add save that the oboe solo enters entirely without accompaniment.

V.—"The Finale is a Presto (molto leggiero) with no reference to any particular theatrical situation." A buzzing principal theme for principal section; a dissonant theme for two trumpets in contrast.

The Russian

Nicolai Berezovsky is a young Russian violinist at present working as orchestral musician in New York. His symphony, which he himself conducted, was well received last spring. The present concerto had first performance with Carl Flesch as violinist and the composer as conductor, at Berlin in the spring of 1931. It has had other hearings in Europe. It is short, requiring not much over a quarter-hour in performance. It employs an economical orchestra—wood-winds, trumpets and horns in pairs, fairly liberal percussion, the usual strings. It runs in three movements: Allegro di bravura, Adagio sostenuto, Allegro giusto. The modern, well peppered idiom is its language. It is highly energetic, with few points of repose. The phrase "di bravura" defines the first movement better than a paragraph of description. The violin is a leading voice rather than a solo with accompaniment. The Adagio begins with muted strings taking as basis one of the quieter figures from the first movement. The solo violin at once enters with an expressive melody. Toward the middle, it plays an ornate, decorative music, then returns to the melody of the beginning. The finale is gay, sprightly, playful. There is a period of relative relaxation when a clarinet sings a "giocoso" melody. 'Cellos prepare for re-entry of the principal theme. A Presto section gives the final "pepping-up" which precedes the climactic second return of the chief theme. This time it is in the full orchestra with the

---

the statute void.

⊛ ⊛ ⊛

"Of course, the defendant has every right to defend his property by every reasonable means, but he must yield his views of what is reasonable for that purpose to the judgment of the moral standard of the community, as embodied in the statute, the general subject of suppression of cruel treatment of animals being within legislative competency. The details in the main must be regarded as within the discretion of the law-making power. This decision is reached with a full appreciation of the hardships to farmers against so cunning an enemy as the fox. Farmers have been made subject to favorable and unfavorable legislation, which has been upheld. The statute here assailed is general in terms and includes all trappers, and is not restricted to farmers. Simply because it effects farmers more acutely than other

---

Concert-Chronicle

Past into Present

Tran Dec 3

AFTER the recent concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York, Deems Taylor, the composer who is also journalist, wrote in the newspapers to which he sends a syndicated article: "One conclusion these concerts left is inescapable. It is time we realized that Boston has regained its old place in the sun, and has, once more, one of the world's great orchestras. This may seem a fairly obvious statement, but I doubt whether all of us have grasped its truth. During the war, and the succeeding seasons under Mr. Rabaud's hopelessly handicapped leadership, the ruin of the organization was almost complete. Mr. Monteux, who followed him, was a brilliant program-maker and in many respects a fine conductor; but even he was not stern enough drillmaster to overcome the orchestra's demoralization and bring it within measurable distance of its former perfection.

"For nearly a decade, thereafter, we were in the habit of shaking our heads sadly at every mention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Habits are not easy to break; but we really must get over that one. Mr. Koussevitzky has wrought the miracle that we thought impossible. His orchestra last week played with technical brilliance, tonal beauty, and sensitive response that stamp it as one of the great ones. Karl Muck would have recognized it.

"Which is high praise and which is also another way of saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is a superb conductor. If there were any doubts on that subject, they would have been dispelled by his transparent and exquisitely modeled readings of Debussy's 'Clouds' and 'Fêtes' on Thursday evening, and the stunning performance of Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloë' that was the high point of the program."

MUSIC

Dec 5 Herald

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was performed yesterday afternoon, was conducted by Richard Burgin. It's first half consisted of the following modern works, never before heard in Boston: Wladimir Vogel, Two Etudes (Ritmica funebra, Ritmica scherzosa); Ernest Toch, Little Theatre Suite, Op. 54 (I—Overture. II—Bashful Wooing. III—Dance. IV—Nocturne. V—Finale: Presto); Nicolai Berezovsky, Concerto for Violin, Op. 14. The solo part of the concerto was played by its composer. The second half of the program was occupied by Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20.

Of Wladimir Vogel's "Two Etudes," the English critic, Edwin Evans—a ready and eloquent apologist for modern music with whom Ernest Newman has fought some epic battles—has said that their main interest "is not so much thematic as inherent in the rhythms used and in the interplay of timbres, which serve to create very definite moods. They are studies in the real sense of the word, excursions in purely orchestral technique." The first of these studies, the "Ritmica funebre," did indeed begin by creating an unmistakably funereal mood with its opening measures of intermittent drum-roll and the sombre rhythmic figures for the strings which followed them; and there was an oboe theme that had a melancholy beauty. But as more and more instruments entered and formed a more and more complex web of sound, the "interplay of timbres" presented an effect not unlike that which results from mixing all the colors of a painter's palette into one neutral mess. Nor was there anything especially original or characteristic in the orchestral timbres or rhythmic patterns of the "Ritmica giocosa." Mr. Burgin's beat made it clear that the score must present a terrifying panorama of changing time-signatures, but to the ear all was tame and unexciting. Stravinsky and Copland have given us infinitely more hair-raising rhythms.

More interesting as orchestral experiment was Ernest Toch's "Little Theatre Suite." This music was not written to be performed in connection with any particular stage performance, nor (says the composer) is it absolute music; certain of its movements were meant to suggest situations familiar in the theatre. It is not unlikely, however, that accompanying stage scenes, or ballet scenes, would render them more enjoyable. Their composer undoubtedly heard them in relation to scenes enacted in his mind's eye; their hearers must guess vaguely at their precise purport and detailed implication, or judge them (against the composer's wish) as absolute music. So viewed, these pieces do not pass the test equally well, though all are enlivened by many an ingenious touch and original fancy. With the best intentions in the world one could not find the "Wienerisch violoncello cantilena" of the "Overture" noticeable Viennese, but Mr. Toch was born in Vienna. Nor was it altogether easy to regard the amusing "Bashful Wooing" episode as "idyllic." But the vigorous and really bucolic "Dance," the "Nocturne," and the airy and thoroughly abstract (indeed, almost classic) Finale were wholly delightful.

Mr. Berezovsky showed himself to yesterday's audience both as an extremely dexterous and polished violinist and as a thoroughly contemporary composer. His concerto, in three movements, bears little resemblance to the traditional, banal, 19th-century type. No doubt, the work may by analysis be fitted into the usual pattern, but to the ear it sounds refreshingly new. The melodic material is exceedingly free, in the modern fashion, though the figuration of the violin part is sometimes strongly reminiscent of the Bach of the Brandenburg concertos or of the Handel of the Concerti Grossi. As a whole, too, the music has a vivacity, a luminous passionlessness, a crystalline impersonality, characteristic of 18th-century instrumental music, though the melodic and harmonic idiom is that of a young man of today. Mr. Berezowsky—who was admirably seconded by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra—was warmly applauded and several times recalled.

Chausson's symphony, which had not been performed here since 1923 (under Mr. Monteux), is a work of very different kind. With its monumental dignity, with its well-defined themes used as emotional symbols, emotionally developed, more than as decorative motives, with its rich, warm, sonorous orchestration—a smooth, thick mixture rather than a loosely woven fabric, it is of the consecrated type of romantic symphony. Despite its reminiscences of Wagner, of Franck, its occasional suggestion of Tchaikovsky; despite its moments of banality or pomposity, the symphony is worthy of occasional resuscitation. Not the least pleasing episodes in it are those that might belong to a French "Pastoral symphony," a la Watteau, with idyllically burbling horns and flutes and oboes.

The performance of the orchestra under Mr. Burgin's careful and intelligent direction was excellent. The concert will be repeated tonight.

Next week's program is as follows: D'Indy, "Istar" Variations, Op. 42. Debussy, "La Demoiselle elue" (with Mary Garden, Mae Murray, and the Radcliffe Choral Society). Strauss, "Don Quixote." Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

S. S.

MALDEN WAR VETERAN KILLED BY AUTOMOBILE

Elmer Lawlor, 41, a world war veteran of 34 Highland avenue, Malden, was killed at Mingo street and the Newburyport turnpike in Malden last night by an automobile driven by William Taylor of 84 Appleton street, Saugus.

Lawlor was dead on arrival at the Maplewood Hospital. He was a member of company L, 101st infantry during the world war.

74

Matinee For Moderns and Of Mr. Burgin

Vogel, Toch, Berezovsky, Each With His Own Flavors, Back to Chausson

Trans. Dec. 5

THERE WAS a deputy-conductor, yesterday, at the Symphony Concert—Mr. Burgin, from Concertmaster's chair to podium, as in recent seasons, while Dr. Koussevitzky spent an autumn week in his study, free from rehearsal and performance. Once more the audience clapped Mr. Burgin warmly as he entered; while his colleagues on the stage joined in the plaudits more than courteously. Thus did he have the best of two concert-worlds; while the best of the world in which each of us works daily is not to be despised. Only it knows the worst of us at the job. To the end of the concert, moreover, Mr. Burgin—and the music in hand—held the interest of the audience. Eminent composer-conductors, "guesting" at Symphony Hall in their own works, have done less.

Mr. Burgin, for his part, has put by the diffidence, the apparent self-consciousness, long hampering him in this annual excursion to the conductor's stand. As such things go, he now tends to the other extreme of undue confidence. Throughout the concert his was blunt conducting. So far as a first hearing of new music may test performance, Mr. Toch's "Theater-Suite" asked for lighter handling. Nearly everywhere in it, unless the measures were solo or nearly such, tone was too heavy; orchestral texture over-thick: witty or adroit details obscured. In Chausson's Symphony, the climaxes with the brass released were blatant rather than sonorous. Nor did the conductor catch and convey the composer's sensitive feeling for the timbres of reed and string choir. Perhaps the quick movements of Mr. Berezovsky's Violin-Concerto, which sounded stiff and were boresome, would have seemed less so under a more pliant bâton.

As piece succeeded piece, Mr. Burgin still treated the orchestra as a mass to be split into nothing smaller than a choir or at the least a group. Unless the composer had saved himself by unescapable ordering of his score, inner voices were inaudible; details went by the board; euphonies slipped past unpolished; timbres, soft or hard, lacked edge. These are the days in which conductors and composers treat orchestras in open-work. Mr. Burgin solidified his. Such straightforward conducting has its merit. It leaves the composer's music unwarped by an over-interpretive temperament. But it may also leave it thick-voiced, heavy-gaited, plain-colored. Of the chosen numbers, only Mr. Vogel's two Studies for Orchestra bore well Mr. Burgin's handling. For two years past, he has advanced in the sensitive and expressive art of conducting. Yesterday there was clear recession.

The deputy-conductor's program-making was more fortunate. Revivals are a watchword of the season at Symphony Hall. Chausson's solitary Symphony still deserves occasional hearing. There are conductors, like Mr. Stock in Chicago, who cherish it. Yesterday, for the first time in eight years, it returned to a Boston program. Dr. Koussevitzky practices an impulsive, understandable sympathy for the Russian emigrés of music. Last week it was Mr. Cherepnin from Paris; yesterday, Mr. Berezovsky, young, blonde and sturdy, from New York. A year and a half ago, on a Monday evening, there was room for his First Symphony, the composer conducting; yesterday, for his Violin-Concerto, the composer as violinist. So runs this too human world away.

The other three numbers upheld the honorable tradition of the Symphony Orchestra, established by Dr. Muck, neglected only in the interregnum of Rabaud, maintained as never before by Dr. Koussevitzky—the performance of music written in our immediate day and written by youth. To find the deputy-conductor following it as matter of course was to realize how firmly it has become the high distinction of the Concerts, how thoroughly all concerned in the ordering of them are impregnated with it. Mr. Vogel is a Russo-German turning into his thirties. Mr. Toch is older; but known to Boston hitherto by a Piano-Concerto only. Mr. Berezovsky is as young as Mr. Vogel.

Here they all were upon a single program, each with unmistakable stamp of this present hour. In Germany, where they must classify or suffocate, Mr. Vogel passes for a Schönbergian, though in the Studies there are few traces of such influence. Mr. Toch is the wit of modernistic music, mislaid in Berlin, when Paris or Vienna should be his city. Mr. Berezovsky at least writes briefly and to entertain, which is good modernist practice. Plainly Mr. Burgin is also faithful to his own day. So much the better for him. Even the audience—of a Friday afternoon—turned up enough sympathizers to give all four hearty applause.

Mr. Vogel's Studies are impressive. By a persistent rhythm, but much more by sonorities and the interplay of instrumental color, the first germinates, unfolds, imposes and enforces the funereal mood. From first note to last it is sombre music unrelieved; tragic rather than anguished, heroical of lament, charged more with the majesty and less with the pangs of mourning The reiterated, relentless rhythmic figures; the ceaseless intensifying of the plangent sonorities, the deepening and the darkening of the instrumental colors; the implacable march, the sudden up-sweepings and down-fallings, betoken a music of large design, unflagging strength, directed power. Such concentrated and sustained will to create in a single far-flung possession is rare in these days; by its rarity irresistible. While the hearer is absorbed in the puissance of the orchestra for sonority, color, rhythm, he is caught into the passion; by it mastered. There are many ways with modernities. Mr. Vogel's is the way of mighty, but measured, insistence. The second Study, scherzo-like, runs exuberantly a briefer course. Orchestral sleight of hand now makes play with a leaping rhythm, lighter sonorities, flicking color.

Mr. Toch's Suite is fantastical and amusing. The hearer knows not the theater-moments that spurred the composer to look in his playhouse memories, then "make some music." He cares not at all for the promptings to the sequence of moods, so long as those moods are diversified and charactered. Mr. Toch is an adroit craftsman in modernity. He knows what he would say and the exact means by which to say it. At will, he is briefly pastoral, pictorial, poetical. By choice he is oftener playful, mocking, witty, sardonic. His humor or his fantasy, is ready and waiting; his hand, through the Suite, invariably light. He does not write an "important" music, probably being well aware that there is enough of it in this overburdened world. No more does he write in passion or vision. For the while he is content to amuse—a most desirable and by no means easy exercise of the creative faculties. He does amuse ingratiatingly, which is ample reward for twenty minutes in concert-hall. Blessed be the modernists. They take music, as all men and things should occasionally be taken, down from pedestals.

Mr. Berezovsky plays the violin with an unobtrusive skill. He is sensitive to his instrument, with a light hand drawing from it suave or sparkling tone. He makes a first movement of pretty and transparent pattern-weaving; a finale that would be vivacious as well; between sets a pleasing, passionless tune, loosely wrought, well found. A happy brevity saves him from repetition, his listeners from more than momentary boredom. It appears that Stravinsky did not invent the twenty-minute violin-concerto.

Chausson's Symphony has aged, like nearly all the Franckian product, even of the master himself. The mildly "cyclic" form, the Franckian progressions and sonorities now leave as little impression behind as the inevitable Wagnerian admixtures. All three are proper to Chausson's predilections and admirations, to the time—the turn into the nineties—and the circle in which he lived and wrote. What persists in the Symphony and preserves it is personal quality. From shape to shape, from flavor to flavor it shifts: here a gentle poignancy or a pure sensuousness; there a fine clear ardor that may speak out in noble fervor or still into quiet rapture. The tears of things haunt the slow movement. In the finale there are moments of unclouded exaltation. The Symphony embalms an individual spirit. Through the veilings of a time and a manner, its sensibility still pierces, its richness exhales.

H. T. P.

Dec. 5. MUSIC Herald De

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was performed yesterday afternoon, was conducted by Richard Burgin. It's first half consisted of the following modern works, never before heard in Boston: Wladimir Vogel, Two Etudes (Ritmica funebra, Ritmica scherzosa); Ernest Toch, Little Theatre Suite, Op. 54 (I—Overture. II—Bashful Wooing. III—Dance. IV—Nocturne. V—Finale: Presto); Nicolai Berezowsky, Concerto for Violin, Op. 14. The solo part of the concerto was played by its composer. The second half of the program was occupied by Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20.

Of Wladimir Vogel's "Two Etudes," the English critic, Edwin Evans—a ready and eloquent apologist for modern music with whom Ernest Newman has fought some epic battles—has said that their main interest "is not so much thematic as inherent in the rhythms used and in the interplay of timbres, which serve to create very definite moods. They are studies in the real sense of the word, excursions in purely orchestral technique." The first of these studies, the "Ritmica funebre," did indeed begin by creating an unmistakably funereal mood with its opening measures of intermittent drum-roll and the sombre rhythmic figures for the strings which followed them; and there was an oboe theme that had a melancholy beauty. But as more and more instruments entered and formed a more and more complex web of sound, the "interplay of timbres" presented an effect not unlike that which results from mixing all the colors of a painter's palette into one neutral mess. Nor was there anything especially original or characteristic in the orchestral timbres or rhythmic patterns of the "Ritmica giocosa." Mr. Burgin's beat made it clear that the score must present a terrifying panorama of changing time-signatures, but to the ear all was tame and unexciting. Stravinsky and Copland have given us infinitely more hair-raising rhythms.

More interesting as orchestral experiment was Ernest Toch's "Little Theatre Suite." This music was not written to be performed in connection with any particular stage performance, nor (says the composer) is it absolute music; certain of its movements were meant to suggest situations familiar in the theatre. It is not unlikely, however, that accompanying stage scenes, or ballet scenes, would render them more enjoyable. Their composer undoubtedly heard them in relation to scenes enacted in his mind's eye; their hearers must guess vaguely at their precise purport and detailed implication, or judge them (against the composer's wish) as absolute music. So viewed, these pieces do not pass the test equally well, though all are enlivened by many an ingenious touch and original fancy. With the best intentions in the world one could not find the "Wienerisch violoncello cantilena" of the "Overture" noticeable Viennese, but Mr. Toch was born in Vienna. Nor was it altogether easy to regard the amusing "Bashful Wooing" episode as "idyllic." But the vigorous and really bucolic "Dance," the "Nocturne," and the airy and thoroughly abstract (indeed, almost classic) Finale were wholly delightful.

Mr. Berezowsky showed himself to yesterday's audience both as an extremely dexterous and polished violinist and as a thoroughly contemporary composer. His concerto, in three movements, bears little resemblance to the traditional, banal, 19th-century type. No doubt, the work may by analysis be fitted into the usual pattern, but to the ear it sounds refreshingly new. The melodic material is exceedingly free, in the modern fashion, though the figuration of the violin part is sometimes strongly reminiscent of the Bach of the Brandenburg concertos or of the Handel of the Concerti Grossi. As a whole, too, the music has a vivacity, a luminous passionlessness, a crystalline impersonality, characteristic of 18th-century instrumental music, though the melodic and harmonic idiom is that of a young man of today. Mr. Berezowsky—who was admirably seconded by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra—was warmly applauded and several times recalled.

Chausson's symphony, which had not been performed here since 1923 (under Mr. Monteux), is a work of very different kind. With its monumental dignity, with its well-defined themes used as emotional symbols, emotionally developed, more than as decorative motives, with its rich, warm, sonorous orchestration—a smooth, thick mixture rather than a loosely woven fabric, it is of the consecrated type of romantic symphony. Despite its reminiscences of Wagner, of Franck, its occasional suggestion of Tchaikovsky; despite its moments of banality or pomposity, the symphony is worthy of occasional resuscitation. Not the least pleasing episodes in it are those that might belong to a French "Pastoral symphony," a la Watteau, with idyllically burbling horns and flutes and oboes.

The performance of the orchestra under Mr. Burgin's careful and intelligent direction was excellent. The concert will be repeated tonight.

Next week's program is as follows: D'Indy, "Istar" Variations, Op. 42. Debussy, "La Demoiselle elue" (with Mary Garden, Mae Murray, and the Radcliffe Choral Society). Strauss, "Don Quixote." Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

S. S.

MALDEN WAR VETERAN KILLED BY AUTOMOBILE

Elmer Lawlor, 41, a world war veteran of 34 Highland avenue, Malden, was killed at Mingo street and the Newburyport turnpike in Malden last night by an automobile driven by William Taylor of 84 Appleton street, Saugus.

Lawlor was dead on arrival at the Maplewood Hospital. He was a member of company L, 101st infantry during the world war.

Globe MUSIC Dec 5

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert, making what has become his annual appearance. Dr Koussevitzky for several seasons past has entrusted a pair of concerts to Mr Burgin at about this time. The audience greeted Mr Burgin cordially. Of his popularity with the subscribers there is no doubt.

Mr Burgin's program included three first performances in Boston, of music by Vogel, Toch, and Berezowsky, pair the Chausson symphony, unheard here since 1923. Mr Berezowsky was the soloist in his own violin concerto. With the exception of Mahler's Ninth Symphony, these novelties were the only significant music new to Boston to be played thus far this season. Dr Koussevitzky's new pieces thus far have been singularly tepid and ineffective. Mr Burgin's proved stimulating, though it must be said that three modern novelties on a single program tax the listener's powers of absorption.

Wladimir Vogel, whose two Etudes entitled "Ritmica funebra" and "Ritmica scherzosa," began the concert, is a Russian by birth, but his father was German and he has studied in Berlin. These two studies are not merely interesting experiments in the use of unusual rhythmic and instrumental effects. They are written in an idiom perhaps too self consciously original, but the composer manages to express, poignantly, feelings not confined to him but common to the generation adolescent when the World War came.

Toch's "Little Theatre Suite" confirmed one's impression that he is a noteworthy modern German, a living refutation, as is Hindemith, of the notion prevalent in Paris and London that there has been no German music since Richard Strauss began to repeat himself.

Berezowsky, another young Russian, now a member of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, has, in the violin concerto heard yesterday, written music less vital, less salient thematically, than the symphony he conducted here last season. He has, however, added to the very restricted orchestral repertory of the concert violinist a concerto worthy, like those of Prokofiev and Sibelius, of performance before audiences sated with Mendelssohn, Brahms and Beethoven. He played the solo part well, though without dazzling virtuosity.

Mr Burgin's conducting throughout the program was musicianly and authoritative. Save Dr Koussevitzky, there is nobody in Boston so well equipped to conduct the Boston Symphony should any emergency necessitate a substitute or assistant. Mr Burgin has in fact developed as a conductor to the point where he would be quite capable of directing a series of orchestral concerts by any orchestra not in a position to summon a world-famous master.

His reading of Chausson's symphony was an eloquent and compelling one. This music has been unjustly obscured by the fame of Cesar Franck. Chausson was not merely a pupil of Franck. He owes quite as much, in fact, to Wagner as to his famous master. And his utterance is authentically his own, no mere echo of other and greater geniuses. This symphony should be more often heard. Yesterday's audience was plainly impressed by it.

The music of Vogel and Toch heard yesterday might serve as an illustration of the style of the post-war era. Gone are the grandiose sonorities, the luscious harmonies, the long-drawn-out loose musical structure of the late 19th Century. In their place we have pregnant rhythms, out of which grow polyphonic patterns, with much incidental dissonance, brevity, pungency of utterance, lightness of touch and often, as in Toch's suite, of mood. The change is to some minds for the better, a reversion to the mood and manner of the 18th Century, though by no means to the idiom of Haydn.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will conduct d'Indy's "Istar," Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," with Mary Garden and Marie Murray as soloists.

Amer Dec 5

Symphony Led by New Hand

By MOSES SMITH

Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, takes his annual turn at wielding the baton in a symphony program this week, while his chief, Serge Koussevitzky, rests from arduous labors.

Far from being a routine affair, this concert is one of the most remarkable of the year. The first three numbers are all new to Boston, while the last, Chausson's Symphony in B-flat major, is a revival, last heard here during the regime of Pierre Monteux. And something like a miracle is the fact that all of these unfamiliar works proved to be worth-while music.

The first of the novelties was two Etudes entitled "Ritmica Funebra" and "Ritmica Scherzosa" by Vladimir Vogel. As the titles indicate, these pieces are studies in rhythm ingeniously wrought and sparingly orchestrated. We liked them even better than the Little Theater Suite of the more celebrated Toch, though that work, too, had some delightful stuff in it. Toch's music, indeed, was preferable to his extraordinary literary explanation of it, wherein he pointed out that the music was neither program nor absolute. Perhaps it is in order to revise one's definitions.

The last of the new works was a violin concerto by a Russian composer now living in New York, Nicolai Berezowsky. The concerto, in which the composer proved to be an able violinist, was unfortunately placed, coming after two exacting new scores, leaving the listener hardly fresh for new impressions. Even so, the concerto seemed well made, having interesting thematic material of an unconventional sort, and remarkable passage work for the solo violin.

Mr. Berezowsky was cordially, but not enthusiastically, received by the Friday matinee audience.

Monitor Dec 5

Music

Boston Symphony

For the seventh pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky relinquished his baton to his concertmaster and assistant, Mr. Richard Burgin, who conducted, on the afternoon of Dec. 4, in Symphony Hall, Boston, the following program: Vogel, Two Etudes; Toch, "Little Theater Suite"; Berezowsky, Concerto for Violin, op. 14; Chausson, Symphony in B flat.

Like a good deputy, Mr. Burgin carried on the policy of his principal in the matter of introducing novelties. Nor were his novelties altogether lacking in interest. Realizing that there must be place in symphony programs for some of the less forbidding forms of the tonal art, he began his concert with two "modernist" works in lighter vein.

Vogel's "Ritmica Funebra" and "Ritmica scherzosa," introduced at Oxford last summer and at Philadelphia this fall, are engaging studies in rhythm and instrumental color, which were worthy of the success they won with the public. Toch's Suite, submitted to New York by Erich Kleiber this season, proved to be cleverly contrived, witty in content and suave in manner. It makes us smile as we listen, and there are worse recipes than that for music. Mr. Berezowsky's Concerto did not make us smile. It made us regret that the composer—who was also the soloist—should have undertaken composition in so difficult a form before he had a great deal to say, or was prepared to say it in an unusual and interesting way.

Chausson's Symphony, unheard in Boston since Mr. Monteux's day, deserved its revival. After eight years, it fell gratefully upon the ear. True, it does not bear the credentials of original genius; its debt to Franck and to Wagner is evident. But it is one of a few French symphonies which need to be heard occasionally, alongside those of other nations.

Mr. Burgin, who was warmly received, continues to grow in directorial authority and imaginativeness.

L. A. S.

153

MUSIC Globe

SYMPHONY HALL Dec

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concert master o the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert making what has become his annua appearance. Dr Koussevitzky for sev era' seasons past has entrusted a pair of concerts to Mr Burgin at about this time. The audience greeted Mr Burgin cordially. Of his popularity with the subscribers there is no doubt.

Mr Burgin's program included three first performances in Boston, of music by Vogel, Toch, and Berezowsky, and the Chausson symphony, unheard here since 1923. Mr Berezowsky was the soloist in his own violin concerto. With the exception of Mahler's Ninth Symphony, these novelties were the only significant music new to Boston to be played thus far this season. Dr Koussevitzky's new pieces thus far have been singularly tepid and ineffectiv Mr Burgin's proved stimulating, though it must be said that three modern novelties on a single program tax the listener's powers of absorption.

Wladimir Vogel, whose two Etudes entitled "Ritmica funebra" and "Ritmica scherzosa," began the concert, is a Russian by birth, but his father was German and he has studied in Berlin. These two studies are not merely interesting experiments in the use of unusual rhythmic and instrumental effects. They are written in an idiom perhaps too self consciously original, but the composer manages to express, poignantly, feelings not confined to him but common to the generation adolescent when the World War came.

Toch's "Little Theatre Suite" confirmed one's impression that he is a noteworthy modern German, a living refutation, as is Hindemith, of the notion prevalent in Paris and London that there has been no German music since Richard Strauss began to repeat himself.

Berezowsky, another young Russian, now a member of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, has, in the violin concerto heard yesterday, written music less vital, less salient thematically, than the symphony he conducted here last season. He has, however, added to the very restricted orchestral repertory of the concert violinist a concerto worthy, like those of Prokofiev and Sibelius, of performance before audiences sated with Mendelssohn, Brahms and Beethoven. He played the solo part well, though without dazzling virtuosity.

Mr Burgin's conducting throughout the program was musicianly and authoritative. Save Dr Koussevitzky, there is nobody in Boston so well equipped to conduct the Boston Symphony should any emergency necessitate a substitute or assistant. Mr Burgin has in fact developed as a conductor to the point where he would be quite capable of directing a series of orchestral concerts by any orchestra not in a position to summon a world-famous master.

His reading of Chausson's symphony was an eloquent and compelling one. This music has been unjustly obscured by the fame of Cesar Franck. Chausson was not merely a pupil of Franck. He owes quite as much, in fact, to Wagner as to his famous master. And his utterance is authentically his own, no mere echo of other and greater geniuses. This symphony should be more often heard. Yesterday's audience was plainly impressed by it.

The music of Vogel and Toch heard yesterday might serve as an illustration of the style of the post-war era. Gone are the grandiose sonorities, the luscious harmonies, the long-photo shows the wonder child at the ~~Traveler Dec 5~~

BURGIN CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Perhaps no more trying place could have been cnosen for Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, than as conductor of the concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

For despite the brilliance and interest of the youthful and rarely talented Nicolai Berezowsky as composer and soloist, despite the beauty of the Chausson B-flat major symphony, a surfeit of modern music found found an audience somewhat restless, quite frankly puzzled. There was gratitude for the lovely adagio of Mr. Berezowsky's violin concerto, with the composer himself in the solo part revealing a skilled and beautiful tone quality, and for a superb and masterly performance of the Chausson Symphony.

Two Etudes by Vogel opened the program with a resounding and even promising drum beat. But the merits of the composer's musical expressions must remain, certainly for most listeners, obscure. The ultra-modern style of the "Ritimica funebra," a lugubrious and formless series of discordant, harsh and ugly sounds, may be questioned as of any real value. The "Ritimica Scherzosa" which followed at least emerged as slightly more tuneful but hardly of more importance. Vogel was followed by the Toch Little Theatre suite, decidedly more musically worthwhile, but of which only the nocturne and finale held anything appealing.

Mr. Berezowsky displayed a splendid musicianship, apparent for the most part in the second movement of his concerto. There is a revelation of deep and fine understanding, a sincerity and originality, and a tremendous vigor.

The last half of the program held the Chausson Symphony, one of the far too few existing monuments to the fame of the French composer. It is an arresting example of his distinguished work.

The presence of the Barrymores in the audience added to the distinction of the Friday afternoon occasion.

The program will be repeated this evening, while next week we are promised Wagner's Faust Overture, Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue" with the Radcliffe Choral Society, Mary Garden and Marie Murray as soloists, and the substitution for the Strauss "Don Quixote" of the Istar symphonic variations by the Vincent d'Indy, whose death has just occurred.

J. D.

BURGIN AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Modernists' Music and Chausson's Work Played

Post Dec 5

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The uncompromising modernists, hitherto absent from the symphony concerts of this season, returned there yesterday afternoon under the aegis, not of Dr. Koussevitzky, their so ardent champion in past years, but of Mr. Burgin, who yearly, at this time, relinquishes his post as leader of the first violins to guide the orchestra through a pair of concerts.

VOGEL SKILLED COMPOSER

These modern pieces were three in number: a pair of orchestral studies, titled "Ritmica funebra" and "Ritmica scherzosa," by the half-German, half-Russian Vogel, a new name in Boston; the Little Theatre Suite by the brilliant Toch; and a Violin Concerto by Nicolai Berezowsky, formerly of Leningrad, now of New York, in which the composer was soloist. For contrast and as balm for harassed ears Mr. Burgin devoted the second part of the concert to the Symphony of the Franckian pupil and disciple, Ernest Chausson, unheard in Symphony Hall since 1923.

The first of Vogel's Studies, with its major emphasis on rhythm, its liberal use of percussion instruments and its savage dissonance, reminded some of the piano and percussion accompaniment to which Miss Wigman had danced her Death Dance the evening before. The companion-piece, less drastic in character, further disclosed Vogel as a skilled and strongly individual composer.

Toch Arouses Interest

There are modernists who have something to say, as there are also those who merely ape and follow. To the first class belongs Ernest Toch, who has ideas and fancy as well as technical mastery. His Little Theatre Suite is engaging for all its atonality and should be heard again. Yesterday's performance, like that of Vogel's Studies, was brilliant and effective.

Mr. Berezewsky, on the other hand, seems in this Concerto, as in his Symphony of last season, to be of the followers rather than the leaders in the modernistic movement. His Concerto has a slow division of pleasant melancholy, but the rest is negative. At least he does not over-weight the solo instrument with ponderous orchestration. He played his music with technical finish and, in the slow movement, with charm of tone, and was politely received by the audience.

Redeemed by Slow Movement

For the refined and gentle and aristocratic Chausson the writing of a Symphony was something of a tour de force. His talent, essentially lyric and sensitive with a pervading vein of melancholy, hardly fitted him for sustained or heroic utterance. His Symphony often falters, and in it bluster and blatancy now and then take place of strength. But it is amply redeemed by the nobly mournful slow movement which might serve as memorial music for the departed great, by the impressive introduction to the first movement and by the arresting initial presentation of that movement's chief theme.

The end, in its way exciting, was superbly played yesterday and the warm applause that followed repeatedly returned Mr. Burgin to the stage until he bade his fellow-players bow their acknowledgements.

Trans

ton on Jan. 14, 15, 16; Gustav Holst at the concerts in Boston on Jan. 22-23. Mr. Clifton was known to Bostonians in his Harvard days; has since gained place in New York as able conductor of a student orchestra. Mr. Holst is the distinguished English composer, who will also be guest, for some months, of the Division of Music at Harvard.

The Symphony written by Roussel for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, was heard for the first time in Paris at a Lamoureux Concert on Sunday, Nov. 29. Albert Wolff was conductor.

Stravinsky Heard By Ernest Newman

The Critic Again Sidewipes The Composer Apropos His Newest Pieces

Dec. 18 — Trans,

At the Courtauld-Sargent concert, Stravinsky conducted his two latest works, the "Psalms-Symphony" for chorus and orchestra, and the Violin-Concerto. The general effect of each was to make us wonder once more what has become latterly of the man of genius who producd some of the earlier works of the same composer. The only conclusion one can come to is that the actual fund of music in him at the first was not a very large one; that to call forth the best of it he needed a certain kind of external stimulus and support of a pictorial order; and that when he now tries to write music without this kind of stimulus and support he becomes merely commonplace. His problem is quite a different one from that of Strauss. We cannot quite say of the later Stravinsky, as we can of the later Strauss, that he is a sort of inverted John Brown, whose soul lies a-mouldering in the grave, but his body goes marching on. A certain amount of degeneraiton there has undoubtedly been in Stravinsky also. But with Strauss it has been a case of sheer general exhaustion, perhaps due primarily to physical causes, of what was a mind of exceptional fullness at first; while in the case of Stravinsky it has been a matter of failure due to a persistent attempt to assert himself in a kind of music for which he has the minimum of natural aptitude.

Take the Violin-Concerto. In a worl of this kind, that affects to be "pure" music, the composer has necessarily t proceed more or less along establishe lines. There is, first of all, the questio of design. Characteristically enough Stravinsky tries to persuade us that i this respect, as in all others, he is wholly uniquely original. Characteristically enough, the less intelligent of his partisans aid and abet him therein. The reader may remember a recent referenc in this column to a grotesque article, by one of Stravinsky's incense-burners, i which the composer gave his own priceless views on musical structure: "for a Mozart, the invention of the themes represented . . . the maximum effort All the rest was made up in great par of a certain formalism, or, at least, technical skill had the upper hand over creative fantasy." Turning, however, to "my own music," he modestly informed us that "every bar is the result of an enormous condensation of thought, so that sometimes in a whole day's work I just manage to write one or two."

This interview was actually reprinted, in all its exquisite fatuity, in the program notes of Monday's concert! One can only surmise that Stravinsky and his camp followers must have a very rudimentary notion both of musical structure and of mental concentration and condensation; for in comparison with even a Mozart's first movement, to say nothing of a Beethoven's or an Elgar's first movement, the construction of that of the Violin-Concerto is quite infantile. It stands in about the same relation to a piece of real construction and real concentration as a child's sand castle does to St. Paul's.

Stravinsky has never shown the slightest faculty for construction. He is essentially a short-winded miniaturist, who could never think consecutively with any success for more than a few bars at a time, though when he had the right pictorial subject to work upon he could achieve miracles of sharp characterization in a series of thumb-nail sketches. I repeat that so far as structure is concerned this Violin-Concerto of his is merely elementary. That, perhaps, would not be fatal to it if the thinking, within the scope of these elementary designs, were musically first-rate. But it is not.

The truth seems to be that Stravinsky is not by nature a composer of "absolute" music, and that when he attempts it he falls between two stools. In his greater works, melody, harmony and rhythm are all of a piece and constitute a unified whole. That is because he is painting with his eye on the object, and the object is generally one with a touch of strangeness about it that justifies complete and consistent strangeness in the means employed to delineate it. But when he comes to write purely self-subsistent music he is pulled in one direction by his real genius for strange chord-structures and strange colors, and in another direction by his merely mediocre talent for melody of the symphonic kind.

The first movement of the concerto is a complete proof of this. Melodically it is just a compendium of pleasant commonplaces that have already done duty a thousand times in violin literature. Coloristically it is genuine Stravinsky, full of arresting piquancies. But the two media do not coalesce; and the final result of it all is a feeling that the composer is trying to work in an element that is not naturally his. One gets more of the real Stravinsky in the second of the two Arias, with its free melodic arabesques over simple harmonic chord-formations. The work as a whole, though finally disappointing, throws, however, an interesting light on what is vital and what is feeble in this curious and intriguing mind.

The same remarks apply more or less to the "Psalms-Symphony." The opening page, for instance, that would perhaps justify itself in connection with some simple ballet figures, is merely the extremity of Muscovite childishness as a prelude to Psalm XXXIX. Some of the vocal writing is pitiably commonplace in invention, and the double fugue has little interest beyond the academic. But every now and then, when Stravinsky reverts to type, he becomes extremely impressive—in the final pages, for example, where he repeats his old-style short Russian fragments of melody and harmony again and again, and, by dint in part of the fascinating strangeness of his color, in part of the sheer persistence of the repetitions, achieves an undeniable dignity that is almost grandeur. But the feeling with which one comes away from it all is that in works such as those given us on Monday, Stravinsky is floundering about in an element not really his. The sooner he gets back to his native, narrow but pungent Russian mentality the better it will be for him and for us. [From the Sunday Times, London

---

Concert-Chronicle

These Moderns Trans. Dec 9

The new music, first heard at the Symphony Concert of Friday, fared better at the repetition of Saturday. Mr. Burgin, conducting, was in juster balance, with a lighter, more elastic hand upon both composers and players. The small orchestra, within which or against which Mr. Berezovsky set his solo-violin, eighteenth-century fashion, moved more flexibly, suggesting a pretty ingenuity on his part. But to an audience, schooled year in and year out to the violin-concertos of Brahms and Beethoven, with occasional excursions elsewhere, say into Sibelius, his unpretentious little piece was bound to sound sadly slender. Mr. Toch was most the gainer by more plastic and sympathetic conducting. The dissonances in his "Theater-Suite" asserted their amusing quality. With humor he set forth the "Bashful Wooing" or pretended for an instant to be jazzing his dance. Sundry modernists take themselves and their theory and practice in music-making over-seriously, especially if they happen to be young Americans. The elder and Continental Toch does not.

Already superior ears and minds were demurring to Mr. Vogel's two Studies in orchestral sonorities and rhythm, though the impression upon most hearers was unabated. The Funeral Music, it was said, harked back to the first movement of Mahler's Fifth Symphony. In these latter days only a composer of genius—and Mr. Vogel is hardly that—could write a processional dirge without recalling such a masterpiece. It is to be observed, however, that absorbed in his color, rhythm, sonority, and the emotion thereby engendered, Mr. Vogel sounds no personal note, like the agonized cry with which Mahler pierces his mourning as though the gates of death and damnation had opened before his imagination. It was objected also that Mr. Vogel's melodic inventions were of small significance. Quite so—because he sought by other means to gain his creative ends. As well object that a tennis-ball might be better made, while Mr. Doeg and Mr. Cochet are performing remarkably with it—by their strokes.

Incident and Prospects

This department regrets apologetically that by one of those confusions of mind from which none of us escapes, it assigned the choral parts in Mozart's Requiem—at the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 18 and 19—to a Harvard-Radcliffe choir. As last winter, Mr. Woodworth's Bach Cantata Club will sing them.

The student orchestra of the Conserva-

Side by Side Variations by Two Masters

For the Symphony Concerts Strauss's "Don Quixote" And d'Indy's "Istar"

Dec 10 — Trans

For two months the writer whose initials appear at the end of these Thursday articles has been intrigued to discover how often he can find something of novelty in the weekly Symphony Concerts, if only the novelty of long overlooked pieces now revived. The list in which this is possible grows longer and longer. Without recounting past examples, consider the present week. Strauss's "Don Quixote" has not been heard at Symphony Hall since Mr. Monteux played it in the spring of 1922, exactly ten seasons ago; d'Indy's Symphonic Variations to the fable of Istar (now included to recall his recent death) have lain on the shelf since 1920 while Mary Garden, in singing the soprano part in Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" will be strange apparition at these concerts. Once more novelty on every hand. And those who look for schemes of this, that, and the other in program-making, will find here two exceedingly diverse examples of the variation form.

In none of his works has Strauss gone farther in the matter of orchestral realism than in "Don Quixote: Introduction, Theme with Variations and Finale: Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Opus 35." Nowhere, even in "Heldenleben" or "Till Eulenspiegel" has he been more expert in adapting a musical form to a large, comprehensive program. (Whether form or program came first matters not to the listener, while the theorist is forced to note that the two are so perfectly fused that it is possible to argue almost equally well on either side of the question.) As expertly he joins the tragic to the comic, mingles the pathetic and the scurrilous, sets heroic dream pictures over against pitiful reality.

"Don Quixote" is by no means a "theme with variations" in the ordinary sense. In the first place there are two themes: the theme of the Knight and the theme of his faithful squire, Sancho Panza: even the theme of the beloved Dulcinea occurs frequently enough to be considered almost a third theme for variation. In the second place, the themes themselves do not change materially in the different variations. Indeed, each has already undergone rather exhaustive development in the long introduction, which has been aptly called a "soul-study" of the title-character, Don Quixote. The variations are rather variations of environment for the themes, together with the resultant reactions of the themes to their environment. The chosen adventures of Cervantes's famous hero are taken as points of departure in furnishing these changes of environment.

The introduction begins with a ph for woodwinds, typical of the knightly hero under all conditions. At once the character-analysis (or shall we say synthesis, for we proceed from the particular to the general?) begins. A duet between second violins and violas suggests dreams of a dual nature, or of desire for a "lady of his heart." He is shown as a person of inner conflicts of doubts and hesitations, of indirections and circumlocutions. He is Don Quixote, the dreamer, the vain imaginer, the projector of impossible adventures and escapades. In his dreams of knightly deeds he thinks inevitably of the lady fair for whom true knight must always battle—and we hear for the first time the Dulcinea theme in the songful notes of the oboe. But the thought of battle brings yet another Don forward, the fighting man, to whom trumpets give militant voice. Then follows the first combination of themes, the dreamy Don with Dulcinea. There is much more of this development and combination and transformation of themes.

In this first part of the introduction we have already had rich and abundant variation of the motives originally announced. And all before the full-fledged theme is reached. Building to a considerable cadence with the motif which presents the Knight as a person of inner conflicts, Strauss prepares for that theme. In complete form, evolved from many of the motives already exposed, a solo 'cello now plays it. Above it on the page is the first of the two programmatic indications—two only—in the score: "Don Quixote, the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance." At once comes the companion theme, labelled simply "Sancho Panza." At the beginning it comes from bass clarinet and tenor tuba. A little later it passes to solo viola, where it is most frequnetly heard in what follows. It is whimsical, half stupid, half comic in character.

Variation I. This is the adventure in which Don Quixote charges into the windmills, taking them for wicked giant enemies. Knight and man are walking side by side—knightly theme in 'cello solo, servant's alternating between bass clarinet and viola solo. The vision of Dulcinea looms in the hero's mind as he is about to give battle. For a dozen measures there is realistic imitation of the turning of the huge sails and the creaking of their axles. Into it all the hero charges, only to be hurled to the ground—quick, descending harp arpeggio ending with cymbal crash. In fragments the 'cello theme tries to rise, and soon we are ready for Variation 11.—The assault upon the flock of sheep. The hero theme appears martially. Soon by various orchestral devices one hears the bleating of sheep with a degree of realism probably entirely unparalleled in music. There is equal disaster for our sad knight. And in Variation III.—Sancho Panza fully expresses himself about "such goings on." The Knight reassures him; paints for him a picture of a fairy kingdom which together they shall attain. In reality this is broad continuation of the broad development of themes and motives begun in the introduction and interrupted by the two previous variations or episodes. Of course Dulcinea has her proper part in the promised fairy kingdom—a charming music.

Variation IV.—The adventure with the procession. The hero meets a procession of pilgrims with a picture of the Madonna. Their song is heard broadly, in chorale-like half-note brass chords. Again ignominious defeat, descent to the ground. Sancho bewails his master's supposed death. But Quixote rises painfully.

Variation V.—Don Quixote's vigil in the summer night. Here is further continuation of the development of fundamental themes. It is the nocturne of the tone-poem. The mysteries of the summer night mingle with a rising passion for the beloved in whose services the Knight believes himself.

Variation VI.—Appropriately this variation is answer to Don Quixote's longing. It is Dulcinea. The lady of his dreams really a peasant wench, but transfigured by the Knight's imaginings) appears in her true nature in a half graceful, half awkward dance-motiv. The Don is enraged at finding her so, but her character does not change during the variation.

Variation VII.—Don Quixote's ride through the air. The Knight travels to the end of the world, riding on a wooden horse, air-borne, to do battle with huge giants. There is no new thematic material. The theme appears in floating guise; there is much realism, including the use of a wind-machine.

Variation VIII. The boat-ride, attack on the mill, and unexpected bath in the river. Again no new matter, but transformation of the Quixote theme into fluid sixteenth-note pattern, giving the whole the rhythmic motion of a barcarolle. After warlike gestures, inversions of the Quixote and Sancho-Panza motives indicate that the boat has capsized, throwing out the occupants. For a while there is only the dark, flowing river-music, without sign of the two characters. Soon they crawl out of the water to shore. Another bit of realism consists in the 75

MUSIC

Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

Dec

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert making what has become his annual appearance. Dr Koussevitzky for several seasons past has entrusted a pair of concerts to Mr Burgin at about this time. The audience greeted Mr Burgin cordially. Of his popularity with the subscribers there is no doubt.

Mr Burgin's program included three first performances in Boston, of music by Vogel, Toch, and Berezowsky, and the Chausson symphony, unheard here since 1923. Mr Berezowsky was the soloist in his own violin concerto. With the exception of Mahler's Ninth Symphony these novelties were the only significant music new to Boston to be played thus far this season. Dr Koussevitzky's new pieces thus far have been singularly tepid and ineffectiv Mr Burgin's proved stimulating, though it must be said that three modern novelties on a single program tax the listener's powers of absorption.

Wladimir Vogel, whose two Etudes entitled "Ritmica funebra" and "Ritmica scherzosa," began the concert, is a Russian by birth, but his father was German and he has studied in Berlin. These two studies are not merely interesting experiments in the use of unusual rhythmic and instrumental effects. They are written in an idiom perhaps too self consciously original, but the composer manages to express, poignantly, feelings not confined to him but common to the generation adolescent when the World War came.

Toch's "Little Theatre Suite" confirmed one's impression that he is a noteworthy modern German, a living refutation, as is Hindemith, of the notion prevalent in Paris and London that there has been no German music since Richard Strauss began to repeat himself.

Berezowsky, another young Russian, now a member of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, has, in the violin concerto heard yesterday, written music less vital, less salient thematically, than the symphony he conducted here last season. He has, however, added to the very restricted orchestral repertory of the concert violinist a concerto worthy, like those of Prokofiev and Sibelius, of performance before audiences sated with Mendelssohn, Brahms and Beethoven. He played the solo part well, though without dazzling virtuosity.

Mr Burgin's conducting throughout the program was musicianly and authoritative. Save Dr Koussevitzky, there is nobody in Boston so well equipped to conduct the Boston Symphony should any emergency necessitate a substitute or assistant. Mr Burgin has in fact developed as a conductor to the point where he would be quite capable of directing a series of orchestral concerts by any orchestra not in a position to summon a world-famous master.

His reading of Chausson's symphony was an eloquent and compelling one. This music has been unjustly obscured by the fame of Cesar Franck. Chausson was not merely a pupil of Franck. He owes quite as much, in fact, to Wagner as to his famous master. And his utterance is authentically his own, no mere echo of other and greater geniuses. This symphony should be more often heard. Yesterday's audience was plainly impressed by it.

The music of Vogel and Toch heard yesterday might serve as an illustration of the style of the post-war era. Gone are the grandiose sonorities, the luscious harmonies, the long-drawn-out loose musical structure of the late 19th Century. In their place we have pregnant rhythms, out of which grow polyphonic patterns, with much incidental dissonance, brevity, pungency of utterance, lightness of touch and often, as in Toch's suite, of mood. The change is to some minds for the better, a reversion to the mood and manner of the 18th Century, though by no means to the idiom of Haydn.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will conduct d'Indy's "Istar," Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," with Mary Garden and Marie Murray as soloists.

A Full Page of "Moon Colors in The Herald

[illegible] ultra-modern style of the "Ritimica funebra," a lugubrious and formless series of discordant, harsh and ugly sounds, may be questioned as of any real value. The "Ritimica Scherzosa" which followed at least emerged as slightly more tuneful but hardly of more importance. Vogel was followed by the Toch Little Theatre suite, decidedly more musically worthwhile, but of which only the nocturne and finale held anything appealing.

Mr. Berezowsky displayed a splendid musicianship, apparent for the most part in the second movement of his concerto. There is a revelation of deep and fine understanding, a sincerity and originality, and a tremendous vigor.

The last half of the program held the Chausson Symphony, one of the far too few existing monuments to the fame of the French composer. It is an arresting example of his distinguished work.

The presence of the Barrymores in the audience added to the distinction of the Friday afternoon occasion.

The program will be repeated this

BURGIN AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Modernists' Music and Chausson's Work Played

Post Dec 5

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The uncompromising modernists, hitherto absent from the symphony concerts of this season, returned there yesterday afternoon under the aegis, not of Dr. Koussevitzky, their so ardent champion in past years, but of Mr. Burgin, who yearly, at this time, relinquishes his post as leader of the first violins to guide the orchestra through a pair of concerts.

VOGEL SKILLED COMPOSER

These modern pieces were three in number: a pair of orchestral studies, titled "Ritmica funebra" and "Ritmica scherzosa," by the half-German, half-Russian Vogel, a new name in Boston; the Little Theatre Suite by the brilliant Toch; and a Violin Concerto by Nicolai Berezowsky, formerly of Leningrad, now of New York, in which the composer was soloist. For contrast and as balm for harassed ears Mr. Burgin devoted the second part of the concert to the Symphony of the Franckian pupil and disciple, Ernest Chausson, unheard in Symphony Hall since 1923.

The first of Vogel's Studies, with its major emphasis on rhythm, its liberal use of percussion instruments and its savage dissonance, reminded some of the piano and percussion accompaniment to which Miss Wigman had danced her Death Dance the evening before. The companion-piece, less drastic in character, further disclosed Vogel as a skilled and strongly individual composer.

Toch Arouses Interest

There are modernists who have something to say, as there are also those who merely ape and follow. To the first class belongs Ernest Toch, who has ideas and fancy as well as technical mastery. His Little Theatre Suite is engaging for all its atonality and should be heard again. Yesterday's performance, like that of Vogel's Studies, was brilliant and effective.

Mr. Berezewsky, on the other hand, seems in this Concerto, as in his Symphony of last season, to be of the followers rather than the leaders in the modernistic movement. His Concerto has a slow division of pleasant melancholy, but the rest is negative. At least he does not over-weight the solo instrument with ponderous orchestration. He played his music with technical finish and, in the slow movement, with charm of tone, and was politely received by the audience.

Redeemed by Slow Movement

For the refined and gentle and aristocratic Chausson the writing of a Symphony was something of a tour de force. His talent, essentially lyric and sensitive with a pervading vein of melancholy, hardly fitted him for sustained or heroic utterance. His Symphony often falters, and in it bluster and blatancy now and then take place of strength. But it is amply redeemed by the nobly mournful slow movement which might serve as memorial music for the departed great, by the impressive introduction to the first movement and by the arresting initial presentation of that movement's chief theme.

The end, in its way exciting, was superbly played yesterday and the warm applause that followed repeatedly returned Mr. Burgin to the stage until he bade his fellow-players bow their acknowledgements.

In the fortnight from Jan. 10 through Jan. 24, Dr. Koussevitzky will take his usual holiday from rehearsal and performance at the Symphony Concerts, though not from work for them. The guest-conductors during his absence will be Chalmers Clifton at the concerts in Cambridge and Boston on Jan. 14, 15, 16; Gustav Holst at the concerts in Boston on Jan. 22-23. Mr. Clifton was known to Bostonians in his Harvard days; has since gained place in New York as able conductor of a student orchestra. Mr. Holst is the distinguished English composer, who will also be guest, for some months, of the Division of Music at Harvard.

Trans

The Symphony written by Roussel for the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, was heard for the first time in Paris at a Lamoureux Concert on Sunday, Nov. 29. Albert Wolff was conductor.

Stravinsky Heard By Ernest Newman

The Critic Again Sidewipes The Composer Apropos His Newest Pieces

Dec. 8 — Trans.

At the Courtauld-Sargent concert, Stravinsky conducted his two latest works, the "Psalms-Symphony" for chorus and orchestra, and the Violin-Concerto. The general effect of each was to make us wonder once more what has become latterly of the man of genius who producd some of the earlier works of the same composer. The only conclusion one can come to is that the actual fund of music in him at the first was not a very large one; that to call forth the best of it he needed a certain kind of external stimulus and support of a pictorial order; and that when he now tries to write music without this kind of stimulus and support he becomes merely commonplace. His problem is quite a different one from that of Strauss. We cannot quite say of the later Stravinsky, as we can of the later Strauss, that he is a sort of inverted John Brown, whose soul lies a-mouldering in the grave, but his body goes marching on. A certain amount of degeneraiton there has undoubtedly been in Stravinsky also. But with Strauss it has been a case of sheer general exhaustion, perhaps due primarily to physical causes, of what was a mind of exceptional fullness at first; while in the case of Stravinsky it has been a matter of failure due to a persistent attempt to assert himself in a kind of music for which he has the minimum of natural aptitude.

Take the Violin-Concerto. In a work of this kind, that affects to be "pure" music, the composer has necessarily to proceed more or less along established lines. There is, first of all, the question of design. Characteristically enough Stravinsky tries to persuade us that in this respect, as in all others, he is wholly uniquely original. Characteristically enough, the less intelligent of his partisans aid and abet him therein. The reader may remember a recent reference in this column to a grotesque article, by one of Stravinsky's incense-burners, in which the composer gave his own priceless views on musical structure: "for a Mozart, the invention of the themes represented . . . the maximum effort. All the rest was made up in great part of a certain formalism, or, at least, technical skill had the upper hand over creative fantasy." Turning, however, to "my own music," he modestly informed us that "every bar is the result of an enormous condensation of thought, so that sometimes in a whole day's work I just manage to write one or two."

This interview was actually reprinted, in all its exquisite fatuity, in the program notes of Monday's concert! One can only surmise that Stravinsky and his camp followers must have a very rudimentary notion both of musical structure and of mental concentration and condensation; for in comparison with even a Mozart's first movement, to say nothing of a Beethoven's or an Elgar's first movement, the construction of that of the Violin-Concerto is quite infantile. It stands in about the same relation to a piece of real construction and real concentration as a child's sand castle does to St. Paul's.

Stravinsky has never shown the slightest faculty for construction. He is essentially a short-winded miniaturist, who could never think consecutively with any success for more than a few bars at a time, though when he had the right pictorial subject to work upon he could achieve miracles of sharp characterization in a series of thumb-nail sketches. I repeat that so far as structure is concerned this Violin-Concerto of his is merely elementary. That, perhaps, would not be fatal to it if the thinking, within the scope of these elementary designs, were musically first-rate. But it is not.

The truth seems to be that Stravinsky is not by nature a composer of "absolute" music, and that when he attempts it he falls between two stools. In his greater works, melody, harmony and rhythm are all of a piece and constitute a unified whole. That is because he is painting with his eye on the object, and the object is generally one with a touch of strangeness about it that justifies complete and consistent strangeness in the means employed to delineate it. But when he comes to write purely self-subsistent music he is pulled in one direction by his real genius for strange chord-structures and strange colors, and in another direction by his merely mediocre talent for melody of the symphonic kind.

The first movement of the concerto is a complete proof of this. Melodically it is just a compendium of pleasant commonplaces that have already done duty a thousand times in violin literature. Coloristically it is genuine Stravinsky, full of arresting piquancies. But the two media do not coalesce; and the final result of it all is a feeling that the composer is trying to work in an element that is not naturally his. One gets more of the real Stravinsky in the second of the two Arias, with its free melodic arabesques over simple harmonic chord-formations. The work as a whole, though finally disappointing, throws, however, an interesting light on what is vital and what is feeble in this curious and intriguing mind.

The same remarks apply more or less to the "Psalms-Symphony." The opening page, for instance, that would perhaps justify itself in connection with some simple ballet figures, is merely the extremity of Muscovite childishness as a prelude to Psalm XXXIX. Some of the vocal writing is pitiably commonplace in invention, and the double fugue has little interest beyond the academic. But every now and then, when Stravinsky reverts to type, he becomes extremely impressive—in the final pages, for example, where he repeats his old-style short Russian fragments of melody and harmony again and again, and, by dint in part of the fascinating strangeness of his color, in part of the sheer persistence of the repetitions, achieves an undeniable dignity that is almost grandeur. But the feeling with which one comes away from it all is that in works such as those given us on Monday, Stravinsky is floundering about in an element not really his. The sooner he gets back to his native, narrow but pungent Russian mentality the better it will be for him and for us. [From the Sunday Times, London

---

Concert-Chronicle

Those Moderns Trans. Dec 9

THE new music, first heard at the Symphony Concert of Friday, fared better at the repetition of Saturday. Mr. Burgin, conducting, was in juster balance, with a lighter, more elastic hand upon both composers and players. The small orchestra, within which or against which Mr. Berezovsky set his solo-violin, eighteenth-century fashion, moved more flexibly, suggesting a pretty ingenuity on his part. But to an audience, schooled year in and year out to the violin-concertos of Brahms and Beethoven, with occasional excursions elsewhere, say into Sibelius, his unpretentious little piece was bound to sound sadly slender. Mr. Toch was most the gainer by more plastic and sympathetic conducting. The dissonances in his "Theater-Suite" asserted their amusing quality. With humor he set forth the "Bashful Wooing" or pretended for an instant to be jazzing his dance. Sundry modernists take themselves and their theory and practice in music-making over-seriously, especially if they happen to be young Americans. The elder and Continental Toch does not.

Already superior ears and minds were demurring to Mr. Vogel's two Studies in orchestral sonorities and rhythm, though the impression upon most hearers was unabated. The Funeral Music, it was said, harked back to the first movement of Mahler's Fifth Symphony. In these latter days only a composer of genius—and Mr. Vogel is hardly that—could write a processional dirge without recalling such a masterpiece. It is to be observed, however, that absorbed in his color, rhythm, sonority, and the emotion thereby engendered, Mr. Vogel sounds no personal note, like the agonized cry with which Mahler pierces his mourning as though the gates of death and damnation had opened before his imagination. It was objected also that Mr. Vogel's melodic inventions were of small significance. Quite so—because he sought by other means to gain his creative ends. As well object that a tennis-ball might be better made, while Mr. Doeg and Mr. Cochet are performing remarkably with it—by their strokes.

Incident and Prospects

This department regrets apologetically that by one of those confusions of mind from which none of us escapes, it assigned the choral parts in Mozart's Requiem—at the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 18 and 19—to a Harvard-Radcliffe choir. As last winter, Mr. Woodworth's Bach Cantata Club will sing them.

The student orchestra of the Conserva-

Side by Side Variations by Two Masters

For the Symphony Concerts Strauss's "Don Quixote" And d'Indy's "Istar"

Dec 10 — Trans

FOR two months the writer whose initials appear at the end of these Thursday articles has been intrigued to discover how often he can find something of novelty in the weekly Symphony Concerts, if only the novelty of long overlooked pieces now revived. The list in which this is possible grows longer and longer. Without recounting past examples, consider the present week. Strauss's "Don Quixote" has not been heard at Symphony Hall since Mr. Monteux played it in the spring of 1922, exactly ten seasons ago; d'Indy's Symphonic Variations to the fable of Istar (now included to recall his recent death) have lain on the shelf since 1920 while Mary Garden, in singing the soprano part in Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" will be strange apparition at these concerts. Once more novelty on every hand. And those who look for schemes of this, that, and the other in program-making, will find here two exceedingly diverse examples of the variation form.

In none of his works has Strauss gone farther in the matter of orchestral realism than in "Don Quixote: Introduction, Theme with Variations and Finale: Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Opus 35." Nowhere, even in "Heldenleben" or "Till Eulenspiegel" has he been more expert in adapting a musical form to a large, comprehensive program. (Whether form or program came first matters not to the listener, while the theorist is forced to note that the two are so perfectly fused that it is possible to argue almost equally well on either side of the question.) As expertly he joins the tragic to the comic, mingles the pathetic and the scurrilous, sets heroic dream pictures over against pitiful reality.

"Don Quixote" is by no means a "theme with variations" in the ordinary sense. In the first place there are two themes: the theme of the Knight and the theme of his faithful squire, Sancho Panza; even the theme of the beloved Dulcinea occurs frequently enough to be considered almost a third theme for variation. In the second place, the themes themselves do not change materially in the different variations. Indeed, each has already undergone rather exhaustive development in the long introduction, which has been aptly called a "soul-study" of the title-character, Don Quixote. The variations are rather variations of environment for the themes, together with the resultant reactions of the themes to their environment. The chosen adventures of Cervantes's famous hero are taken as points of departure in furnishing these changes of environment.

The introduction begins with a ph for woodwinds, typical of the knight hero under all conditions. At once the character-analysis (or shall we say synthesis, for we proceed from the particular to the general?) begins. A duet between second violins and violas suggests dreams of a dual nature, or of desire for a "lady of his heart." He is shown as a person of inner conflicts of doubts and hesitations, of indirections and circumlocutions. He is Don Quixote, the dreamer, the vain imaginer, the projector of impossible adventures and escapades. In his dreams of knightly deeds he thinks inevitably of the lady fair for whom true knight must always battle—and we hear for the first time the Dulcinea theme in the songful notes of the oboe. But the thought of battle brings yet another Don forward, the fighting man, to whom trumpets give militant voice. Then follows the first combination of themes, the dreamy Don with Dulcinea. There is much more of this development and combination and transformation of themes.

In this first part of the introduction we have already had rich and abundant variation of the motives originally announced. And all before the full-fledged theme is reached. Building to a considerable cadence with the motif which presents the Knight as a person of inner conflicts, Strauss prepares for that theme. In complete form, evolved from many of the motives already exposed, a solo 'cello now plays it. Above it on the page is the first of the two programmatic indications—two only—in the score: "Don Quixote, the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance" At once comes the companion theme, labelled simply "Sancho Panza" At the beginning it comes from bass clarinet and tenor tuba. A little later it passes to solo viola, where it is most frequnetly heard in what follows. It is whimsical, half stupid, half comic in character.

Variation I. This is the adventure in which Don Quixote charges into the windmills, taking them for wicked, giant enemies. Knight and man are walking side by side—knightly theme in 'cello solo, servant's alternating between bass clarinet and viola solo. The vision of Dulcinea looms in the hero's mind as he is about to give battle. For a dozen measures there is realistic imitation of the turning of the huge sails and the creaking of their axles. Into it all the hero charges, only to be hurled to the ground—quick, descending harp arpeggio ending with cymbal crash. In fragments the 'cello theme tries to rise, and soon we are ready for Variation II.—The assault upon the flock of sheep. The hero theme appears martially. Soon by various orchestral devices one hears the bleating of sheep with a degree of realism probably entirely unparalleled in music. There is equal disaster for our sad knight. And in Variation III.—Sancho Panza fully expresses himself about "such goings on." The Knight reassures him; paints for him a picture of a fairy kingdom which together they shall attain. In reality this is broad continuation of the broad development of themes and motives begun in the introduction and interrupted by the two previous variations or episodes. Of course Dulcinea has her proper part in the promised fairy kingdom—a charming music.

Variation IV.—The adventure with the procession. The hero meets a procession of pilgrims with a picture of the Madonna. Their song is heard broadly, in chorale-like half-note brass chords. Again ignominious defeat, descent to the ground. Sancho bewails his master's supposed death. But Quixote rises painfully.

Variation V.—Don Quixote's vigil in the summer night. Here is further continuation of the development of fundamental themes. It is the nocturne of the tone-poem. The mysteries of the summer night mingle with a rising passion for the beloved in whose services the Knight believes himself.

Variation VI.—Appropriately this variation is answer to Don Quixote's longing. It is Dulcinea. The lady of his dreams really a peasant wench, but transfigured by the Knight's imaginings) appears in her true nature in a half graceful, half awkward dance-motiv. The Don is enraged at finding her so, but her character does not change during the variation.

Variation VII.—Don Quixote's ride through the air. The Knight travels to the end of the world, riding on a wooden horse, air-borne, to do battle with huge giants. There is no new thematic material. The theme appears in floating guise; there is much realism, including the use of a wind-machine.

Variation VIII. The boat-ride, attack on the mill, and unexpected bath in the river. Again no new matter, but transformation of the Quixote theme into fluid sixteenth-note pattern, giving the whole the rhythmic motion of a barcarolle. After warlike gestures, inversions of the Quixote and Sancho-Panza motives indicate that the boat has capsized, throwing out the occupants. For a while there is only the dark, flowing river-music, without sign of the two characters. Soon they crawl out of the water to shore. Another bit of realism consists in the picturing of the drops of water that fall from them to the ground.

Variation IX. Attack on the Mendicant Friars. The hero's theme appears stormily. Two bassoons give voice to the inane chanting of two of the monks. The Knight quickly puts them to flight, thinking them to be the jailers of his unattainable beloved.

Variation X. The duel and the return home. Don Quixote and his adventures have become a national pest. In disguise, a friend of his youth, desiring to do him a kindness, challenges him to a duel, making the condition that, if he loses, he must renounce crusading. A new, actively rhythmed music represents this challenger. Of course he is successful. There is extensive summary of the Don Quixote motives, as rich and full as in any of the variations. So to the Finale, Wherein Strauss sees in imagination the deathbed of the Knight; meditates upon his passing; remembers his life; recalls his spirit. A reminiscent music with the recurring motives wrought into a new texture of grave, compassionate beauty.

D'Indy's "Istar" variations offer another advanced treatment of the variation form. As in Strauss's introduction, they proceed from the particular to the general. But unlike any other set of variations, the melodic theme and the harmony never appear together. Again, as in Strauss, the program is responsible for this curiosity of formal construction. By word of the composer the program is drawn from the sixth canto of the Assyrian epic of "Izdubar." "In order to deliver her lover from Hades where he lies in captivity, the goddess Istar descending to the underworld, is obliged to leave one of her garments at each of the seven gates into this lower kingdom. When she reaches the seventh gate she is clad only in glorious nudity." Let d'Indy himself explain the adaptation of his musical scheme to this argument: "In these seven variations the composer has proceeded from the complex to the simple, causing the melody (the chief theme) to be born little by little, as if emerging from the special harmony presented in the first variation. Thus the theme denudes itself successively of all the ornaments which veil it, and appears in simple aspect only at the conclusion, in a unison of the whole orchestra."

The musical matter is threefold. First there is the theme itself, which in the beginning appears only as harmony, but in the succeeding variations becomes more and more melodic—Istar emerging from her garments—until at the last it is only melody without harmony. Then there is the march theme, used between certain of the variations, to indicate Istar's progress from one gate to another. Lastly there is a short, three-note motif, labelled by d'Indy the "motif d'appel" or summons-motif, which is really nothing more than the first three notes of the principal theme. A. H. M.

Young Mr. Markevich

At Mr. Slonimsky's chamber concert in New York last Tuesday, the program included a Serenade for Violin, Clarinet and Bassoon, probably the first piece by that prodigy of Paris to be played on this side of the Atlantic. Said Mr. Slonimsky's program-note: "Igor Markevich was born on July 27, 1912, in Kiev. His family left Russia early and Markevich was brought up in Switzerland and Paris. Diaghilev discovered his talent and commissioned a ballet, which was never written—for Diaghilev soon afterward died in Venice, and his company disintegrated. Markevich studied with Nadia Boulanger in Paris, but was shortly released from her cares with the words: 'You have a natural feeling for harmony—as to the counterpoint, there is nothing I can teach you.'

"Markevich was born into the neoclassical period of modern music; his style reflects the spirit of the age. At the first performance of his Concerto Grosso in Paris in 1930, Darius Milhaud exclaimed that not since the first performance of Stravinsky's 'Sacre' had he been so deeply moved (testimony of Alejo Carpentier in Social, published in Havana). Markevich has also written a Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, a Partita for Piano and Chamber Orchestra, a Cantata for Choruses and Orchestra. The Serenade is unadorned music in fugal style. Its three-part form is clearly outlined: a vivacious movement enfolded between the initial Andante and a resumption of it at the end."

Trans. Dec. 11

Mary Garden Back as Symphony Star

Rec'd Dec. 12

Mary Garden is soloist at this week's Symphony concerts in Debussy's "Blessed Damozel,' musical setting of the Rosetti poem, which is being revived along with Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" and a D'Indy memorial number, "Istar." Miss Garden is to spend this season on the concert stage. Later she will go to Paris to appear again in opera.

Marie Murray, contralto, and the Radcliffe Choral Society also take part in the Debussy number. Jean Bedetti and Jean Lefrance, members of the orchestra, play solo parts in the Strauss fantasy, which deals in a realistic manner with the adventures of Quixote.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the soloists shared the applause of a capacity audience at the matinee concert.

The Symphonic Session Runs Full and High

Dec 12 — Trans.

Memorial Music for d'Indy, "Don Quixote," Debussy, And Miss Garden

At the end of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, few departed without sense of pleasure received. For some, it was the presence of Miss Garden as assisting singer and personage on view in the performance of Debussy's setting of Rossetti's poem, "The Blessed Damozel." For others, it was the predominance of voices in that piece—in addition to Miss Garden's, those of a women's choir from Mr. Woodworth's Radcliffe Choral Society and of Miss Marie Murray singing the contralto measures. Yet others found their pleasure in the quality of a music both rarefied and precise—a singular and isolated beauty wrought in Debussy's younger years. Some again were touched by the homage to d'Indy, lately dead in Paris, now recalled, by the "Istar" variations, in music of his prime. To many, finally, the crown of the concert was Strauss's "Don Quixote," returned to the active repertory after long interval, completing the cycle—save only the early and over-neglected "Macbeth"—of Strauss's tone-poems from Dr. Koussevitzky. Whatever the music, the playing of the orchestra was that of a finely tempered and superlatively sensitive instrument. Whatever the piece, the conductor summoned one and another of his distinctive and distinguished qualities. Even in these days of zenith, a Symphony Concert has rarely been more engrossing or impressive.

Dr Koussevitzky treats "Don Quixote" as he has treated all of Strauss's later tone-poems, in particular the "Sinfonia Domestica." Throughout he subordinates the quasi-realistic, the drastic passages so-called, over which at the turn into the century there was superfluous pother. No one tittered yesterday at the bleating of the tonal sheep. Many, indeed, scarcely heard it. The wind-machine, if it was used at all, did not audibly upturn the air. Only the quickest ears and the liveliest fancies caught the details of the journey in the enchanted bark, of the various assaults upon windmills, pilgrims, magicians. The graphic quality of these passages, the astute and resourceful manipulation that brings them into being, are more appreciable from the score on the study-table than from performance in the concert-hall. They attest a prowess in Strauss that now goes for granted. Thirty-odd years afterward—"Don Quixote" dates from 1897-8—they have become his outmoded part. They are the prose interludes in the tone-poem. In them he writes an objective, calculated, earth-bound music.

The subjective pages are the composer's—and the conductor's—major concern: the wealth of imagination and resource with which they are wrought; the fantasy poetry, exaltation, pathos, that they diffuse; the fine-textured and tinctured beauty, the measured power, the transporting illusion that they impose. Strauss would write a fantastical music—of the possessions laying hold upon Don Quixote's mind, finally overturning it. His choice of a form was divination: a persisting theme to represent the mind and the spirit of the knight; a succession of variations for the delusions; an introduction that gradually defines this mental and spiritual state; a finale that is release from it into the peace of death. Assiduously and lucidly Dr. Koussevitzky preserved the relation between introduction and finale, theme and variations. He even brought off well the difficult transitions between the objective to the subjective mood, not always of the all-achieving Strauss.

The invention of Don Quixote's theme is equally impressive. Like Don Juan's or the Hero's, it characters on the instant and in the unfolding. To many an imagination, as Strauss develops and searches it, it sounds also of "old, forgotten, far-off things." It strikes as well the knightly, chivalric note, in particular when it sounded yesterday in Mr. Bedetti's violoncello tone, at once courtly, lean and dry. The piping, insinuating tone that Mr. Lefranc drew from Sancho Panza's viola was hardly less illuding—a fat man's voice. Both virtuosi charactered with Strauss in the dialogued variation of the knight expansive for honor and glory, while the squire cuddles into the quiet life. The juxtaposed realism and fantasy throughout the tone-poem are the counterpart of Cervantes's tale There are passages, partaking of both, that are miracles of atmosphere and illusion—when knight and squire, at the beginning of Variation I. fare forth into the great world that is to discover their virtue and their valor. Again when, finally overthrown, they ride wearily, bemusedly, homeward. At the end of Variation X. the listener feels Rosinante's head a-drooping, the knight loose and gaunt and haggard in the stirrups. Dr. Koussevitzky, and the orchestra with him, perceived and imparted this atmospheric quality; the more when it was poetically, rather than realistically, delineative.

There are passages, besides, that are veritable tours de force in tonal illusion of mental and spiritual states: when toward the end of the introduction wisps of romantic and chivalric motivs, already stated, stream in fluttering figures through Don Quixote's mind until it cracks; when, in the finale, they take flight like to chimeras dispelled. Then is his spirit cleansed, and he becomes as a little child with folded hands. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky read the introduction penetratingly; in the finale, as often of late, escaped the temptation to sentimentalize toward which Strauss himself inclines. As companion-piece to these two is the ironic variation in which Dulcinea emerges as common, awkward, bedizened village wench; but in his angered heart Don Quixote will not have his lady such.

There remain the pages informed with imagination, high or deep with beauty, potent, at will or need, with piteous illusion. More than one such has been already noted: the down-breaking of Don Quixote's mind for illusion; the high-hearted faring forth of knight and squire for spacious imagination; the pathos, inwrought with beauty, of the homeward journey, the dying hour. Join to them and set above them all the variation of the nocturnal vigil and consecration. Beside his arms Don Quixote prays and dreams until vision and aspiration possess him. Strauss is many-sided. Here for once, in a poetry of tones, he writes nobly of the soul, of the rapture that may still possess and exalt the sons of men. Call it Strauss purified, for the while, of every dross. . . .

As the composer wrote in these passages, so the conductor imparted. Dr. Koussevitzky enriched imagination with imagination; answered as another poet in tones; summoned and adjusted every communicating means; out of pace, accent and color—the orchestra assisting—evoked the picture and the passion, the illusion which is their sum. There was but one shortcoming. Orchestra and conductor plying their finest means have yet to gain also with "Don Quixote," their propulsive freedom. A repetition or two—perhaps this very evening—the full deed will be accomplished.

Apart from his eminence, a little faded in these latter days, d' Indy has place in the chronicles of the Symphony Orchestra. Twenty-five years ago, at Mr. Loeffler's suggestion to Major Higginson, he was its first guest-composer and conductor. Ten years ago, at Mr. Monteux's invitation, he returned to a pair of concerts; but old age was already upon him. One conductor after another—not least the German Muck—introduced or perpetuated his more characteristic music: the Symphony on a Mountain Air; the Symphony in B-flat, first heard from the composer himself; the "Istar" variations; the tone-poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain" in which the usually "cerebral" d' Indy speaks from the heart to the heart and hearers are holden. Dr. Koussevitzky might well revive it. Yet his choice of memorial piece was fortunate—the "Istar" variations.

The cultivated, intellectually curious, widely read d'Indy found suggestion for them in a legend of Phœnician gods. It told how the goddess, Istar, longing and questing for her dead lover, passed the successive gates of Hades, at each shorn of a veil—the price of entrance—until at last, naked and radiant, she stood before her lover, recalled him to life and light. The "cerebral" d'Indy devised the resulting music as a set of variations in which the harmony prefigures the theme more and more intensively until at last it emerges stark but luminous. The d'Indy who thought out both matter and means, wrought this design into a lucid, logical, cumulative tone-poem everywhere technically felicitous. The d'Indy who by dint of will could summon a measure of sensuous quality, infused it into Istar's progress and revelation. Dr. Koussevitzky deepened it, warming away the mental chill, by the quality of tone he drew from the orchestra, by his own responsive heats. So went d'Indy not only commemorated but also charactered: not only charactered but also transfigured.

Miss Garden was deliberately and distinctly on view. Latin fashion, she wore evening dress for what she regarded as ceremonial afternoon. Fabric, colors, cut and ornament, it recalled the fantasias in apparel with which Miss Farrar, in her less judicious days, illuminated the Symphony Concerts. Far off Mistress Mary's coming shone—the more for a glowing headpiece. She rose from her chair to sing. On the instant, as in her prime on the stage, her presence imposed itself upon the audience; for the nonce gave it thrill. Quickly her song declared itself as an act of will rather than an emanation of voice. The lower tones remained, uncertainly; the upper were thin, faded, devitalized. Once and again the familiar flame of divining and imparting imagination pierced through—in the shaping and the coloring of a phrase, the adjustment of pause or climax; most of all, in the delivery, with gentle wistfulness and ineffable resignation, of the Damozel's final line: "All this is when he comes."

Deed, however, seldom matched conception and intent. So it was that Miss Garden rather vanished before the singing of the Radcliffe choir, clear-voiced, soft-timbred, discerningly and fastidiously matched to the quality of Debussy's music and of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestral tone; before, also, the grave intensity, sweet yet sonorous, of Miss Murrays singing. Beyond any individual participant, even the highly sensitizing conductor, Debussy's music to Rossetti's poem spoke for itself. In the crucible of two kindled imaginations the two are fused as one. For the fusion memory searches parallel. From music and from verse emerges a beauty both rarefied and precise; in the same breath sensuous and mystical, troubled and calm; pure as the celestral lights yet touched with human emotion. Debussy wrote much else. He, with Rossetti by his side, did only this one miracle. . . . The music hushed: great gusts of applause blew about Miss Garden. "They like 'em old in Boston." muttered a listening New Yorker, then fled precipitately, stationward.

H. T. P.

Herald

URDAY, DECEMBER 12,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, which took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: D'Indy, "Istar," symphonic variations. Debussy: "La Damoiselle Elue" (Radcliffe Choral Society; Mary Garden, soprano, Marie Murray, contralto). Strauss, "Don Quixote" (Jean Bedetti, violoncello, Jean Lefranc, viola).

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted "Istar" and "Don Quixote" for the first time since his arrival in Boston. "Istar" was performed in memory of the composer, who died on the second of this month. The choice was appropriate, for the opening measures are in a funereal mood; the variations are among D'Indy's most significant works. The first performance was in 1897. "Istar," the symphony on a mountain air and "A Summer Day on the Mountain," were composed in the period of D'Indy's life, when he was concerned chiefly with making music, and not telling young composers how it should be made. Those three compositions with the symphony in B flat major will represent him honorably in the years to come. One should not underrate his work as a teacher; his high ideals. His technic did not leave him in his later works, but his brain was more in evidence than any source of emotion. Maurice Boucher, speaking of Debussy being drawn instinctively toward the French poets contemporaneous with him (the poem of Rossetti and the drama of Maeterlinck attracted him), said that D'Indy "by his temperament was borne toward doctrinal discussions." In "Istar," though his technical skill is brilliantly in evidence, there is pure music from the beginning to the end. It is true that the withholding of the theme in its full glory to the end, might be called a "stunt," as Ravel's "Bolero" is a stunt; but D'Indy's is the legitimate, inevitable crowning of the work; Ravel's was designed chiefly to create curiosity with a final surprise, and the Bolero once known does not bear repeated hearings, for the effect, once known, is afterward discounted if not wholly lost.

It was impossible, hearing "Istar," not to recall the gracious presence of Vincent d'Indy in Boston; the charm of his conversation, his interest in the works of our own composers, his benignant influence, the nobility of his character and the loftiness of his ideals.

Miss Garden appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time in Symphony hall. She had taken the soprano role in "The Blessed Damozel" when it was performed at a Boston Opera House concert 10 years ago this month. Miss Murray had been heard here before with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The features of the performance yesterday were the beautiful singing of the Radcliffe Choral Society, which had been finely trained by Mr. Woodworth, and the equally beautiful interpretation of the score by Dr. Koussevitzky and the players. Poets are not always fortunate in their composers, who too often are consumed with the desire to shine without regard to the prevailing mood or the expressive details of the poem. Dante Gabriel Rossetti found in Debussy a soul as sensitive to beauty as his own.

"Don Quixote," a virtuoso tone poem, shows Strauss at his best and at his worst. Composers have laid violent hands on the world famous novel of Cervantes. The Knight has figured both in serious and comic operas. It occurred to Strauss that Don Quixote might be portrayed by one instrument; Sancho Panza by another. Strauss undoubtedly rubbed his hands with glee at the thought of the musical representation of ba-a-a-ing sheep and the opportunity of introducing a wind machine with a man turning the crank for the variation, "The Ride Through the Air." (The sheep did not baa as unmistakably and effectively as audiences have heard in previous performances. No doubt the excellent players resented the task Strauss inflicted on them). But there are fine passages in the work. When Don Quixote speaks nobly of the ideal, Strauss gives him noble music, and Strauss has seldom written more charming music than for the long speech of Sancho Panza (how musically, how exquisitely Mr. Lefranc played it!). One might ask, however, if this music is in Sancho Panza's character as Cervantes describes it. And in the final music—the disillusionment of Don Quixote and his death—Strauss attains an emotional height without straining and exaggeration that is seldom found in his instrumental compositions that follow. Hearing these emotional sections, one almost forgets the imitative and pictorial passages of the work which, in spite of the admirable orchestral performance and the skilful and intelligent playing of Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Lefranc, seemed too long, with much music that is of little worth and interest.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week consists of Mozart's Requiem (the Bach Cantata Club) and these solo singers: Mmes. Ehrhart and Murray; Messrs. Lautner and McClosky.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 12

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the head of the program of yesterday's Symphony concert, between black lines, stood the words "In memory of Vincent d'Indy, March 27, 1851-Dec 2, 1931." D'Indy's "Istar" variations began the concert, but they are not funereal or elegiac in character. Nor could the succeeding numbers, Debussy's "Blessed Damozel" with Mary Garden as soprano soloist, and Strauss' "Don Quixote," be considered aptly commemorative of the dead musician. Is not the usual excerpt from Beethoven's "Eroica," the first section of the funeral march, the most fitting memorial in music for the dead whom an orchestra wishes to honor?

The "Istar" variations, despite the excessive preoccupation with musical form, which is a major defect in most of the composer's work, show d'Indy's creative talent at its best. Written in the 1890's, this tone poem has by no means lost its power of interesting an audience. It compares favorably with the lesser Debussy of "The Blessed Damozel," and with the wan- in Strauss of "Don Quixote." D'Indy's mastery of instrumentation is especially notable.

D'Indy, much of whose music has been heard and liked in Boston in former years, has been unjustly neglected of late. Dr Koussevitzky had not until yesterday conducted any work by d'Indy in Boston, possibly because their alliances in Paris were divergent and antagonistic. Some in yesterday's audience must have remembered the last appearance of d'Indy in Boston, as guest conductor Dec 9 and 10, 1921, exactly a decade ago.

In Debussy's early and uncharacteristic "Blessed Damozel," the chorus was from the Radcliffe Choral Society, and not, as two years ago, from the Cecilia Society. The chorus acquitted itself well in the exacting and not very rewarding measures allotted it by Debussy. Marie Murray sang the contralto solo part with unpretentious skill and taste, though it did not permit the full power and beauty of her unusually fine voice to be heard.

There was, as always, great interest by the audience in Miss Garden, in her dress, her demeanor, her personality. Though she was careful to share the applause with each and all the other performers, she held the center of the stage. She looked and acted every inch the prima donna, a prima donna now, it would seem, retired from the operatic stage. She sang her solo eloquently, stressing the meaning of every word, lending to the rather innocuous measures a dramatic vitality not inherent in the music. Her voice has never sounded better, nor has her great talent as an interpreter of both words and music ever been more plainly demonstrated to a Boston audience. She has always been, when she chose, a great artist in her own highly personal way. The more the pity that her devotion to art has so often in the past seemed alloyed by other considerations.

Strauss' "Don Quixote" completed Dr Koussevitzky's programmatic illustration of the "advanced" music of the 1890's. Before it was half over one unregenerate listener was sighing for a little Stravinsky, or a little Mozart. This tone poem is so very long, so very sonorous, so utterly empty of musical ideas. Of course, as Strauss himself is well aware, the attempt to link every measure with an incident in Cervantes' story is futile and tiresome. But the music itself lacks rhythmic vitality, thematic originality, and that saving brevity of utterance needed even more in symphonic music than in wit. Mr Lafranc played the viola solo admirably. Mr Bedetti was a competent cellist.

Next week Mozart's "Requiem" with chorus and soloists fills the entire program. P. R.

Mary Garden Brilliant Soloist for the Boston Symphony

Amer. Dec 12 By MOSES SMITH

Mary Garden makes her first appearances on a program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, singing the principal solo part in Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue" (after Rossetti's "Blessed Damozel").

In a concert that is enjoyable from beginning to end, her performance stands out. And her triumph is unquestionable whether judged from the point of view of popular reception or artistic merit. As to the first, she received countless recalls from the Friday matinee audience, and she acknowledged them in the typically "Gardenian" manner. As to the second, we have never heard her sing better or evince greater artistry than in this concert. Those skeptics who had raised eyebrows when her selection as soloist was announced may now do some unpleasant swallowing. Her performance yesterday had the artistic sincerity of her Melisande—and we know of no higher praise.

On a similar level were the presentation of the other two numbers of an uncommonly interesting program—Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" Variations, played in memory of the composer's recent death, and Strauss' Don Quixote, unheard here in nine years. In the latter work Jean Bedetti, 'cello soloist, and Jean Lefranc, violin soloist, contributed to the finely conceived orchestral version of Mr. Koussevitzky, and Richard Burgin played exquisitely the numerous solo passages for violin.

Though they contained no soloist and were placed on the program as an afterthought, the "Istar" Variations made a profound impression. This beautifully wrought score was given an eloquent interpretation by Mr. Koussevitzky, was they who ---- her.

H. H.

Boston Symphony

Dec 12 Monitor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky signalized his return to Symphony Hall, Boston, after an intermission of two weeks, by submitting, on Dec. 11, a list of exceptional interest for the eighth program of the season. In memory of Vincent d'Indy, the concert was opened with the "Istar" Variations. These were worthy of revival for their own sake; and the performance given them did all honor to their composer.

For the major part of the audience, the primary concern of the afternoon was the apparition of Miss Mary Garden, late of the Chicago Civic Opera Company, as a concert artist. She assumed the soprano solo part in Debussy's "La Damoiselle Élue." It is the sort of rôle which is well suited to Miss Garden's vocal art. Is she not the greatest of Mélisandes? But even on the concert platform, it is as an actress that Miss Garden excels. It is true that in appearance she was more a bird of paradise than the pale creature of Rossetti. But she succeeded, without the aid of gestures, in making us sympathize with this unreal heroine. And you may be sure she dominated the scene. Mrs. Marie Murray, the contralto of the occasion, who very tactfully tried to make herself as inconspicuous as possible, and who sang with intelligence and beauty of tone; the conductor, the orchestra, Mr. Woodworth's chorus from Radcliffe; even the Pre-Raphaelite of tones who painted this lovely pastel portrait—all these merged into the mistily luminous background.

For conclusion, Strauss's "Don Quixote," unheard in Boston since Mr. Monteux last presented it, nearly 10 years ago. Here were an interpretation and a performance to stir admiration and thrill imagination. Those pages of the score which bring sadness into the eyes of the composer's friends were handled so deftly that had you not been expecting them you might easily have overlooked them. The bleating of these sheep was most inoffensive; you were really rather sorry for the creatures. The wind machine you would hardly have noticed. The conductor in fact subordinated the less admirable manifestations of Strauss's genius in order to bring into higher—and who shall say that it is not juster?—relief such fine passages as the Vigil and the Final Scene. Obviously he had studied the work carefully and had visualized it as a whole. Superb playing was contributed by the solo voices—Messrs. Bedetti, cello, and Lefranc, viola. Nor should Mr. Gillett's beautiful oboe sketch of the Don's Ideal Woman be overlooked.

L. A. S.

AY, DECEMBER 12,

INSPIRED CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Post

"Don Quixote" Given Mary Garden, One Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A symphony concert in a hundred was that of yesterday afternoon, which brought, in d'Indy's "Istar" and Strauss' "Don Quixote," two modern masterpieces in the variation-form, hitherto unheard from Dr. Koussevitzky, and Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel," with the Radcliffe Choral Society, Marie Murray and Mary Garden assisting the orchestra; and all in transfiguring performance.

MARY GARDEN IN DEBUSSY

Under the circumstances Dr. Koussevitzky could have chosen no more fitting memorial to the late Vincent d'Indy than these superb "Istar" variations. The Second Symphony and the "Summer Day on the Mountain" are works of equal eloquence and mastery; but each would have been too long to replace the originally intended "Faust" Overture of Wagner. A baffled and uncomprehending generation once judged the music of d'Indy cerebral and austere. In "Istar," as we of yesterday's audience heard it, d'Indy's orchestra is by turn richly sombre, coruscatingly brilliant, meltingly sensuous and nobly passionate. Nor was there thought of any other composer. D'Indy fills his own niche in the musical Pantheon.

"The Blessed Damozel" was heard in Symphony Hall no longer ago than last season, but hardly in such performance as that of yesterday. The inviting of Miss Garden to sing the soprano solo was someone's inspiration. Always Miss Garden has shown a peculiar aptitude and sympathy for the music of Debussy. Even the timbre of her voice suits it as does that of no other singer. Once or twice yesterday that voice was incapable of asserting itself sufficiently against the orchestra; otherwise her singing of the Damozel's music was a miracle of insight and illumination, and conductor, orchestra and chorus alike seemed fired by her presence.

Receives an Ovation

Miss Garden is a great artist; she is also a personality. Her appearance yesterday in a gown of pale blue with curious feather head-dress was the signal for tumultuous applause, and at the end she was accorded what is usually described as an ovation in which she graciously made her various colleagues share.

Dr. Koussevitzky had long promised us "Don Quixote," and the performance, when at last it came, proved worth the waiting. Mr. Bedetti after much study of the part for the solo 'cello, which is the voice of Don Quixote, has penetrated deeply into it. As completely has Dr. Koussevitzky made the score his own. Strauss' music is, as nearly as such things can be, the tonal parallel of Cervantes' prose, with its humor often grotesque, its irony and its satire, as well as its pathos, its tender humanity and its voicing of a noble ideal. These things were realized yesterday by conductor and orchestra, by the 'cello of Mr. Bedetti and by the viola of Mr. LeFranc that was voice to Sancho Panza.

Music for Connoisseurs

With audiences in general "Don Quixote" can never be so popular as other tone-poems of Strauss. Rather it is music for connoisseurs, for those who can listen without impatience and who can catch each subtle stroke of characterization. Yet all and sundry must be entertained by the more broadly humorous passages or moved by the introduction, by the Variation in which the Knight proclaims his faiths and by the final episode of Don Quixote's death.

To realize Strauss' fitness to put "Don Quixote" into music it is only necessary to conjecture what any other composer might have done with it.

Boston Daily Globe

SATURDAY, DEC 12, 1931

The Globe Man's Daily Story

A geologist told Walter Trumbull this story. Once, on the Jersey shore of the Hudson, a sack was found containing the torso of a murdered man. With the head, arms and legs missing, there not only appeared to be no way of identifying the body, but no way even of telling where the murder had been committed, or in whose jurisdiction.

But the sack had been weighted with pieces of rock. A geologist happened to see these and immediately said they were Manhattan schist, found nowhere except on Manhattan Island.

This placed the murder in New York and, working from that, the police finally checked up on missing persons, made an identification, and caught the murderer.

ORPHEUS AMONG THE BRAHMINS

On a railroad train approaching one of the big cities of the Pacific Coast one picks up a newspaper to consult its list of entertainments. But where are they? No drama, no concerts, no lectures, no art exhibits, nothing but the usual moving pictures. But this city is populous and rich. There must be some mistake here. No. But let us consult a better paper. The one you have is their best. This? Yes. But surely these people do not subsist on intellectual fare so meager. Yes, they do, and if you doubt it look again at the paper. Every page of it betrays a town that goes culturally in rags.

We in Boston take our blessings too much for granted, never having felt the lack of them. Within a three-mile radius of the State House dome are three cultural institutions which rank with the best of their kind. One is a university, one is a magazine, and the third is a symphony orchestra. Does music seem more remote from average life than the other two? "After all, what has a symphony orchestra to do with me?" That question could be reworded, "What is it to me whether the public library is stocked with classics or with the wares of a railway newsstand?" For the presence of any fine cultural institution in a community raises the whole tone of it. Persons benefit who never go near the institution, who never even hear of it—just as resident scientists in a university town have the effect of improving its sanitation and hygiene.

In all our tons of stage literature there are only a few truly great plays, hardly enough, Gilbert Murray thinks, to keep a theatre going. Now imagine such a theatre in our midst, with a company of eminent actors performing four times a week the works of the Athenian dramatists, of Shakespeare and his fellow Elizabethans, of Moliere and Racine, of Goethe and Schiller, and of Ibsen, Shaw and Galsworthy. An elevation of manners, speech and thought would in time be noticed in our schools, our press, our pulpit, and our politics, due to the continual exhibition of life on its noblest plane.

Well, what you have imagined is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for this is precisely what it does, and some psychologists believe that it performs this office more powerfully than the stage, because music acts directly on the will. A great orchestra is a power station and the power it generates is closely akin to if not actually religion itself.

But if such an instrument is to be kept up to concert pitch someone must lead virtually a dedicated life, and that someone is the conductor of the orchestra. He is the leading actor who must play several parts a week. Not for him the life of dining out and social lionization. For him, on the contrary, a life little short of ascetic in the true sense of asceticism; that is, of an athlete in training. He must average four concerts a week, each lasting about one hour and three-quarters. This means four rehearsals beginning at 10 a m and running till 1 p m. When a chorus is performing with the orchestra there must be extra rehearsals. But his work has begun long before the orchestral score reaches the rehearsal stage—hours of solitary study over what shall be played and how he shall play it. In such a life as this there must be careful and abstemious eating, sleep at as early and regular hours as can be obtained, and some out-of-door exercise, for of course calisthenics enough an orchestral conductor gets on his podium. Then for a period of 30 weeks he must mount that podium aglow with poetic imagination, tingling with vitality, alert and sensitive in every nerve, bending the full strength of his intellect to the utterance of the most sublime and concentrated artistic speech in human history, and this in such a way as to please an audience containing scores if not hundreds of listeners whose tastes are scarcely less discriminating than his own.

This is no imaginary portrait. It is a faint sketch of the pace maintained by Dr Koussevitzky from October until April, but as pallid a suggestion of his actual performance as a railway time table's is of an express train. What sustains a man in a career so arduous, a career, too, that is often beclouded by criticisms which are more scholarly than imaginative? He is sustained by a force which few are qualified to comprehend until they have themselves experienced the discipline of long effort directed to a higher than personal aim. Sometimes a statesman, occasionally a man of action, not seldom a saint, quite often an artist—these personalities find themselves become mere instruments for the transmission of spiritual force. They almost cease to have personal lives. Must they go without what other men enjoy? They feel that they can well afford to, for once a man or a woman has known this possession by the spirit, personal affairs become as a dream and this ideal world of creative imagination seems, and is, the only reality. They feel themselves to be what in fact they are, vessels of a sacred fire, and if the fire consume the vessel it is well worth the price.

Such a figure walks the platform of Symphony Hall in the noble somnambulism of his art. Long dwelling in the heroic world of the tone-poets, long converse with the immortals, these have made him, too, an Olympian.

Uncle Dudley.

78

Burk

10 SUPER STARS IN HUB SYMPHONY

Outstanding in Organization of Great Players—Envy of Best Orchestras in Country

BY WILLIAM A. COBLENZ

The 10 stars of the Boston Symphony Orchestra constitute about as select and elite a group of musical Brahmins as the searcher for the most exquisite talents of our time is apt to discover in a round-the-world quest. They are, in fact, the pick of the planet.

But the particular choice of these omnipotent 10, out of the 110 men in the orchestra, was not determined upon by the writer of these lines. They are indirectly, and yet in the severest sense, the little musical gods appointed out of a whole world of aspirants to occupy their high places by their own complete dictator, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky. He named them to his own inner orchestral cabinet when, in their various sections, he thrust upon them the place of chiefs, or retained them in these places when he took command in 1924.

AT LEAST FIVE MORE

Behold, here they are: Richard Burgin, concert-master; Jean Lefranc, viola; Jean Bedetti, violoncello; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Victor Polatschek, clarinet; Abdon Laus, bassoon; Georg Boettcher, horn; Georges Mager, trumpet; Jesus Sanroma, pianist.

There are other sections of the orchestra, unnamed among these 10, and musicians like Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, for instance, whose personalities are outstanding. But arbitrarily limited to 10 men, heading the most important desks in the orchestra, and possessing, among the musical, the highest national and international reputation, the imperial musical purple falls upon this cardinal group.

There are at least five further names that stood on a practically even level with them, and who would have been included if the tyranny of the figure "10" did not make it impossible. Certainly Arthur Fiedler occupies an extraordinary position in the general organization,, for he is also a performer on the celesta and leader of the Cecilia Society. But in the orchestra proper he occupies only a secondary position in the strings.

String Tone Unmatched

There is Zighera of the harps, Ritter of the timpani, Raichman of the trombones, Speyer on the English horn—all superb men who represent the cream of the greatest musical organizations of all Europe, enticed to a country which in the last decade has stolen from the old world the glory of possessing the finest symphony orchestra of the times.

Critics will disagree as to which is the greatest orchestra in the world at the moment—the New York Philharmonic with Arturo Toscanini, the Philadelphia orchestra with Leopold Stokowski, or our own orchestra here in Boston; but on one point there is practically no disagreement whatever, and that is that the string tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—after all, the heart of the orchestra—is unmatched anywhere.

Native Talent Promising

And the big three of the Boston Symphony string section are the first names on our list. The orchestra has among the further desks, a little obscure right now, a constantly growing group of young and alive American native musicians from whom much is promised. Dr. Koussevitzky has a fondness for youth in his orchestra. Of the imported virtuosi, many have long since become American citizens or applied for the privilege. The extraordinary on our list reveals that six are French, one Austrian, one Russian, one Cuban and one German. Dr. Koussevitzky, as of course nearly everybody knows, is Russian, and one can see at a glance how much influence that had against pure merit.

There is a lot of interesting and fascinating nonsense about "musical temperament" and the genius and peculiarities of these artistic people as a class. The idea, for instance, that they are all linguists.

Most Speak Only One Language

For the most part most of them speak only one language well. Dr. Koussevitzky does speak French, German, Russian and a constantly developing English. Concertmaster Burgin is a native Russian but speaks Polish, German and English.

One time he toured France by what is known as the "classic" route, over the Pyrenes, in an automobile with Boaz Piller, who plays the contra-bassoon. He did it with a map alone, because he wasn't sufficiently certain of his French to worry himself with word-of-mouth directions by the road, and determined not to permit Piller to employ his talents as a linguist and interpreter. Piller testifies with solemn admiration his colleague and fellow-tourist behind the wheel didn't lose a mile that trip.

Look Like Business Men

Just as the orchestra, when it started under George (now Sir George) Henschel 50 years ago, might have been lost, so far as appearances went, in any crowd of the period, so these men today look, many of them, like business men, executives, members of the profession. Many like to carry canes. Pictures of the orchestra a half century ago show many bearded faces, old soldier mustaches. So do the pictures of baseball players, prize fighters and Presidents of that period.

Nor, excepting for a handful of bachelors in the orchestra, is there any really "Bohemian" life. By "Bohemian" life nothing is meant beyond the fact that there is an Epicurean group who know their sauces and their wines and where to get them.

All Hard Workers

Our 10 stars are without exception prodigious workers. Burgin, to come down to cases, was born in Warsaw, Russia, in 1892. At eight he was a student of Lotto, then of Joachim in Berlin, and from 1908 to 1912 under the great Leopold Auer in Petrograd. When 11 he was a soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society. From then forward he was recitalist in America and abroad.

Some of the most cherished musical adventures to warm the cockles of the heart of any musician have been his. He served as concertmaster under Richard Strauss. He played Sibelius' violin concerto in Gothenburg, Stockholm and Christiania under the baton of the composer himself. He was at one time leader of a string quartet bearing his name, and even today, of course, is leader of one of these chamber music groups. In this he follows the exalted Kneisel tradition.

Youngest Concert Master

Pierre Monteux named him concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1920—and he came to the Boston organization with an extraordinary experience for his years, the youngest—unless we're mistaken—ever to hold that position. He was 28. For his debut he picked one of the most difficult violin concertos in the literature of music, Brahms', and triumphed, of course.

On occasions like this he comes to his desk with his priceless Stradivarius, as on those red-letter concert days when Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" is on the programme. Burgin, we might add, is the best bridge player in the orchestra. When it isn't bridge, it's chess. As for exercise, well, there just isn't time for everything.

Knows 300 Works by Heart

Next on the roster is Jean Bedetti, whose birthplace is Lyons, France, 1883, and whose name is uttered by this humble scrivener with something akin to awe because he is one of the intellectual stuntsmen of the orchestra.

He knows some 300 works by heart, and could, if he were put to it, give ten recitals in succession without duplicating a single number. Notice when he performs the solo in Strauss' "Don Quixote" he never so much as glances at the music.

There isn't an important 'cello solo in the orchestral repertoire he hasn't committed to memory. To his retentiveness he combines a prodigious talent. Always, conscientiously, industriously, he is the ceaseless, restless student. When he was 11, he played the Davidoff concerto in a theatre in Lyons.

Musical Championship

There was a deal of criticism and controversy when he was awarded only second prize from the Paris Conservatory in 1901. Four years later, the Opera Comique made him first violoncellist, and he's been "first" ever since, under such conductors as Colonne, Pierne, Monteux. His 'cello has been heard in any number of French cities, in England, Belgium, Spain and Switzerland. For 18 months he served at the front with the French army in the World war. They say when Bedetti plays, you hear the language of the immortals.

Jean Lefranc, leader of the violas, completes the unmatched triumvirate of the strings. His record of achievement is just so much dry print in the carefully dusted archives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but to musicians it's the story of the winning of a kind of musical championship.

Won Success Early

Born in St. Quentin, France, in 1884, First prize from the Conservatoire, Paris, in 1907. Like the others, he won his recognition quite early and at once. Then success. The Opera Comique's first viola soloist. In 1911, viola soloist at Concerts Colonne. Chamber music triumphs all over France. Member of the Quartet Tourret. One of his great distinctions was to play the first performance in France of Bloch's suite for viola and orchestra; that was in 1924. The following year the Boston Symphony Orchestra snapped him up. He became one of Koussevitzky's stars.

Georges Laurent came to the orchestra with Conductor Henri Rabaud in 1918. Some of the most important solos of the season fell to his lot as first flutist. Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" is regarded as one of the stunt pieces of the orchestra, and has recently been recorded. Laurent's work will be found beautifully displayed in that piece.

Gillet's Name Significant

Gillet is a significant name in music. It was this Gillet's uncle, Georges, who was oboist and teacher of Longy, predecessor of Fernand Gillet, and probably the greatest oboist that ever lived. Fernand Gillet's father, Ernest Gillet, is a well-known 'cellist and composer of light salon music. His "Far from the Ball" is often played under the Fiedler baton at the Pops. It has, of course, a 'cello solo, and is one of Fiedler's favorite encore pieces. Fernand Gillet is another of the star musicians who came to the orchestra in 1925, under Dr. Koussevitzky.

But it is Victor Polatschek, of the Vienna Opera, who is Dr. Koussevitzky's most recent importation, the autumn of 1930. The Vienna Opera happens to have the ranking operatic orchestra of Europe, and Polatschek—quiet, retiring, studious—was one of its great luminaries when the conductor of the Boston Symphony decided to bring him to Boston and make him first clarinetist.

With French Military Band

Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Georges Mager, first trumpet, came to the United States with the French Military Band that toured here in 1918 and, their musical merit being recognized, were, so to put it, never allowed to leave the country except as visitors abroad. It was on this occasion that the orchestra also acquired Louis Speyer, English horn player. Laus and Mager are again Paris Conservatory first-prize winners. Laus played first bassoon with two French orchestras—the Concerts Touches and the Champs Elysees.

Mager is likewise a versatile musician, excellent tenor voice and plays viola besides. It was as tenor soloist that he toured with the French Military Band.

Popular Pianist

Georg Boettcher, French horn virtuoso, had a notable career as soloist with the Breslau Staat Theatre, the Dormund Symphony orchestra and with the Berlin Opera orchestra, before he joined the Boston Symphony during the Dr. Koussevitzky regime in 1928. For some 16 years he played under the foremost conductors of Central Europe and distinguished himself with such quartets as the Busch, Klingles and Hess, all of wide renown in the old world

With Jesus Sanroma, the young, boyish, handsome pianist, we come to the end of the list. Few are quite as popular as Sanroma, who has a child-like sincerity, ingenuousness and naivete and is absolutely without any manner of guile. Critics have waxed lyrical over some of his performances. He was born in 1903, in Porto Rico, of Catalonian forbears. It was the Porto Rican government sent him to the New England Conversatory of Music in 1917 because "his abilities," says one comment, "ran ahead of his Porto Rican teachers."

"The Boss" Greatest Star

The Mason and Hamlin prize was his when he graduated, and subsequently he studied with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska and toured the country as accompanist for Jacques Thibaud. It is an interesting reversal of the usual custom to find that it was after Sanroma became "official pianist" with the Boston Symphony he went abroad to complete his studies. Artur Schnabel taught him in Berlin; Alfred Cortot in Paris. He studied Ernest Toch's "Concerto" with the composer. Followed a succession of European recitals and his return to the United States.

Only this final note need be added that while the orchestra has these ten stars, who are the envy of the world, there is only one genius they universally acknowledge, and to him when he lifts his baton they deliver the best results of their instinctive talent, painstaking diligence and wide training, and he fashions the music that makes the Boston Symphony Orchestra acclaimed among musical connoisseurs everywhere. They don't call Dr. Koussevitzky "maestro" when the men chat among themselves. They call him, American fashion, simply "The Boss." And he is the greatest star of them all.

Advertisement.

Music

Monday Symphony

The second of the Monday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Symphony Hall last night, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The concert was opened with an engaging publication of the Corelli Suite which was heard earlier in the season in the Friday and Saturday series. This was followed by a virtuosic exhibition of the Brahms Fourth Symphony as center-piece of the program. Mr. Roland Hayes employed his exquisite tonal art in a concert aria, "Tali e cotani," which was penned by Mozart at the age of 10 as an occasional piece in honor of the Archbishop of Salzburg, and in a Berlioz aria, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt.'" The closing number was the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé," in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra are always at their most eloquent. The large audience was warm in its applause.

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series, which was given last night at Symphony hall, was as follows: Corelli, suite (Sarabande, Gigue, Badinerie); Brahms, symphony No. 4 in E minor, op. 98; Mozart, Tali e cotanti sono, concert aria for tenor with orchestra (Koechel No. 36); Berlioz, aria, "The Repose of the Holy Family" (from "The Flight into Egypt"); Ravel, orchestral excerpts from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe" (second suite). The soloist was Roland Hayes, tenor. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the concert.

It was a happy thought of Dr. Koussevitzky's to allow Brahms's E minor symphony to be preceded on his program by nothing more taxing to the attention than a suite by Corelli. This suite, an arrangement for orchestra of three movements from the great 17th century Italian violinist's sonatas, is of the purest well of music undefiled—music so spontaneous and effortless, of a gravity so gracious and of a gaiety so unforced and sparkling, as to seem to belong to the springtime of the world.

The distinguished Negro tenor Roland Hayes employed his delicately tasteful art upon two airs, accompanied with excellent discretion by the orchestra. Mozart's "Tali e cotanti" was written in 1756, when the composer was but 10 years old. It was written as a tribute to the Archbishop of Salzburg, Sigismund von Schrattenbach, to be sung on that potentate's "name's day," inserted in an opera performed in his honor. In it, to sprightly music, Mozart lauds the may virtues of the noble archbishop. The delightfully pastoral air "The Repose of the Holy Family," from "The Flight Into Egypt," shows Berlioz in unusual mood, achieving unaffected purity and simplicity of sty an appearance of utter sincerity, a cc transparency of orchestral texture th suit the text and the subject perfectly

The concert closed with the marvellously evocative orchestral scene-painting of Ravel's "Daphnis ar Chloe." The almost magically effecti score was performed with all the wonted skill by Dr. Koussevitzky a his orchestra. The audience was exc tionally appreciative. S. S

SECOND MONDAY CONCERT

Post Dec 15

Roland Hayes Soloist With Symphony Orchestra

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Within four days two distinguished singers have appeared with the Symphony Orchestra. At the concerts of last Friday and Saturday it was Mary Garden singing the soprano solo in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel," while last evening, at the second concert of the Monday series, Roland Hayes sang to the orchestra's accompaniments a little-known concert aria of Mozart, "Tali e Cotani Sono," and "The Repose of the Holy Family" from Berlioz's "The Flight Into Egypt," which forms the second part of his sacred trilogy, "The Childhood of Christ."

SANG BUT TWICE

It was difficult to tell which to praise the most last evening, the singing of Mr. Hayes or the accompaniment of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. In both the music, first of Mozart and then of Berlioz, found the just and satisfying voice. Mozart's music had the gallant air which so befits it and the right suggestion of a piece intended for display in which there was, nevertheless, no suggestion of the trite or commonplace. And in the air of Berlioz, Mr. Hayes, and the orchestra with him, was tenderly rapturous. That Berlioz of the frequent extravagances should have written this delicate, spiritualized music is one of the paradoxes of the tonal art, but one might search far before there could be found another singer, conductor and orchestra to divine and reveal so perfectly its peculiar flavor. These two pieces from Mr. Hayes were all too short, and evidently the audience as a whole so decided. Time and again Mr. Hayes was returned to the stage, but if the more optimistic among the listeners imagined they would have a further taste of his artistry they were doomed to disappointment; there are no encores at Symphony concerts.

For the rest last evening's concert contained music already heard from the orchestra this season; the charming suite from Corelli, Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." It was interesting to note that Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the Symphony last evening was in general much more vigorous and incisive, less mellow and reflective, than was that of a few weeks ago. Those who believe that music is independent of its interpreters might with profit have compared the two performances in which the same piece, with the same conductor and orchestra and within a brief period, made two such diverse impressions.

---

years.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 15

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky selected as orchestral music for the second Monday evening Symphony concert Corelli's delicate and delightful suite for strings, which he has played here before this season, Brahms' Fourth Symphony and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

Roland Hayes, renowned Negro tenor, was soloist in music so seldom performed—in recent years, at least—that it had almost the effect of novelty. He sang a Mozart concert aria, "Tali e Cotanti Sono," distinguished chiefly for its vitality and rhythmic emphasis, and the aria, "The Repose of the Holy Family," from Berlioz' "The Flight into Egypt."

It was impossible for one accustomed to the Symphony's strings not to marvel anew last evening at their depth and richness. In all the music, both their tonal beauty and impeccable style were unforgettable.

Although Brahms—possibly not altogether unjustly—has been accused of being pedantic and reserved in much of his music, it seems impossible that this can justly be said of his symphonies, the Fourth no less than any of the others.

There are places, few and brief, where the calculation of the musical architect is more in evidence than the inspiration of the musical poet, but otherwise the whole work seems, from start to finish, an electrifying crescendo of emotion. Throughout the whole an Olympian passion thunders with the savage force of a storm.

Yet there are interludes, notably in the beginning of the first movement, the whole of the second, and various places in the concluding two, where Brahms, in his mature and individual manner, is as lyrical as the most fastidious song writer.

Some have said that Brahms' instrumentation is thick and turgid. The orchestral fabric of this E minor Symphony is closely woven, solid, but it has a richness and a sheen that would seem to disprove the statement. It is quite different from such irritating instrumentation as that of Schumann, for example.

Dr Koussevitzky gave the Symphony an impassioned, personal reading—one which enhanced the music's inherent beauty, and which intensified its power.

Mr Hayes, due to apparent nervousness and lack of free play with his voice, was not at his best in the Mozart air. His singing of Belioz' aria, however, was of the best one has ever heard from him. In tonal beauty, in style, and in easily understood enunciation of the French text, he was impeccable. Not without reason was he recalled to the stage many times and applauded by audience and orchestra alike.

The Corelli suite was beautifully played, as was Ravel's orchestral masterpiece. The wide range of effects which the latter achieved in his "Daphnis et Chloe" still remains astonishing.

The next concert of this series will be given Jan 25. Yelli D'Aranyi, violinist, will be the soloist.

Mozart Requiem Beautifully Given Under Koussevitzky

Dec 19

By MOSES SMITH

Mozart's Requiem fills the whole program at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. It is unusual, if not unprecedented, to devote an entire orchestral program to a choral work, and this is the first performance of the Requiem at a regular Boston Symphony concert.

The circumstances surrounding the composition of the Requiem have aroused much discussion. Mozart left it incomplete at his death; the music is said to have disturbed his last days, so that he fancied he was writing the Requiem for his own funeral. Alas, even this was too good for poor Mozart, who was buried in a pauper's grave!

The performance at yesterday's matinee was in most respects beautiful. The chorus of the Bach Cantata Club, which sang this music at an unsatisfactory performance a year or two ago, did beautiful work yesterday, and reflected glory on its conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth. Indeed, it is difficult to reconcile the impression of great beauty, which the Requiem gave yesterday, with the uncertain, mixed feelings which it inspired when we first heard it. Even the parts written by Sussmayer, Mozart's pupil and musical executor, had nobility, and it was not easy to distinguish them from the actual Mozartean pages.

Of the four soloists, who were, respectively, Gertrude Ehrhart, soprano, Marie Murray, contralto, Joseph Lautner, tenor, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, Miss Ehrhart was far and away the best, in the beauty of her voice and singing and in the intelligence and artistry of her performance generally. Her voice had Mozartean flavor, too, while the others, apparently—and even Miss Ehrhart at the beginning—were too nervous to do themselves or the music justice.

Dec 17 '33

79

Trans

Two Symphony Concerts with Choral Music

Mozart's Requiem Mass with The Bach Cantata Club Assisting

On Friday and Saturday next Mozart's Requiem Mass will fill the whole of the Symphony Concert. It will be sung without intermission, since only by such departure from custom can the continuity of text and music be preserved. The forces concerned, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, comprise the relatively small orchestra for which Mozart wrote; a chorus of 130 voices from the Bach Cantata Club—the largest yet assembled at a regular Symphony Concert; a solo-quartet, for once all Bostonians, Mmes. Ehrhart and Murray, Messrs. Lautner and McClosky. Mr. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Bach Cantata Club, prepared the chorus, many of whom sang in the performance of the mass by the club at Emmanuel Church last January. Within memory there have also been performances by the Handel and Haydn Society. Only once before, nearly forty-four years ago, has the Symphony Orchestra organized a performance of the mass—on April 10, 1888, during Gericke's first conductorship. The occasion was a contribution to a fund for the erection of a statue of Mozart in Vienna.

The story of the composition of the Requiem, Mozart's last and uncompleted work, has been told many times. The following summary is based on a full account by William Pole, published in Dwight's Journal of Music for September, 1869. In July, 1791 a mysterious stranger came to Mozart in Vienna asking him to accept a commission for a requiem mass. The work was to be completed with all possible despatch, and the composer was never to seek to know who it was that employed him. It was later discovered that the emissary came from the wealthy Count von Wallsegg, a landed proprietor living on the road between Vienna and Trieste. The count's wife had died in February, 1791, and he conceived the idea of a requiem written to do honor to her memory. He himself was a musical amateur who liked to pose as the composer of various works actually written by an abler composer secretly hired. Such was the case in this instance. Mozart was to write a requiem for an unknown patron. The patron would have it copied and performed as his own. Subject to exceptions now to be noted, this plan was actually carried out.

Progress on the Requiem was interrupted to permit the rapid composition and performance of the opera, "La Clemenzia di Tito" at Prague, unexpectedly ordered for the coronation of Emperor Leopold. Mozart returned to Vienna in September, and for a time worked at the Requiem. But he was again interrupted to complete, his opera, "The Magic Flute" for the Theater an der Wien. Not until October was he free to resume the mass.

"The mystery in which the commission was enveloped appeared to take a strong hold upon his imagination. He sank into a deeply thoughtful state of mind; and, regardless of all advice, worked at the score with untiring earnestness and energy. The interest he took in it appeared to increase with every bar, and he wrote constantly, day and night. This exertion was too much for his feeble frame . . . and his weakness increased to such an extent that he would sometimes faint at his labor. . . . One fine autumn day as they [he and his wife] were sitting alone during their daily drive, he began to speak of his death, and declared that he was writing the Requiem for himself. . . . 'I feel it too strongly; I am not much longer for this world.' "

After an enforced rest Mozart returned to work. He continued to compose even after he had taken to the bed from which he never rose. On the day of his death, it is said, he worked at the score. When he died he had completed only the Requiem and Kyrie. In all essentials, however, he had put to paper the Dies Iræ, the Tuba Mirum, the Rex Tremendæ, the Recordare, the Confutatis, the Domine Jesu, the Hostias, and eight measures of the Lacrymosa. His widow hastened to have the mass completed by his pupil, Süssmayer. It was then delivered to Count Wallsegg, who had it performed as his own work. It is not known how large a portion of the Sanctus, the Benedictus and the Agnus Dei can be credited to Mozart, or whether he had any part whatever in them. Süssmayer was sufficiently acquainted with Mozart's methods and style to continue and finish his work.

The Requiem, or Mass for the Dead, follows, with some differences, the main outlines of a Solemn High Mass. The Kyrie with which the High Mass opens is preceded by the sentences "Rest eternal give them, Lord, and let perpetual light shine upon them. Unto Thee, O God, shall hymns be sung in Zion, and unto Thee shall vows go up in Jerusalem. Hear my prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come." This introit, together with the Kyrie forms Mozart's first number. The Gloria and Creed of the High Mass—obviously out of place in a service for the dead—are replaced in the Requiem by the mediæval Judgment Hymn, "Dies Iræ" Mozart in his Requiem divides the "Dies Iræ" as follows: Dies Iræ; Tuba Mirum; Rex Tremendæ Majestatis; Recordare; Conutatis, Lacrymosa. He includes the Domine Jesu and the Hostias from the offertory. The Sanctus, Benedictus and Agnus Dei follow as in the High Mass.

Commentators have maintained that Mozart's music, composed as it was, while he stood veritably face to face with death, expresses in an exceptionally real sense the feeling of a requiem. Prayers, hopes, penitence, aspiration, are not merely those of a composer trying to live himself into and through them. Rather, they proceed from a composer with a strong premonition of approaching death, with an overpowering sense that all these are his own personal pleadings, his own petitions to the Deity, his own communings for the present salvation of his own soul.

Perhaps it is for such a reason that Mozart's Requiem is free from the suggestions of theatricality which sometimes cling to the more dramatic settings of the Dies Iræ. Only once does he resort to realistic measures, and then, as will be noted later, how mildly. Says one of the commentators: "It is worthy of remark how Mozart pictured the diverse moods of terror, of fear, of hope, pleading, of painful lament without introducing orchestral effects, principally by rhythmic and harmonic means." Indeed the orchestration is notably low-toned and drab, as becomes the subject. In addition to voices, Mozart employs only strings and organ, two basset horns (tenor clarinets), two bassoons, trumpets, trombones and tympani. In other words, in addition to strings and the solemn brass, there are only the low wood-winds. The brass is very sparingly used—more sparingly on Mozart's pages than on Süssmayer's, and always with telling effect. Contrary to the practice of Bach and Beethoven, the individual numbers of Mozart's mass are almost always short and concise. The only exceptions are the measures which develop, fugally.

I. Requiem. This initial petition is sung by full chorus (Adagio, D minor, 4-4) in a pleading phrase first introduced by bassoon and basset horn in imitation. With the Kyrie, the tempo becomes Allegro and the form is that of a double fugue with one subject given to the words "Kyrie eleison," the other subject to "Christe eleison." The fugue is extensively developed.

II. Dies Iræ. This first portion of the hymn depicts the destruction of the world which is to precede the Last Judghent. A chorus of massive chords (Allegro assai, D minor, 4-4) is interrupted only by the bit of deliberate realism already noted. Basses, and later the whole chorus, sing "Quantus tremor est futurus" to a peculiar quavering figure. After which the sternness of the beginning is resumed.

III. Tuba Mirum. The trumpet sounds the call that wakes the dead, summoning them before the judgment throne. (Andante, B-flat major, 4-4). A trombone is heard intoning the solemn call. The solo-bass repeats it. In succession solo-tenor, solo-alto and solo-soprano, finally the whole quartet, expand on the judgment theme.

IV. Rex Tremendæ. The world is now in the presence of the great Judge. "King of majesty tremendous, By Thy saving grace defend us, Fount of Pity, safety send us!" The chorus (Grave, G minor, 4-4) sings. Most stately are the introductory orchestral figures, the chorus interrupting with single, detached chords on the word "Rex." The imitative figure, when it arrives carries out the full effect of the majesty of the scene.

V.—Recordare. This quartet (Andante, F. major, 3-4) is a plea to the Saviour for mercy and absolution from sin. Commentators have declared that in this movement Mozart's genius reached its highest flight. Mozart himself attached great importance to it; for he told his wife (according to Jahn) "that if he were to die before finishing the Requiem, it was of greatest moment that this movement should have been completed." One after another in imitation the voices enter with the expressive, pleading figure. In the introduction 'cellos announce an expressive figure which runs like a silver thread throughout the whole accompaniment. The number is of sufficient extent to carry thrice the expressive motiv of the beginning, somewhat after the manner of a rondo.

VI.—Confutatis. (Andante, A minor, 4-4). Jahn's full exposition deserves quotation: "The verse contrasts the torments of the damned with the hopes of believers, and could not therefore be suitably rendered with the same composure of tone. . . . In this movement, therefore, the men's voices are opposed to the women's and describe the torments in short, imitative phrases . . . made still more forcible by a frequent, pregnant rhythmical figure borne by stringed instruments in unison. The women's voices, supported only by a quiet violin passage, express a low and fervent appeal for redemption. . . . All the emotions and reflections represented so far have tended to turn the thoughts inwards, with such feelings of remorse and repentance as alone can lead to the trust in divine mercy. It is with the feeling of deep self-abasement that the supreme point of the hymn is approached. The voices unite soft and low in a succession of harmonies such as no mortal ear had ever heard" to the words "ora supplex et acclinis, cor contritum quasi cinis, gere curam mei finis."

VII.—Lacrymosa. The final division of the "Dies Iræ," a prayer ending "Grant us thine eternal rest." An exceedingly expressive chorus, very short, Larghetto, D minor, 12-8.

VIII.—Domine Jesu. (Andante, G minor, 4-4.) This chorus "prefers the petition that the soul of the departed may not go down into hell, but may be carried into light by the Archangel Michael." It begins with harmonization in sober chords, followed by no less than three fugatos, one for solo voices.

IX.—Hostias. (Larghetto, E-flat major, 3-4.) Continues the thought of the preceding division, bringing prayer and sacrifice and praise to the Lord. The music of the first part shows certain resemblances to the first part of the "Domine Jesu." The fugue on the words "As Thou didst promise of old unto Abraham and his seed" is literal repetition from that number.

X.—Sanctus. (Adagio, D major, 4-4.) The change to D major is noteworthy. It must also occur to the casual reader or hearer that the first chords of this chorus are identical (except for the major tonality) with the first chords of the "Dies Iræ." The "Osanna in excelsis" is strictly fugal.

XI.—Benedictus. Andante, B-flat major, 4-4.) Violins anticipate the gently expressive theme which is developed imitatively by the four solo-voices. The Chorus responds with the same "Osanna" as before.

XII.—Agnus Dei. (Larghetto, D minor, 3-4.) After a plain setting of the "Agnus Dei" (expressive enough, but in insight worlds removed from Mozart) with return to the minor key of the beginning, Süssmayer concludes with repetitions from the beginning of the Mass. The soprano solo, "Te decet," now becomes "Lux æterna"; the chorus "Exaudi" returns also as "Lux æterna"; "Requiem æterna" is repeated, words and music; and the double fugue, "Kyrie eleison, Christie eleison," end the work as "Cum sanctus in æternum, quia pius es." Such repetition was not unusual at the time. Jahn cites a number of composers who did the same thing. It has been said that Mozart had expressed a wish that his great fugue should end the last as well as the first number of his Requiem. In any case it was good judgment by Süssmayer to conclude it with music from Mozart rather than to attempt an ending of his own.

A. H. M.

Meditations From Mozart On Mortality

Dec 19

His Requiem Mass Through A Brief Symphonic Afternoon

TRANS. - DEC 19

PROBABLY the shortest Symphony Concert on record came to pass yesterday afternoon. If it began promptly, it lasted no more than one hour and ten minutes; whereas the usual duration is one and fifty. It traversed a single piece, the Requiem Mass of Mozart, heard for the first time at these concerts; fallen out of Bostonian ears until the Bach Cantata Club revived it last winter. At brief halt between the "Dies Iræ" and the "Tuba Mirum" a few tardy comers drifted in. Otherwise there was neither pause nor formal intermission—again departure from custom. Seated on the stage, finally, was the most numerous chorus ever assembled at a Symphony Concert in ordinary course—from the Bach Cantata Club, 130 strong, prepared for the occation, after the trial run last January, by Mr. Wallace Woodworth. A quartet of resident singers—Mmes. Ehrhart and Murray, Messrs. Lautner and McClosky—also assisted—again without precedent in Dr. Koussevitzky's time. So much for the record, or rather the record-breaking—unless it should be added that some missed the intermissional cigarettes and chatter; while others of elder years were slightly ruffled when they discovered that motor-cars ordered for the usual 4.40 could hardly be expected at an exceptional 3.45.

Mozart may be transparent as the day, clear as the sunshine, and that sort of traditional thing: but for appreciative hearing of the Requiem, the listener must steadily imagine himself into it. Nowadays in the concert-hall, Verdi's is the standard setting of the Roman Mass for the Dead. Whatever its intrinsic quality, it is massive, intensified, even flamboyant, beside Mozart's version. Latin instincts and predilections burn through the Italian's music; whereas Mozart's, though of his time, is individual expression of the images and emotions possessing him as day by day he wrote these last notes upon ruled staves. In Verdi's Requiem the theater is not many doors from the church. Manifestly the composer is addressing an audience. For his part, though he was making a commissioned music—once more the program-book told the tale of the gray-clad, secretive visitor—Mozart sat in solitary self-communion writing "from the heart to the heart" more than did the vasty Beethoven when he clapped that sounding phrase upon his "Missa Solemnis."

Experience of Verdi and, maybe, of Berlioz, who also set the Mass for the Dead; our whole background of nineteenth-century romantic and theatric music—up, say to 1910—persuade us toward a stupendous setting of the "Dies Iræ." We expect the composer to exhaust imagination and resource upon the crumpling of this earth and the bursting of mortal graves at the sound of the last trumpets; the opening of the heavens and the descent of the omnipotent and omniscient Judge; the unsealing of the Judgment Book; the pangs and the prayers of the risen host awaiting eternal destiny. The sweep of tonal spectacle, the power or the poignancy of tonal imagery must possess us; while orchestra and chorus, in the full modern sense of the words, are straining every communicating faculty, every transmitting nerve.

Once the first prayers for the dead are overpast, the Sequence of the last great day of wrath and affright, of petition and judgment, fills more than half the Mass for the Dead. Beyond are the mingled prayer and praise of the "Domine Jesu," the "Hostias," the "Sanctus," the "Agnus Dei." They shall be for the contrasts of mercy and soothing, of adoration and salvation. So into close upon light and peace-everlasting. The best of us, unless we are uncommonly devout-minded, expect sensuous impact from the Mass for the Dead in the concert-hall. Verdi and Berlioz—to say nothing of lesser composers—have prepared us. Only Brahms has shown us another way, assembling his own Protestant and personal text, putting by the Roman office. Here in Boston there has not been even Fauré—until last Sunday in excerpts by the Harvard Glee Club—to turn us back toward Mozart.

And there he was yesterday with his little orchestra after Berlioz's and Verdi's cohorts; his gray orchestra after their multi-colored ranks—no more than a handful of strings, darkling clarinets and bassoons, proclamatory trumpets, deepening trombones, reiterating or foreboding kettledrum, upswelling organ, each and all used sparingly. His chorus, a meager five or six score beside their doubled or tripled hundreds. On this scale there is no unrolling of the "Dies Iræ" as stupendous tonal spectacle for our excitement. Probably such purpose never occurred to Mozart. Or, if it did, became as nothing in his intentions. Of course there are impressive measures—when the trumpets and trombones intone, rather than proclaim, the call to resurrection; when upon figures and chords the Divine Judge descends. Poignant measures as well, when the petitions of mortal men, mount to the Judgment Seat ("Recordare, pie Jesu"); when they are but dust and ashes ("Cor contritum quasi cinis") before the Divine Mercy. None the less, whoever expects the manifold, multitudinous, magniloquent "Dies Iræ" of a Verdi or a Berlioz hears disappointed.

The music of Mozart's Requiem is of a different texture, quality, means and expression. Like other eighteenth-century music—Handel's better operas are similar example—it is charged with feeling; but the expression is lower scaled than was nineteenth-century habit, than is twentieth-century practice. Hearing this Mass for the Dead, our ears and imaginations must accustom themselves to a different, more measured scale of emotional and transmitting values—hard to gain in an hour's traffic with the concert-hall. Furthermore, the power or the poignancy, thus scaled, is often encased in the orthodox forms and procedures of Mozart's musical time—a method of expression at odds with our background of romantic expansiveness and plangent intensity. For further difficulty and remoteness, Mozart's setting of the Requiem Mass is, as we should say nowadays, persistently personal. He accepted commissions from Holy Church because they helped to earn his living and spread his note. He received its rites, when the custom of his time prescribed recourse to them, as at marriage. But he little frequented it; thought none too highly of it, as well he might after experiences with Prince-Bishops at Salzburg; preferred a life of work and play, independence and poverty, after his own fashion.

Now, as he believed, the hand of death was upon him. The strange commissioning of this Requiem Mass had been the warning. He loved life and this good world. He was afeared and anguished before the vision of death and the world to come. He contemplated the Judgment and shrank away, awed and trembling and muted, as from a personal fate. He heard the prayers that pierced to the Judge's throne, and they were his own petitions. He read in the Offertory, and from the "Domine Jesu" or the "Agnus Dei" took faint and foreboding hope of grace. The Mass must be written; in this agony he set to the work. Inevitably it became a subjective, an autobiographical music, of those last days "when the taste of death was in his mouth."

Imagining himself into this background, the auditor of 1931 can try only to hear and feel as best he may. No wonder many went away with expectation denied, and through no fault of performance. Granted moments of illumination, the listener descries and feels the pang of the occasional dissonances; the poignancy of the recurring petitions for the Divine Mercy, every one saddened; the restless shadowing of the gleams of hope; the foreboding pressing upon the measures of rest and peace; the mind, spirit, hand, overawed before Judgment Day; the heroical self-bracing, stiffening such passages as the end of the "Hostias" ("Quam olim Abrahæ"); the infinite relief of the fugue that sets the "Kyrie" and that another hand, when Mozart was dead, inserted diviningly to be end of the whole mass. Then the joy of work, waxing as he writes, melts away the fear and the anguish. To other Requiems their own particular quality. Mozart wrote his, unchurchly enough, as the mass of death and doom reiterated upon himself—and upon us men. . . . It is so seldom heard that there are no standards of performance. Agree, then, that Dr. Koussevitzky charactered it; that the well-grounded chorus answered freely to his will; that the timbre of the solo-voices accorded with the texture of the music. Otherwise this taste of death would not also have haunted listeners' mouths.

H. T. P.

Herald Dec 19

MUSIC

MOZART'S REQUIEM

By PHILIP HALE

Mozart's Requiem was performed at the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The chorus was the Bach Cantata Club which had been well drilled by Mr. Wodworth. The solo singers were Gertrude Ehrhart, Marie Murray, Joseph Lautner and David Blair McClosky.

It may have surprised some that a Requiem should be performed as a concert number in the week before Christmas, yet in this period of financial depression when many dividends are either dead or moribund, there was a certain fitness in the selection.

One might reasonably wish that the Requiem had been by another composer; not neceessarily Berlioz or Verdi, though it would be a joyful experience to hear either of these great requiems conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky; but, say Cherubini's Requiem in C minor.

For Mozart left his work unfinished, and what he had completed is not always worthy of him. He was of a too gentle nature to portray the "Dies Irae" in tones. He might better have anticipated the amiable Gabriel Faure, who omitted the "Dies Irae" in his Requiem, fearing it might disturb the sensibilities of the Parisian cocottes who were in the habit of mourning their dead at the Madelaine. Take for example, Mozart's treatment of the line "Tuba Mirum Spargens Sonum," the line treated so dramatically by Berlioz and Verdi with blasts of brass that shake the soul. It is true that "spargens" is not the word in Latin to denote a shattering, awe-compelling trump that wakes the dead, but it is doubtful if Mozart's treatment of the text came from any knowledge of the precise meaning of the word. He knew he was about to die; no doubt the thought of the Last Judgment frightened him and he wished to lessen in his own mind the terrifying splendor of that Great Day. So he gave to a tenor trombone an innocent prelude to the rather reassuring though commonplace declaration by a bass voice, and during this declaration allowed the trombone to practise an exercise, utterly devoid of any dramatic significance. Mozart did better for the Statue in "Don Giovanni" than for the day of wrath, that dreadful day.

There are a few lovely passages in this requiem, but in the pages of sustained loveliness, as the "Lacrymosa" and the "Hostias" Mozart wrote only eight measures of the former; Suessmayer completed it and wrote the whole of the "Sanctus," "Benedictus" and the greater part of the "Agnus Dei." Nor is it blasphemy to say that in this Requiem there is no page of such tender, prayerful, religious feeling as the "Pie Jesu" of Cherubini's work in C minor or many pages of celestial beauty in Verdi's. Nor can the many fugal pages of Mozart be justly described as dramatic or religious. In his time fugues were expected in music for the church, but those in this Requiem do not rise to the height of grandeur. And one might justly say that if it were not for Mozart's name, the mystery connected with the commission given to him by the man in gray, and Mozart's pathetic ending and lonely burial in a pauper's grave, this Requiem would not be included among his greater works.

The audience listened yesterday in the becoming reverential spirit. The singing of the chorus was excellent. The voices of the women in the sustained piano passages were of etherial beauty. Nor did the women falter in attack or power when they were called on for force. The men vied with them in clear performance of the running passages. Dr. Koussevitzky gave more than a sympathetic interpretation of the score. He gave dramatic emphasis and contrasts that were suggested by the text rather than by the music itself, and did more for Mozart's glory than was probably done in the years when the dead composer was remembered by those who had seen him in the flesh; than was done by conductors years afterwards, who stood too much in awe of Mozart's name, mistook obsequiousness for due respect, and regarded any display of imagination on their part as sacrilegious.

The solo parts call for operatic singers. When the Boston Symphony orchestra took part over 40 years ago in a special concert for Vienna's Mozart monument fund, the soloists were Lilli Lehmann and her husband Paul Kalisch, Louise Meisslinger and Emil Fischer.

There will be a performance of the Requiem tonight. The program next week will comprise Bach's B minor suite for flute (Mr. Laurent) and strings; Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp (Mr. Zighera) with accompaniment for strings, flute and clarinet; an orchestral suite by Geza Frid; and Schumann's Symphony No. 3. The concert will be on Thursday—not Friday—afternoon and Saturday evening.

AY, DECEMBER 19,

MOZART'S REQUIEM REHEARD

Symphony and Bach Cantata Club Give Work

Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To Dr. Koussevitzky we of Boston owe a renewed acquaintance with more than one renowned choral piece. Already he had restored to us Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," the "German Requiem" of Brahms and Bach's B minor Mass, while yesterday afternoon, with the Symphony Orchestra, the Bach Cantata Club and Mmes. Ehrhart and Murray and Messrs. Lautner and McClosky for his forces, he gave us Mozart's Requiem, unheard here with proper orchestral setting in many years.

HIS OWN REQUIEM

Few pieces have so picturesque a background as the work with which Mozart was occupied during the final weeks of his life. There is the well authenticated story of the mysterious stranger in gray who commissioned from the composer a Requiem Mass for which he agreed to pay handsomely; and which, incidentally, his noble patron, Count von Walsegg intended to and actually did palm off as his own. We know, too, that as Mozart worked on the music he was spent in body and depressed in spirit and that he became obsessed with the idea that he was writing the Requiem for himself.

It is a matter of more sober fact that the Mass was left unfinished, that Mozart's friend, Sussmayer, completed it from the composer's sketches and that he himself wrote the Sanctus, Benedictus, part of the Agnus Dei, and all but nine measures of the Lacrimosa.

Sussmayer's Parts Arresting

These circumstances have shed over the Requiem the glamour of romance and have given it a reputation beyond that of many a work intrinsically more important. Judged coolly and impassively the Requiem is for the most part of the lesser not the greater Mozart. There is in the music little of the anguish and forboding, the expression of suffering and sorrow, that fanciful commentators have professed to find there. Of late years there have been critics more realistic, and the truth is summed up in Ernest Newman's observation that in listening to the Requiem it is so difficult to say what is Mozart and what is Sussmayer. One might go even farther and suggest that Sussmayer's Sanctus and Benedictus are among the more arresting portions of the work.

To be sure, Mozart sounds a hauntingly solemn note in the few measures of instrumental introduction, but once the chorus has entered, that mood is soon dissipated. Yet, undeniably, the Dies Irae has impressiveness, if we can forget Verdi; the Rex Tremendae even more; the initial phrase of the Confutatus seizes our attention; the Lacrimosa, which Sussmayer completed, is moving and affecting. And that Mozart wrote soundly and effectively, with great contrapuntal skill, with firmness or grace of line, goes without saying. Only in the Tuba Mirum, with its almost ludicrous trombone obbligato, did he actually fall short of his intention.

Carefully Prepared

The performance yesterday, which filled scarcely more than an hour, was carefully prepared. The Bach Cantata Club, trained by its conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, renewed the excellent impression which it made in the Bach Festival of last season. The orchestra did its modest portion well; the solo singers, if not uniformly strong in their individual work, were admirable in ensemble.

At the end there was deserved applause for Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Woodworth, for chorus, orchestra and soloists.

Glob MUSIC Dec 19

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky's program for this week's Symphony concerts consists of Mozart's Requiem, in which the Bach Cantata Club assists the orchestra. The solo parts are sung by Gertrude Erhart, soprano; Marie Murray, contralto; Joseph Lautner, tenor, and David Blair McClosky, baritone.

Yesterday's concert was the shortest ever given in the Friday series. It began a little after the scheduled 2:30 and was over at 3:40. An instrumental work by Mozart might well have been added to fill out the concert to the usual length. No intermission was allowed to interrupt the Requiem, nor was there any applause until the end.

Most of the audience had heeded the request for promptness, so that nearly everyone was seated before the music began. Late-comers had a long wait until a pause between numbers before being seated.

It is unusual, perhaps unprecedented, for a Symphony concert in the regular subscription series to be devoted to a work in which the chorus is more prominent than the orchestra. Nor has Dr Koussevitzky hitherto seemed at his best in music by Mozart. But the remarkably eloquent and impressive singing of the Bach Cantata Club, and the unusually imaginative interpretation of Mozart's music given yesterday by Dr Koussevitzky justified the innovation.

He had evidently taken great pains in preparing the Requiem, seconded loyally by the chorus, and by its conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth. The result was a triumph unanticipated by at least one critically-minded listener. Only the vocal solos, respectably and conscientiously sung by a quartet of local performers reminded one of the usual run of Boston choral concerts.

This triumph was a personal one for Dr Koussevitzky. His imagination had been stirred by the dramatic quality of Mozart's music, its fire passed through him to his hearers.

There is no need to tell once more the strange story of this requiem, written by the dying Mozart so that a foolish nobleman might pass it off as his composition. Left unfinished, completed by a pupil of Mozart, who imitated the master's handwriting so well that at first people thought the pupil had no share in the music. Yet after the poignant "Hostias" the facile commonplace of the "Sanctus" betrays another hand than Mozart's so clearly that no listening ear should be misled as to where Sussmayr's work really begins.

Many of Mozart's most populer pieces have a delicate, melodious grace that deceives the superficial amateur into dismissing the composer as a mere writer of pretty tunes with lively rhythms. But there is much in this requiem, as there is in the operas and symphonies, to support the contention that Mozart is the greatest composer of dramatic music the world has yet known.

His music does not, of course, make as big a noise as that of Wagner, nor does it pound home melodramatic commonplaces like that of Verdi. But the greatest drama, like Sophocles' "Antigone," is not full of sound and fury.

In this requiem, how many measures there are that convey, as no choral music save that of Bach has ever conveyed, the true meaning of the liturgical texts.

Dr Koussevitzky wisely presented the proper balance between chorus and orchestra. Had the soloists had great voices their parts would have fitted the scale of the performance better. Mrs Murray and Mr Lautner rose to their opportunities in solo passages; Miss Erhart surpassed her previous self repeatedly, but one could not resist the wholly unfair reflection that the soprano solos on the last previous occasion when the Boston Symphony gave this requiem were sung by the late Lilli Lehmann. It is to singers of her rank, could they now be found, that such solos as these should be entrusted at a Boston Symphony concert.

Next week the afternoon concert will be given on Thursday. P. R.

Gershwin to Appear with Symphony When New Composition Is Played

Herald Dec 22

A new George Gershwin composition, "The Second Rhapsody," will be played publicly for the first times Jan. 29 and 30 by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Gershwin himself at the piano, it was learned yesterday at Symphony hall.

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony, is enthusiastic about the rhapsody, which he considers one of the finest American compositions. He first read the score when his friend Gershwin showed it to him as arrangements were being made for the opening of "Of Thee I Sing," a musical comedy the score of which was written by Gershwin.

Arrangements were made at that time for the first public playing of "The Second Rhapsody" by the Boston Symphony. Although the Boston Symphony under Director Koussevitzky has included some "symphonic jazz" in its repertoire, no Gershwin music has been played.

Scored for a large orchestra, "The Second Rhapsody" is described as being as appealing as Gershwin's famous "Rhapsody in Blue." It is marked by the syncopated rhythm characteristic of Gershwin, and runs about 16 minutes. Koussevitzky regards it as Gershwin's "most significant" composition.

"The Second Rhapsody" is the third of Gershwin's numbers for which he himself made the orchestration, the others being "An American in Paris" and "Piano Concerto." He did not score "Rhapsody in Blue" for symphonic rendition.

In "The Second Rhapsody," the piano, Gershwin's favorite instrument, provides the obbligato.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans. Dec. 22

The Tie That Binds

IN his weekly reflections upon the course of music in New York, Mr. W. J. Henderson of The Sun, whose insight and independence increase, rather than diminish, with advancing years, has dwelt more than once upon the indifference of the subscribing public of symphony concerts to the ministering orchestra. In their eyes, ears and minds it becomes Mr. Toscanini's or Mr. Stokowski's or Dr. Koussevitzky's, the instrument upon which he plays, hardly to be more considered than the piano at which Mr. Gieseking or Mr. Horovitz takes his seat. True, there are rites, like the rising of the players at the signal of the conductor after hearty applause, presumably for performance as well as piece; the congratulatory wavings of composer or virtuoso as he departs from the stage or returns to it; the warm grasping of the Concertmaster's collective hand. Rites, however, tend to become ritual. It is doubtful whether, by this time, these routined ceremonies of the concert-hall touch the imagination of audiences.

They are more impressed when the conductor sets one two or three of his illustrious virtuosi in front of the orchestra to play the solo-parts in a given piece, as Dr. Koussevitzky has done more than once with Suites from Bach. Or when one or another virtuoso from his seat plays an outstanding instrument, say Mr. Boettcher his horn in Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony or Mr. Laurent his flute in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; is beckoned by the conductor to rise in his place and take his share of the general plaudits. To the rank and file—the string choir other than the "first desks," the second flute, the third bassoon, the fourth horn—such opportunity never comes. Yet they are intrinsic and sustaining part, individual by individual, of the orchestra that we like to believe in these days at zenith. Often enough also they give to its service all that is in them, as truly as do "the firsts" whom more or less of the audience knows.

In time these hard-working, quiet-living artists and gentlemen—for usually they are nothing less—leave the orchestra. Increasing years weigh them down; circumstances detaches them; death steals upon with the means of living? Their own savings and the Pension Fund of the Orchestra. Quite so; but that Pension Fund does not increase automatically, like the widow's cruse in the Bible. It needs to be fed from without. Twice a year the men of the orchestra, one and all, ask the subscribing public and the occasional public to join in the renewal of the fund. Then and then only do we who frequent Symphony Hall come face to face with the personnel of the orchestra and discover our obligation toward it. There is but one way to discharge it—by the purchase of tickets for these Pension Fund Concerts. One befalls next Sunday and should be counted among the good and generous works proper to Christmastide. Chaikovsky, Koussevitzky and Roland Hayes to fill a promising program. But all three, and the public with them, for the hundred-odd that sit in the Symphony Orchestra.

Back to Bach

Now that its labors with Mozart's Requiem Mass for Symphony Hall are overpast, the Bach Cantata Club announces its return to its own concerts and composer, again at Emmanuel Church. There, by courtesy of the Rector, it will be heard on Monday evening, Jan. 18 in two Church Cantatas of Bach with Mr. Woodworth again conducting: Cantata XCV., "Christus der ist mein Leben"; Cantata XXXIV., "O ewiges Feuer." Mr. Steuart Wilson, the English tenor of last year, will assist in the performance of the Cantatas; between them sing an air, "Seht was die Liebe thut" from Cantata LXXXV. Membership tickets may be had of Miss M. Greenslet, treasurer, at 5 Charles River Square.

Another Discovery

A new George Gershwin composition, "The Second Rhapsody," will be played publicly for the first times Jan. 29 and 30 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Gershwin himself at the piano, it was learned yesterday at Symphony Hall. [Our Amusing Neighbor, The Herald, on its Front Page Today under a Double-Column Head. The News about Mr. Gershwin's Rhapsody Was Printed Last Friday—When It Was News. H. T. P.

The Scanty News Of Concert-Halls

Dr. Koussevitzky Introduces Frid, New Hungarian; Ravel for Harp

CHRISTMAS falls on Friday—appointed day for the weekly matinée of most symphony orchestras. Stoics or routine, Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra merely shift the hour of their "regular" concert from 2.30 to 3.30. In Philadelphia, Mr. Stokowski and his Orchestra defer theirs to the following Monday; while in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky sets his back to the preceding Thursday—that is to say tomorrow Though no actual reference to Christmastide may be discovered in any of the works to be played, all are appropriate. The symphony — Schumann's "Rhenish"—with melodies of the quality indicated by the untranslatable German "innig," and with rhythms buoyant and exuberant, is as much in keeping with the seasonal spirit as any symphony is likely to be. Bach's Concerto in B minor for flute and strings,—unheard at since 1919, therewith solo flute and ying harpischord, things angelic to eptible. That suggest ened by Ravel's Introdu o (new to these concerts), harp is the solo in-strume d by flute, clarinet and st qualities of Geza Frid's S yet to be discovered, seem to a the company it keeps.

Out of Hu

Geza Frid s no place in the latest editions of th musical dictionaries. Symphony Hall, h wever, is able to provide a biographical paragraph from the composer himself. Mr. Frid was born at Marmarossziget, in Hungary, in 1904. In his studies in piano he finally came under the instruction of Béla Bartók. When he entered the Academy of Music at Budapest, Zoltan Kodály, the other member of the illustrious Hungarian team, also became his teacher, supervising his studies in composition. He completed his work at the school in 1924. He toured Europe for a time, both as virtuoso in his own right, and as accompanist to the violinist Zoltan Székely. At present he lives at Amsterdam, in Holland. He has written a String Quartet—the first of his works to be performed (1927); a String Trio; a Concerto for Violoncello; a "Podium-Suite" for violin and piano; a Serenade for Wind Instruments. The present Suite was played for the first time at Paris by Monteux and the Orchestre Symphonique on Feb. 9, 1930. It now comes to first performance in America. The last page of the score bears the date London: V., VI, 1929.

The suite runs in five short movements:

I.—Aria and Allegro. (4–4.) The aria is a cantilena for oboe unaccompanied. Bassoons announce the theme of the Allegro in a scherzo-like fugato.

II.—Passacaglia. (Lento, 6–4.) For strings and harp. Full strings at once give out the figure to be treated. The movement is no more than thirty-nine measures long.

III.—Scherzo (Non troppo vivace, 6–8.) For winds and piano. A frisky, rollicking type of theme. The piece is rondo-like in form with horns prominent in the episodes.

IV.—Intermezzo. (Lento, 4–4.) For "battery" (percussion), harp and violin solo. This is the most unusual of the five movements. The "battery" includes timpani, cymbals, side-drum, tam-tam, triangle. The intermezzo is forty-two measures long and there are twenty-eight measures before the violin begins an improvisational cadenza-like solo.

V.—Perpetuum mobile. (Presto, naturalmente, 2-4.) The title sufficiently indicates the character of the music. The violins at once begin the "perpetual motion,"

After the première of the suite in Paris Monsieur Pitoy wrote as follows in "Le Menestrel"; "In first performance a Suite by a young Hungarian composer still unknown in France, Geza Frid. The work is infinitely seductive, thoroughly modern in character. It shows the influence of such composers as Hindemith and Stravinsky. Rhythm occupies first place, and does not become monotonous, though the composer sometimes uses the percussion alone. Frid's work, on a flexible architectural plan, possesses the vital spark of forceful thought and free invention. The adroit orchestration, in which families of instruments are played off against each other or superposed upon one another in piquant combinations, is pleasingly colorful. The Suite was well received and entirely worthy of the applause heaped upon it." A. H. M.

From Ravel

As to Ravel's piece, originally a Septet written in 1906 for harp, flute, clarinet and string quartet, it is enlightening to quote the exposition in Cobbett's Cyclopedic Survey of Chamber Music: "The Septet (Introduction and Allegro) has no break between the two sections,, and is really a harp-concerto with accompaniment for chamber orchestra. The harp-writing is brilliant, and the part is prominent, with many solo-passages and a long, florid cadenza. The introduction opens with a melody in thirds, 'Très lent,' for flute and clarinet, and works up to a climax that . . . is fully scored and makes a rich, sonorous background for the entry of the harp with the first subject of the Allegro proper. The theme in thirds of the Introduction is used as a subsidiary second subject in the Allegro and provides one of the most exquisite moments in the work, when it leaves that progression in thirds, and viola and violin, rising up to join the falling first subject on the harp, meet on a high major second. Again when in the following bar the viola soars above violin to sink back, on the next beat, below the first violin now in octaves with the second for the first subject.

"It is a fine piece of delicate writing, worthy of a pupil of Fauré. Immediately before the harp-cadenza, the two chief themes appear simultaneously, combined with great skill and ease. The vivid harp writing gives the work a feeling of brightness and gaiety." A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Jan. 1 and 2:

Symphony, No. 2, in B-flat major . . . . . d'Indy
Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra. Stravinsky
Suite from the Ballet, "Petrushka" . Stravinsky

The concerto will be heard for the first

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dec 25 By PHILIP HALE Herald

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, was as follows: Bach, suite in B minor for flute and strings. Ravel, Introduction and Allegro for harp with accompaniment of strings, flute and clarinet. Frid, suite for orchestra. Schumann Symphony, No. 3 ("Rhenish.)"

At preceding performances of this Suite by Bach the edition by Robert Franz was used; later Buelow's "arrangement" was preferred. Buelow as an editor of old music often took singular liberties with the original text. Perhaps his most flagrant misbehavior was his edition of Scarlatti's sonatas, in which he did not hesitate to change harmonies as well as melodic lines and rhythms.

Dr. Koussevitzky respects the suites and concertos of Bach and Handel, nor does he look with favor on any tinkering with them or any attempt at modernization. Bach's Suite yesterday was as Bach wrote it. The only addition was Franz's part for harpsichord, an amplification indicated by the thorough bass figures for the "continuo," the name given to the figured instrumental bass voice. Or as Niedt explained, "this thoroughbass is the completest foundation of music and is played on a keyboard with both hands, in such a way that the left hand plays the prescribed notes, while the right hand strikes the appropriate consonances and dissonances, so that an agreeable harmony . . . may be produced, to the glory of God and for the permissible gladdening of the heart."

This suite of old dance tunes prefaced by an overture was played delightfully by Mr. Laurent and a reduced body of strings. Mr. Laurent's beautiful tone and the agility and clearness displayed in the rapid passages; Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi and nuances—when nuances were called for—and the pleasingly acid biting of the harpsichord played by Mr. Sanroma were fully appreciated by the large audience which was in holiday mood. All was so good that the inevitable monotony due to succession of the dance tunes in the same tonality was for once not disturbing.

Mr. Zighera, the harpist in Ravel's pleasing piece, was also warmly applauded for the musical quality and skill of his performance. The work was first heard here at a Longy Club concert in 1910. The introduction strongly shows the influence of Debussy, but Ravel here and in the Allegro has something to say for himself. A tendency towards impressionistic writing has been found by some, but there is nothing vague, nothing experimental in this music, which is most grateful to the ear. Ravel's discreet but feeling employment of instruments was shown at the very beginning by his writing for the flute and clarinet.

As Frid, a young man, is Hungarian born; as he studied composition at the Budapest Conservatory under Kodaly, who is a believer in folk-tunes for thematic material, it would be interesting to know if he made use of any Hungarian or Czech popular airs in this suite which was played yesterday for the first time in this country. Surely the opening aria—finely delivered by Mr. Gillet—is in folk-tune mood, and the following Allegro has Hungarian dash; but in the striking Passacaglia—striking by reason of the changing positions of the ground bass or cantus firmus — there is thought only of Frid. The two movements that follow are interesting but not of so much significance.

The Finale—a perpetual movement—is a good example of the artistically rowdy form of music that excites an audience and brings applause. But the first two movements are the ones that now remain in the memory and lead one to hope for other orchestral works by this composer of indisputable talent.

Schumann's symphony was intended by him to be a glorification of Rhenish scenes and Rhenish life. It was composed first of all for Duesseldorf, the city where Schumann met with many disappointments, many vexations. He was temperamentally unfitted for the position of city conductor. He did not have a firm control over the players—in a word he was a composer—a man of dreams and visions—not an interpreter of works by others, not even of his own works. This symphony was received coldly when it was first heard. The compositions that followed showed his failing powers. There were intrigues that vexed him. Little by little his mind gave way. There was the attempt at suicide; then madness. But the Schumann of this symphony was still the composer to be reckoned with. One wishes that the first movement was not in so continuously heroic, exultant vein; that there was at least a breathing spell, but the movement that portrays the jovial life of the region; the slow movement and the pontifical one inspired by a ceremony in the Cologne Cathedral are of Schumann at his best, though one misses the romanticism that was peculiar to him. The performance was excellent.

The concert will be repeated Saturday night. The program of next week comprises d'Indy's Symphony No. 2, B flat major; Stravinsky's Violin Concerto (first time in this country) and Suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

82

NOVELTIES PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Post Dec 25

Ravel and Frid Supply Agreeable and Effective Scores

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In making a programme for the Symphony Concerts nearest to Christmas Dr. Koussevitzky has again disregarded the scanty store of orchestral music inspired by that particular season and yet has made a list sufficiently appropriate both in what it contains and in what it avoids.

TWO NOVELTIES

The first of this week's pair of concerts came, exceptionally and for quite obvious reasons, yesterday afternoon; the second follows tomorrow evening in regular course. As for this holiday programme, it consists of Bach's Suite in B minor for flute, harpsichord and strings; Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp with accompaniment of string orchestra, flute and clarinet; Geza Frid's Suite for orchestra; and finally Schumann's Third or "Rhenish" Symphony. Ravel's piece, in which Mr. Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, bears the solo part, was heard yesterday for the first time at these concerts; Frid's Suite had there its first performance in Boston.

Neither of the novel pieces proved of a nature to fill with consternation even the timidest musical breast. Ravel's Introduction and Allegro, composed in 1906 and heard here four years later at a concert of the Longy Club, is written for the most part in the harmonic idiom then cultivated by the "advanced" school of French composers which today sounds as conservative as Mozart. The piece, indeed, might be styled less a composition than a confection; there is beautiful and effective scoring for the strings and the two wind instruments and the harp is put through its paces, but always in a manner essentially musical. In playing the solo part Mr. Zighera once more showed himself an accomplished virtuoso and a musician of taste. The orchestral accompaniment was as exquisite as the score required.

Frid's Music Agreeable

A pupil of his brilliant countryman Zoltan Kodaly, Mr. Frid, born in Hungary in 1904 and now a resident of Holland, adds further evidence to the growing suspicion that the youngest generation of composers is looking, not forward, but backward. To be sure, Kodaly himself is not a harmonic radical; he stands, in fact, at quite the opposite musical pole from his confrere Bela Bartok. But if for the most part Kodaly handles familiar musical material, he does so with distinction and with originality. Young Mr.. Frid's music, as yesterday's performance disclosed it, might on the other hand have been written 30 years ago. Agreeable to hear it undoubtedly is; the melodies are attractive, the rhythms often infectious; and in scoring his Suite Mr. Frid has emptied an entire bagful of orchestral tricks.

The final movement, a Perpetuum mobile, is an orchestral virtuoso-piece of the first order, and yesterday's brilliant performance elicited from the audience warm and spontaneous applause. In short, Mr. Frid's music gave pleasure, and in a holiday concert that sufficed.

16 Players for Bach

To turn to the familiar pieces, Bach's Suite, heard yesterday from thirteen strings, two flutes and a harpischord, a band well suited to the style of the music, also gave pleasure, perhaps of a more satisfying kind than that afforded by the pieces which followed. The performance was one of rare delicacy and Mr. Laurent was deservedly applauded for his playing of the measures for solo flute.

Finally with Schumann's Symphony that would express the spirit of the Rhineland Dr. Koussevitzky once more showed his sympathy with the composer and his ability almost to persuade the listener that Schumann was not an inept and bungling orchestrator after all.

MUSIC

Globe Dec 25

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony concert in the afternoon series was shifted this week from Friday to Thursday, to avoid the holiday. There was no Christmas music on the program, contrary to the custom under previous conductors of commemorating Christmas and Easter at the pairs of concert nearest those holidays.

Yesterday afternoon's concert began with Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings. The other numbers were Ravel's Introduction and allegro for harp and strings; a new suite for orchestra by a young Hungarian composer, Geza Frid, and Schumann's Third Symphony. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony, was named as soloist on the program. Mr Laurent, the first flute, was also very warmly applauded for his share in the Bach suite.

Dr Koussevitzky had the Bach suite played by a small orchestra, such as would have been employed for it in the composer's own day. He thus enabled the flute solo part to be heard in the proper balance. Mr Laurent's skill and taste deserved the applause he received. The conductor and the other players contributed their due share to what proved an unusually satisfying performance, save for Dr Koussevitzky's tendency to overstress emotional values.

Frid's name was new to Boston. Still in his 20s this young man has had his chamber music performed in various European cities. The suite played yesterday was first performed Feb 9, 1930, in Paris by Pierre Monteux and the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris. Its five movements have titles like "aria e allegro," and "perpetuum mobile' which follow the modern fashion of avoiding any pretence that music can paint pictures or tell stories.

Frid studied piano under Bela Bartok, but his teacher in composition was the more conservative Kodaly. Ernest Newman, a critic conspicuously hostile to contemporary tendencies in music, is enthusiastic over Frid. Reading the program note about him led one to fear that Frid's suite would prove the usual innocuous academic musical exercise, soothing to conservative ears, soporific to others. This was, however, far from being the case.

Frid wrote this suite with immense and infectious gusto. It is happy, unpretentious, healthy-minded music, often naive in ideas, but ingeniously scored for orchestra. Good light music is rarer than good serious music, just as great comedies are, in the theatre and the opera house, far rarer than great tragedies. Mr Frid's gifts would fit him to provide the music for a thoroughly delightful operatic comedy, could he but find the right collaborator. This suite deserves to be heard again. It should not suffer the fate of most orchestral novelties and miss being repeated in this or in subsequent seasons. The performance was brliliant, and the applause far warmer than that for most new music at these concerts.

Ravel's piece is really a sort of concerto for harp, written with great subtlety, yet affording the soloist ample opportunity for display of technique. Mr Zighera played brilliantly and won cordial applause. As music, this introduction and allegro is an inferior early work of Ravel.

Schumann's symphony, scored—like all his orchestral work—with incredible clumsiness, loses in effectiveness at each rehearing. His genius was for songs and piano pieces, not for symphonies. But every 19th century German composer was tempted to emulate Beethoven, and few refrained. Chopin, in Germany, would no doubt have written symphonies, and on the evidence of his concertos, have scored them as badly as Schumann did. The scale of tonal values of the piano, in which Schumann as well as Chopin excelled, is fatally different from that of the orchestra. Yesterday's was a noisy and ineffective performance.

Next week d'Indy's Second Symphony, Stravinsky's new violin concerto, and his "Petruchka" fill the program. The violinist is to be Samuel Dushkin, who first played the concerto in Europe.

P. R.

Record Dec 25

2 NOVELTIES ON SYMPHONY MATINEE BILL

Bernard Zighera, harpist, and Georges Laurent, flute virtuoso, were the soloists at the tenth Symphony matinee, which introduced to Boston Ravel's piece for harp, wood wind and string orchestra, and also Geza Frid's suite. Zighera displayed his skill in the Ravel number and Laurent shone in Bach's second B minor suite for flute and strings. Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony is also on Dr. Koussevitsky's tenth program, which will be repeated Saturday night.

Frid, whose suite appears for the first time on any American program, is a young Hungarian now living in Amsterdam. He is a modernist. His music is fresh, colorful, imaginative. The suite is a worthwhile addition to the Symphony repertory. Equally striking is the new Ravel opus, with dazzling passages for the harp and with a rich background for the entire orchestra.

The Bach and Schumann numbers were also superbly played and warmly applauded

---

Pleasures of Program and Performance

Dr. Koussevitzky's Good Day, Bach, Ravel, Schumann, Discovery of Frid

Trav Dec 25

PERHAPS that old hand of the concert-room, Mr. Stock of the Chicago Orchestra, was wiser than Symphony Hall. His symphonic matinées, like Dr. Koussevitzky's, fall on a Friday. So also in this year of grace did Christmas Day. From two-thirty to three-thirty he shifted the opening hour; let it go at that. On Christmas Eve—he may have reasoned—most of his public would be busy with pressing concerns. On Christmas itself, once gifts had been distributed and dinner eaten, many might find the afternoon heavy on their hands. Symphony Hall chose another course; set back the matinée to Thursday last; assembled an audience diminished in numbers and different in aspect.

In the upper balcony in particular, the depletion was noticeable, inasmuch as the students at colleges and schools, only less essential to Symphony Concerts than to plays and pictures, were scattered homeward or New York-ward. On the floor, the changed aspect was more to be remarked. Many subscribers had handed tickets to those whom they would oblige or pleasure. It was not a "poor-relations" audience, as cynics sometimes say on Good Friday; but an audience strange to each other and to the habitués interspersing it. Luck, however, was with it—in the satisfactions of as agreeable a Symphony Concert as the season has brought forth; a concert on the lighter side, cherished by the matinée public.

In his first number, which was Bach's Suite in B minor for Flute and Strings—unheard these eleven years at Symphony Hall—the conductor assembled a chamber orchestra, no more than fifteen at most, with Mr. Laurent's flute and Mr. Sanromá's harpsichord. At sight of it imagination leapt back to the salon in the Residenz at Cöthen for which Bach wrote the Suite. At sound, judgment was content with a sonority carrying clear and full to every corner, yet preserving the fleetness and lightness, the running parts, the quick turns, of the orchestra in Bach's composing mind. Within the scale of the Suite, a full-bodied, full-rounded Overture begins it. Next ensues a Rondo, curiously marked "expressivo," with more than a hint that it, like a Minuet, may contain many things. Next a succession of short dance-movements in current fashion; to conclude, the swift, chattering give-and-take of a "Badinerie." Throughout the flute receives florid, feathering passages with occasional permission to sigh above the strings in the Saraband or to race with them over quicker-paced measures.

Once more the full body and fine texture of Mr. Laurent's tone, its transparency and flexibility, pleased every ear; while his virtuoso's skill was easy match for either a musing or a playful Bach. The strings kept him company in clarity and plasticity, in sensibility to the instant measure and the pervading style. Mr. Sanromá distilled consonance or dissonance, drop by drop, from the harpsichord. (Yes, dear friends, dissonance as long ago as 1720. For to the die-hards of Cöthen and Leipzig, the "all-father" of music sometimes seemed an intrusive modernist.) Dr. Koussevitzky, in the center of the group, conducted with a light hand and a just mind, poising every phrase and every figure in its place in the flowing web. A salon-music sounded as fresh and fanciful, deft and stylized, as it did two hundred years ago. The "all-father" deserved his "all."

In the ensuing piece, Ravel's "Introduction and Allegro for Harp with Accompaniment for String Orchestra, Flute and Clarinet"—as the program labelled it—the conductor might advisedly have lessened the number of his strings. Ravel wrote originally for only four—the usual quartet; whereas Dr. Koussevitzky utilized the whole, or nearly the whole, string choir, less the double-basses. Therewith he magnified the piece from chamber-music into a Concerto-like number for harp and orchestra. Mr. Bernard Zighera, indeed, took place, like any soloist, beside the conductor's stand; while "the accompaniment" left the way clear for the cadenza in which he proved his superlative skill, for the measures through which sounded his richness of tone or his unfailing felicity with every turn his part might take. The listener heard the harp not as a dash of color off composers' palettes, but as an instrument of music with an individuality of its own.

and clarinet, even with Mr. Laurent and Mr. Polatschek for little masters, were not always as clear as the ear might wish. There remained, however, and nearly always unclouded, the details of happy invention and apt skill with which Ravel diversifies the progress; transitions that touch the listening fancy; a freshness of resource and feeling that has not dried into the mental process of some of his later work. The Ravel of 1906, the date on the score, sometimes put on an aureole. The Ravel of recent years often prefers the paler cast of thought. Serenity, rather than tension, wrought this harp-piece.

Therewith the chamber-concert ended. Conductor, full orchestra and audience passed to Frid's Suite heard for the first time at these concerts. Once more Dr. Koussevitzky stood justified in open mind and open ear for the music of young men in our immediate day. Sooner or later—absit omen!—the epitaph of his Bostonian years will be written. Let it praise him as the writer may choose for his version of ancient, classic and modern masters. But let it say first that he cultivated the music of his own time with faith and courage; and last that he was the friend of youth. Who under these inscriptions may not rest content and in glory? Which is not to say extravagantly that Mr. Frid's Suite is epoch-making, a masterpiece and that sort of effusive thing. (Epoch-makers and master-works come along no oftener than once in a generation). Nevertheless, it is written with the flare for light-handed, free-running fanciful music that is modernist virtue, as though it were no reproach to be amusing.

Underneath, moreover, play an expert, resourceful orchestral skill and a lively orchestral imagination; while throughout there is clear impression of an individual mind and hand. Forgive Mr. Frid the moment in which he remembers Wagner's horns as Wagner sometimes remembered Schumann's. Or set against it such a fortunate stroke as the sudden and stirring intervention of the piano, placed at last where it should be—among the percussive instruments. The Passacaglia is no more than forty measures long; but not one is commonplace, affected, pedantic or routined. The Intermezzo, little longer, seems a newfound and engaging design in timbres. The whole Suite, as Mr. Newman, the great and good, has borne witness of other music by Mr. Frid, leaves a sense of exhilaration behind.

Once more in the Rhenish Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky (whose good day it was) proved his quality as conductor for Schumann. Set him before such a music and he plays it as though he believed in it; gallantly; with the rhythmic insistence and the warm expansions that are the preservative qualities of Schumann's Symphonies. They refuse to sound as music of firm and elastic outline, like d'Indy's Symphony that we are to hear next month. No more do we listen with our interest deep in development and progress, technical and poetical both, as we listen to a Symphony out of Brahms. Rather they prevail to this day—when an understanding and enhancing conductor orders them—by impetuosity and exuberance, by a rhythmic energy that rarely deserts Schumann; by what the pedants would call the disorderly ardors of his imagination.

Given a conductor who feels this exuberance and there is no thought of monotony through the first movement. Give the orchestra its head in the scherzo, as Dr. Koussevitzky did, and it is not ponderous. A penny for Schumann's "pianistic" scoring, when he wraps the slow movement in the shadowy glow of his melody. (He knew the spell of the Rhine Valley and the affection it nurtures.) The fourth movement opens wide to Schumann's expansive power; the finale is one more testimony to his rhythmic verve in symphonic composition. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky plays Schumann's Symphonies because, unlike most twentieth-century conductors, he cares for them. He plays them to admiration and response because he also understands.

H. T. P.

Amer. Dec 25

Soloists Divide Honors on Boston Symphony Program

By MOSES SMITH

The music at this week's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is "pleasant," as if to placate the conservatives in the audience at a time when good cheer is so universal.

With one exception the works on the program sound no harsh dissonances. And even the exception, a suite for orchestra by Geza Frid, Hungarian composer new to these concerts, contains no indigestible chords or harmonic sequences, despite the fact that it was first performed in Paris less than two years ago.

To add to the contentment of the audience there are amiable diversions, in the form of soloists. Masterful Georges Laurent, first flutist in the orchestra, plays the solo part in Bach's second suite in B minor, with a diminished orchestra grouped about him. Bernard Zighera, first harpist, is similarly engaged in Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for Harp with accompaniment of string orchestra, flute and clarinet.

Neither the Bach suite which begins the program nor the Schumann "Rhenish" symphony which ends it is unfamiliar music; but they are not heard here often nowadays. The matinee performance of the symphony was brilliant and in the appropriate romantic style. Similarly, the composition of Ravel, who has such an admirable interpreter in Mr. Koussevitsky, was beautifully presented, with Mr. Zighera as a shining light.

Frid's suite was more virile stuff—at least it seemed so, on first acquaintance. As we have intimated, the composer does not rely on an ability to shock the hearer's nervous system in order to make an impression. His language is none the less direct, even though it is not brutal. The ideas are thoroughly Hungarian, and seem derived or actually borrowed from folk literature.

83

With the New Concerto for Mirror

Trans Dec 26

Reflections of Stravinsky, Present and Past, from The Impending Piece

THE score of Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Violin and Orchestra has at last reached America. The work had its first performance in Berlin last October, and was broadcast through the most modernistic of all radio-stations—the Rundfunke (literally, a round spark) of Germany. Listeners-in and professional critics recorded their impressions. As usual, these impressions ranged from ultra-superlatives to infra-invectives, through the entire spectrum of critical adjectives. And there were some who, despite many precedents to the contrary, still believe that Stravinsky is perpetrating a gigantic hoax, deliberately and with malice aforethought misleading the public, the critics and his disciples alike.

Nothing can be further from the truth. Stravinsky is no Eric Satie, with his facile jokes in the margin of facile music. He is in deadly earnest in his statements; and in order to understand Stravinsky, we must once and for all relinquish the theory of a "hoax" and take him by his word and by his music. His utterances are as baffling as some of his musical procedures, and this agreement between words and works is really the surest clue to the mystery of his artistic behavior. So far only three persons in all the musical world really understand him (so the composer stated in an interview printed in a Swiss publication); even Einstein had more luck—Hegel alone was less fortunate; he had but one faithful disciple, and even that one did not wholly understand him. When an ardent Stravinskyist rushed towards the master after a European presentation of the Symphony of Psalms with confused words about the work, which he estimated was Stravinsky's best, he was greeted with retort baffling: "There can be no best and mediocre; either all works are bad, or all are good." This story is freely circulated in Paris outside of the enchanted circle of the understanding Three.

There are countless other stories, some of them seemingly well authenticated. During his first visit to the United States, in 1924, upon being asked what he thought of modern music, Stravinsky replied that he is not a modern composer. On another occasion he stated that a piece of music should be composed in the spirit in which a notary's contract is drawn. He enlarged on this exasperating notion when he related to the world how the Violin Concerto was written; the form being compressed as it is in this work, Stravinsky says it took him sometimes a full day to compose a single measure to achieve maximum results with minimum of musical denotation. In this, so the report goes on, he opposed himself to composers of a happier and lighter day, such as Mozart, who did not have to economize musical matter in this drastic fashion.

However wild such notions may appear to a musical stranger, to one who examines Stravinsky's scores without ire and studiously, the composer's words are of substantial aid. Strange as it may seem, Stravinsky speaks his mind with excellent adequacy to his ideas as embodied in his works. The spirit of economy, the "maximum-through-minimum,' method dates back to the composition of the "History of a Soldier," that astonishing instrumental septet, where every resource is utilized to capacity. But even of more interest is the process through which Stravinsky arrived at the revision of his early score, "The Fire-Bird," which he made in 1919. In the later edition all the gorgeous padding is taken out. To be sure, the deplumated fowl is not popular with orchestras and conductors, and the original edition is still the one that is widely performed. But the episode is characteristic of Stravinsky's own development.

Every one of the four movements of the Violin Concerto open with the identical chord of the violin, the D of the open string, the E, a ninth above it, and the high A, at two and a half octaves above the fundamental tone. Thus does Stravinsky establish the classical unity with an emphasis. In "Les Noces," composed in 1917, the mysterious effect of a bell's clank at the end of the work is obtained by a similarly positioned chord, with the interval of a ninth at the root. This collation of harmonic textures alone will show how consistent Stravinsky's present idiom is with his past. In the first movement (the Toccata) we find a violin passage in double stops with the characteristic see-saw movement, in iambic prosody, which instantly recalls the parallel movements in "Petrouchka." Besides, in this passage Stravinsky's melody is characteristically confined within the interval of a fifth. In another place and under other auspices it would not be difficult to prove a thesis (such theses may be in vogue in learned seminars) that Stravinsky's melodies are always built within the walls of a tonic and its dominant, sometimes atonally (in Petrouchka's "outcry" in the second scene of the ballet, in mother's complaint in the scene Two of Les Noces, etc.) sometimes tonally (as in the passage referred to above). In the Capriccio (fourth movement) there is a glimpse of the former Stravinsky in the ominous rests on the stronger parts of the measure. Finally, the crowning Presto bristles, as of old, with contrary rhythyms set against the measured steps of the bass-tones. What are these advancing and retreating chromatic tones of the 'cellos if not the familiar "bubbles" in the Earth's Dance of the Sacre? The relationship is much more than a mere coincidence, or identity of procedure. In it is the spirit of the Sacre that is with us again.

The second and the third movement of the Concerto bear the titles of Aria I and Aria II, respectively. Here we have Stravinsky the Serene, revealed to us in "Apollo." It is futile to speak of "dissonances" in the loose fashion in which this word is all too frequently employed. Again, if it were a point for a thesis, it might have been demonstrated that Stravinsky is no more dissonant than Bach, that he employs "suspensions of the second and third remove," that the relentless drive of the concurring voices forms harsh dissonances only in the "vertical plane," and that in reality, there has never been any "polytonality" in Stravinsky music, in the sense that there is polytonality in Milhaud's "Bull on the Roof." But we cannot pass by one technical device largely employed by Stravinsky, which for want of appropriate terminology, may be decribed as "unfinished resolution," a sort of a driving into a blind alley, making a dead stop when confluence is expected. Thus, in Aria I, the violin stops one degree short of the expected conclusion, in its scale-like passages, while the orchestral accompaniment, in a web of pure tonality, furnishes the implied resolution. This method is not new: in the Octet, Stravinsky showed several examples of similar "dead stops," and always against a background of perfect tonality. These stops are probably most displeasing to an audience, but from the point of view of "musical tragedy," as purification on the senses through fear and pity, Stravinsky's procedure is unimpeachable. Perhaps, the most noble use of the "suspensions" of higher orders is made in the middle section of the Second Aria. The musical tension is ideally calculated to bring a perfect catharsis in the final resolution. It is in a movement like this that one begins to understand why it took Stravinsky a day to complete a measure. Every note seems to possess a directional force that likens it to a mathematical vector. It also becomes clear why Stravinsky dismissed "inspiration" in favor of speculation. Incidentally, this Second Aria is the most "beautiful" of all four movements to listen to.

The mixture of styles that is immediately evident in the Concerto in D is really of no consequence. Some influences (we would call it deliberate admixtures) are quite unexpected, that of Ceasar Franck for instance (the latter was a pioneer of remotely related suspensions and resolutions, and the approximation of Stravinsky and Franck, inescapable as it is in the study of Aria I., may yet prove illusory). Others are the familiar ghosts—Handel, Bach. Chaikovsky is conspicuously absent, unless we attribute the episodic subject of the orchestra in the Toccata to his psychic voice. The very opening of the Toccata is in the general style of the early eighteenth century, with corrections of the neo-classical movement. Again, the obvious dissonances, the wrong notes in the right place, are not the result of any newfangled systems of polytonal writing, but proceed from a higher sense of tonality.

Every time that Stravinsky embarks on a new stylistic venture, he carefully avoids all distracting unconventionalities. In this he is the least sensational of all modern composers. In serving one definite purpose, he does not try to gain a point in another direction. Thus, when he was intent on the problem of musical economy, he worked miracles in instrumentation. He eliminated the violins and violas from the score of the Symphony of Psalms presumably to promote the more impersonal wood-winds, which he augmented in number. The elimination of the 'cello in the Rag-Time also may have been due to the desire to avoid the sensuous quality, rightly or wrongly associated with that instrument. In the Violin Concerto the orchestration is "normal." The small clarinet is the only supernumerary instrument in the score of the Concerto; there is an English horn which would stand in opposition to the practice of the Nineteenth Century symphony, but not necessarily of the early Eighteenth. The key of the Concerto is that of D, major or minor. The key of D, it will be remembered, is the most common (because the easiest for the strings) for all symphonies, concertos and overtures up to about 1800. In this instance Stravinsky is once more a conservative.

As far as the writing for the solo instrument is concerned, there is nothing particularly excruciating for a seasoned performer. The violin part of the "History of a Soldier" is without question the more complicated. Rhythmically, the Violin Concerto only in the final Presto presents any serious difficulty. Otherwise, the music proceeds smoothly, without constant changes of time-signature at one time associated with anything that is modern. Rhythm was not the problem to solve in the composition of this Concerto; it was not the item in the "notary's contract" between the composer and the commissioner, and the dazzling Presto, one is inclined to think, was either a spontaneous explosion, or a gift to the public. It took all the uncanny ingenuity of Stravinsky to graft it on to the Capriccio, to prepare it, as he did, with the dark gaps and falls of the immediately preceding music.

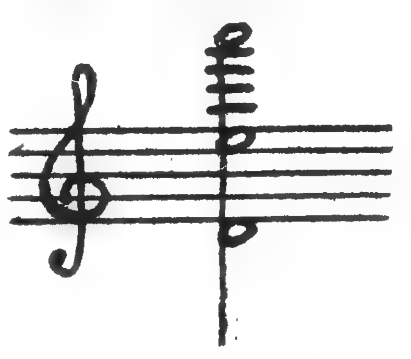
What then was the ultimate purpose underlying the composition of this Concerto? The answer may be simple: it was to write a Violin Concerto for Samuel Dushkin, the virtuoso. The work was commissioned and done according to the requirements of the commissioner. This honorable practice was responsible for many a masterpiece from Mozart and Beethoven; why should not Stravinsky do the like? In this he is only following a great tradition. A "notary's contract" here assumes a non-allegorical significance. What was the result of this contract? A masterpiece, which, in addition to its inherent qualities, is rich in demonstration of how a transient problem of style may be subordinated to a higher synthesis. In the Violin Concerto, as in no other composition, Stravinsky fused his various styles, and also the styles of various other composers, so solidly that the mixture appears monolytic. This may be a tribute to the composer's technical mastery, but it also may be a revelation of unity in seemingly disparate elements, a revelation of Stravinsky in the true Platonic sense, as one face of many facets.

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

The Master-Hand

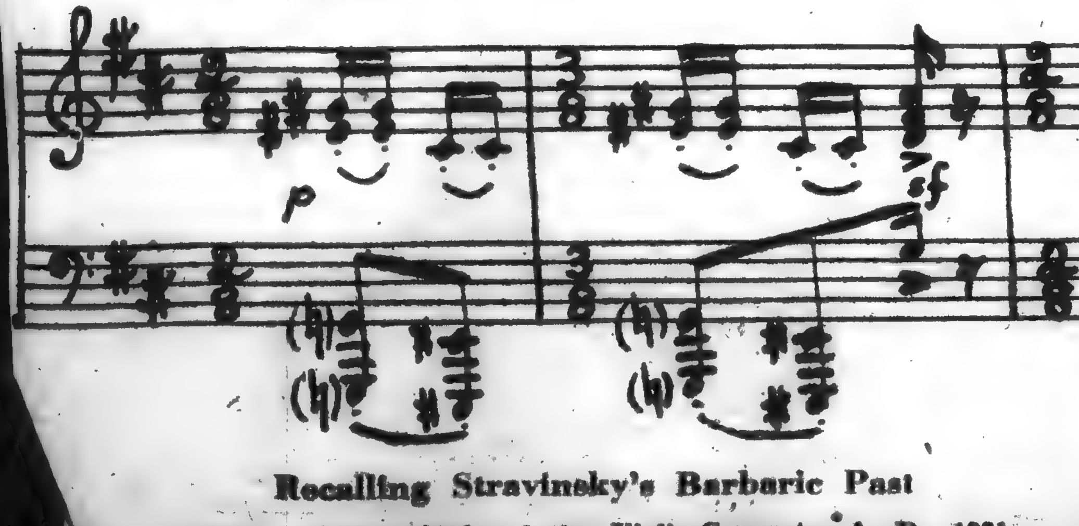
(By Courtesy of Les Editions Rieder, St. Sulpice, Paris)

The Leit-Accord



The Three-Tone Chord of the Violin with Which Every One of the Four Movements of Stravinsky's Concerto Begins.

Rhythmic Flash



Recalling Stravinsky's Barbaric Past

Section of the Finale of the Violin-Concerto, A. D., 1931

Globe MUSIC Dec 28

SYMPHONY HALL
Pension Fund Concert

Dr Koussevitzky, in selecting the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund Concert yesterday afternoon, honored the memory of his illustrious compatriot Tchaikovsky. For the orchestra alone there were the early Fantasia, "Francesca Da Rimini," and the F minor Symphony. Roland Hayes was soloist in Lenski's principal aria from the opera "Eugen Onegin," and in "Don Juan's Serenade," a song with orchestral accompaniment.

These Pension Fund concerts are given to increase the pension fund of the orchestra, which provides financial aid for retired players. Yesterday's concert was the first such this season; for a second, to occur next Spring, Bach's B minor Mass has been announced.

The Fantasia has been played but rarely in Boston. According to record, it last appeared on a Boston Symphony program in 1910. Composed and orchestrated in the Summer and early Autumn of 1876, the work is based upon verses from Dante's "Inferno." The poet describes how, in the protecting company of Virgil, he found in what he called "the second circle" of Hades, a company of those whose eternal punishment it was to suffer for their carnal sins the torments of being buffeted about by strong winds, without hope of rest. Among the company were Francesca Da Rimini and her lover, Paolo (brother of her husband), who had been slain by Francesca's husband after the latter had discovered their unlawful love. Francesca tells the story of her tragedy to Dante.

"Francesca" is by no means among the Russian master's lesser works. Together with much of his music, it is poignant and tempestuous. It is more moving to one listener than the "Pathetic" Symphony and "Romeo and Juliet," for example. It also seems to be less marred than the latter pieces by the banality of thematic material and manipulation that is encountered here and there in many of Tchaikovsky's compositions.

Without benefit of an elaborate literary "program," the Fantasia furnishes an effective musical description of the winds of Hades, the cries of the tormented, and an unfolding of Francesca's unhappy tale.

Together with the Symphony on yesterday's program, "Francesca" also provides an interesting example of how extremely personal is Tchaikovsky's music. Both works, for all their storm and stress, and the latter for all its connection with a theme of universal application, are relatively small-scaled, predominantly expressions of Tchaikovsky's own character and feeling. There is no impression of epic breadth and grandeur such as no doubt there would have been had Wagner, for example, written symphonies in his maturity, and a tone poem upon this subject.

Mr Hayes sang the aria and the serenade with his unfailing good style and sensitive artistry. The great Negro tenor invariably gives consistently good interpretations, and is one of the greatest of present-day artists. Only in one respect could the aria and serenade have been improved, and that is a purely physical matter: they require a voice of more opulence than that of Mr Hayes.

After the concert the singer was presented by the Pension Fund committee, a silver bowl, inscribed with an expression of gratitude, in appreciation of Mr Hayes' generosity in giving his services by appearing as soloist yesterday. Max Kunze, as spokesman, made the presentation.

Dr Koussevitzky conducted, as he always does Tchaikovsky's music, with superb vigor and brilliance, yet with regard for nuance and orchestra detail. It seems unlikely that anyone could equal his performance of the Fourth Symphony.

MUSIC Her Dec 28

PENSION FUND CONCERT

For the Boston Symphony orchestr
Pension Fund concert, given yesterd afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Kou sevitzky offered an all-Tchaikovsk program. The orchestral fantasi
"Francesca da Rimini" (Op. 32), Len ski's air from "Eugen Onegin," th
"Serenade of Don Juan," and th Fourth Symphony (Op. 36, in F minor were the works performed. Rolan Hayes, tenor, was the soloist. Th audience—one which responded wi enthusiasm to the qualities of the mus and the manner of its performance—filled the hall.

Poor though it is in genuine an solid musical ideas, "Francesca d Rimini" succeeds in being a remarkabl successful experiment in orchestr scene painting. The vividness wit which Tchaikovsky suggests the furiou winds, the bloodcurdling sounds an sights of that second circle of hell i which Dante found Francesca, remain impressive even in an age that is sur feited with the diabolical cleverness o innumerable major and minor master of orchestration. The orchestra, led b a Dr. Koussevitzky who has rarely s lavished himself, gave of the Fantasi a performance that was a miracle o powerful suggestion, of brilliant execu tion, of romantic warmth, of over whelmingly passionate abandon.

To the Fourth Symphony, often made intolerably piangent and vociferous—never to be quite purged of these qualities, which are indeed inherent in the score (and please remember that poor Tchaikovsky had reason to weep)—Dr Koussevitzky brought a fine dignity, a controlled intensity, that raised its first movement from the level of hysterical self-pity toward that of high tragedy, that lent it something of classic poise and impersonality. Admirably sustained tempi, fine shading and phrasing, and climaxes carefully judged and dramatically achieved, were part of his secret, as usual. So exquisitely was the Andantino played that the audience could not refrain from applauding this movement. There was a delightful delicacy not only in the famous pizzicato passages of the Scherzo, but also in the section of the movement given over to the brass and drums, and a certain bucolic joviality in the theme for wood-winds; while the brilliant verve with which the finale was played compensated somewhat for its noisy triviality.

Mr. Hayes sang Lenski's air from "Eugen Onegin" in Italian and the "Serenade of Don Juan" (from the six songs published as Opus 38) in German. Since his was not a Russian audience and good English translations are hard to find, he was probably justified in using whatever language he found most convenient. What is important is that his singing displayed in generous measure those qualities of intelligence, sensitive musicianship, and emotional sincerity for which it is noted.

It is not in such music as this that the peculiar beauty of Mr. Hayes's voice is best revealed, but his creation of mood and emotion in the "Onegin" air, his rhythmic vivacity in the serenade, were wholly admirable and roused the audience to enthusiastic and prolonged applause.

Mr. Hayes, who had not only given his services in aid of the pension fund, but had come specially from Curryville, Ga., for the occasion, was after the concert privately presented by the pension fund committee with a silver bowl, inscribed with an expression of gratitude. The presentation was performed by Mr. Max Kunze as spokesman of the committee. S. S.

83

Trans Dec 26

With the New Concerto for Mirror

Reflections of Stravinsky, Present and Past, from The Impending Piece

The Master-Hand

(By Courtesy of Les Editions Rieder, St. Sulpice, Paris)

THE score of Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Violin and Orchestra has at last reached America. The work had its first performance in Berlin last October, and was broadcast through the most modernistic of all radio-stations—the Rundfunke (literally, a round spark) of Germany. Listeners-in and professional critics recorded their impressions. As usual, these impressions ranged from ultra-superlatives to infra-invectives, through the entire spectrum of critical adjectives. And there were some who, despite many precedents to the contrary, still believe that Stravinsky is perpetrating a gigantic hoax, deliberately and with malice aforethought misleading the public, the critics and his disciples alike.

Nothing can be further from the truth. Stravinsky is no Eric Satie, with his facile jokes in the margin of facile music. He is in deadly earnest in his statements; and in order to understand Stravinsky, we must once and for all relinquish the theory of a "hoax" and take him by his word and by his music. His utterances are as baffling as some of his musical procedures, and this agreement between words and works is really the surest clue to the mystery of his artistic behavior. So far only three persons in all the musical world really understand him (so the composer stated in an interview printed in a Swiss publication); even Einstein had more luck—Hegel alone was less fortunate; he had but one faithful disciple, and even that one did not wholly understand him. When an ardent Stravinskyist rushed towards the master after a European presentation of the Symphony of Psalms with confused words about the work, which he estimated was Stravinsky's best, he was greeted with retort baffling: "There can be no best and mediocre; either all works are bad, or all are good." This story is freely circulated in Paris outside of the enchanted circle of the understanding Three.

There are countless other stories, some of them seemingly well authenticated. During his first visit to the United States, in 1924, upon being asked what he thought of modern music, Stravinsky replied that he is not a modern composer. On another occasion he stated that a piece of music should be composed in the spirit in which a notary's contract is drawn. He enlarged on this exasperating notion when he related to the world how the Violin Concerto was written; the form being compressed as it is in this work, Stravinsky says it took him sometimes a full day to compose a single measure to achieve maximum results with minimum of musical denotation. In this, so the report goes on, he opposed himself to composers of a happier and lighter day, such as Mozart, who did not have to economize musical matter in this drastic fashion.

However wild such notions may appear to a musical stranger, to one who examines Stravinsky's scores without ire and studiously, the composer's words are of substantial aid. Strange as it may seem, Stravinsky speaks his mind with excellent adequacy to his ideas as embodied in his works. The spirit of economy, the "maximum-through-minimum,' method dates back to the composition of the "History of a Soldier," that astonishing instrumental septet, where every resource is utilized to capacity. But even of more interest is the process through which Stravinsky arrived at the revision of his early score, "The Fire-Bird," which he made in 1919. In the later edition all the gorgeous padding is taken out. To be sure, the deplumated fowl is not popular with orchestras and conductors, and the original edition is still the one that is widely performed. But the episode is characteristic of Stravinsky's own development.

Every one of the four movements of the Violin Concerto open with the identical chord of the violin, the D of the open string, the E, a ninth above it, and the high A, at two and a half octaves above the fundamental tone. Thus does Stravinsky establish the classical unity with an emphasis. In "Les Noces," composed in 1917, the mysterious effect of a bell's clank at the end of the work is obtained by a similarly positioned chord, with the interval of a ninth at the root. This collation of harmonic textures alone will show how consistent Stravinsky's present idiom is with his past. In the first movement (the Toccata) we find a violin passage in double stops with the characteristic see-saw movement, in iambic prosody, which instantly recalls the parallel movements in "Petrouchka." Besides, in this passage Stravinsky's melody is characteristically confined within the interval of a fifth. In another place and under other auspices it would not be difficult to prove a thesis (such theses may be in vogue in learned seminars) that Stravinsky's melodies are always built within the walls of a tonic and its dominant, sometimes atonally (in Petrouchka's "outcry" in the second scene of the ballet, in mother's complaint in the scene Two of Les Noces, etc.) sometimes tonally (as in the passage referred to above). In the Capriccio (fourth movement) there is a glimpse of the former Stravinsky in the ominous rests on the stronger parts of the measure. Finally, the crowning Presto bristles, as of old, with contrary rhythyms set against the measured steps of the bass-tones. What are these advancing and retreating chromatic tones of the 'cellos if not the familiar "bubbles" in the Earth's Dance of the Sacre? The relationship is much more than a mere coincidence, or identity of procedure. In it is the spirit of the Sacre that is with us again.

The second and the third movement of the Concerto bear the titles of Aria I and Aria II, respectively. Here we have Stravinsky the Serene, revealed to us in "Apollo." It is futile to speak of "dissonances" in the loose fashion in which this word is all too frequently employed. Again, if it were a point for a thesis, it might have been demonstrated that Stravinsky is no more dissonant than Bach, that he employs "suspensions of the second and third remove," that the relentless drive of the concurring voices forms harsh dissonances only in the "vertical plane," and that in reality, there has never been any "polytonality" in Stravinsky music, in the sense that there is polytonality in Milhaud's "Bull on the Roof." But we cannot pass by one technical device largely employed by Stravinsky, which for want of appropriate terminology, may be decribed as "unfinished resolution," a sort of a driving into a blind alley, making a dead stop when confluence is expected. Thus, in Aria I, the violin stops one degree short of the expected conclusion, in its scale-like passages, while the orchestral accompaniment, in a web of pure tonality, furnishes the implied resolution. This method is not new: in the Octet, Stravinsky showed several examples of similar "dead stops," and always against a background of perfect tonality. These stops are probably most displeasing to an audience, but from the point of view of "musical tragedy," as purification on the senses through fear and pity, Stravinsky's procedure is unimpeachable. Perhaps, the most noble use of the "suspensions" of higher orders is made in the middle section of the Second Aria. The musical tension is ideally calculated to bring a perfect catharsis in the final resolution. It is in a movement like this that one begins to understand why it took Stravinsky a day to complete a measure. Every note seems to possess a directional force that likens it to a mathematical vector. It also becomes clear why Stravinsky dismissed "inspiration" in favor of speculation. Incidentally, this Second Aria is the most "beautiful" of all four movements to listen to.

The mixture of styles that is immediately evident in the Concerto in D is really of no consequence. Some influences (we would call it deliberate admixtures) are quite unexpected, that of Ceasar Franck for instance (the latter was a pioneer of remotely related suspensions and resolutions, and the approximation of Stravinsky and Franck, inescapable as it is in the study of Aria I., may yet prove illusory). Others are the familiar ghosts—Handel, Bach. Chaikovsky is conspicuously absent, unless we attribute the episodic subject of the orchestra in the Toccata to his psychic voice. The very opening of the Toccata is in the general style of the early eighteenth century, with corrections of the neo-classical movement. Again, the obvious dissonances, the wrong notes in the right place, are not the result of any newfangled systems of polytonal writing, but proceed from a higher sense of tonality.

